I would admit to no such thing no matter how much they pressured me. I had parked my car near my home and was gone on holiday for two weeks.

The focal point of their case was a report that my car was parked at the tubes for two days before I reportedly last saw it. If so, what was I driving around in — and giving people rides in — for those two days?

The party or parties responsible for sighting my car degenerated from "a sworn officer" to "Park Service officials" and finally to "the caretaker at Tuttle Creek" and various unnamed fishermen.

The cops kept adjusting their story to fill in holes and were not at all pleased that I wanted to ask some questions of my own. I could almost hear J. Edgar Hoover's pep talk, "Lean on this kid a little and he'll roll over."

What I objected to most, though, was that the cops' entire protocol of interrogation was designed for the purpose of extracting a confession of guilt, and they hardly considered who else might have driven my car to the lake. (Also, no one ever explained to me how I got back from the lake without my car!)

This situation has yet to be resolved. I expect to be arrested some day soon — perhaps right after this appears in print.

But the most repugnant fact is that when the RCPD realizes they were wrong, they will simply bury the case. That is not good enough for me. I'm a respected member of this community. I've been insulted by these two officers and deserve an apology from their superior. Otherwise, I welcome my day in court. (I'm bringing 100 character witnesses.)

Change in leaders healthy

A large number of administrative changes have occurred at the University in the past year, at all levels. These changes include additions of instructors, professors, department heads, deans and vice presidents. Within a year, a successor will be named to President Acker.

Such changes can only be healthy for the University. While some of the personnel vacating various positions will be missed by students and co-workers, new faculty and administrators will bring new ideas and policies to a University that has been governed by the same administration for a decade.

New faculty members provide a great number of academic opportunities often unavailable previously. William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, in his reorganization of student services, is making an effort to consult those affected by his decisions — students and faculty — before coming to any concrete conclusions.

This is imperative in administration, and Sutton, as well as other new administrators and faculty, recognize that. An administrator who thinks he or she is keeping the best interests of his or her constituents in mind without actually taking the time to analyze what the constituents believe to be in their best interests is looking at the world through opaque glass.

As administrators reach higher and higher levels, they become dangerously isolated from those people they administrate and serve. While they may still have the best interests of those they serve at heart, it takes extra effort to know their wishes.

The ability and desire to work closely with, and be accessible to, students are essential qualities in our next Universty president.

Obviously there are time restraints that preclude a University president from spending as much time with students as would be most beneficial, but nonetheless it is desirable.

Not only should the new University president be knowledgeable in the areas of management, finance and public relations, but he or she should also be able to represent the needs and desires of the students and faculty.

Females deserve equal pay

The nation's first statewide "comparable worth" ruling was overturned last week by a federal appeals court which said the state of Washington did not have to offer women equal pay for jobs of equal worth.

"Comparable worth" is a policy providing equal pay for different jobs judged to be of equal value.

The lawsuit was filed by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. It was the result of a 1974 study which evaluated state jobs and showed a 20 percent salary gap between workers in predominantly female and predominantly male jobs that required similar levels of skill, mental demands, accountability and working conditions.

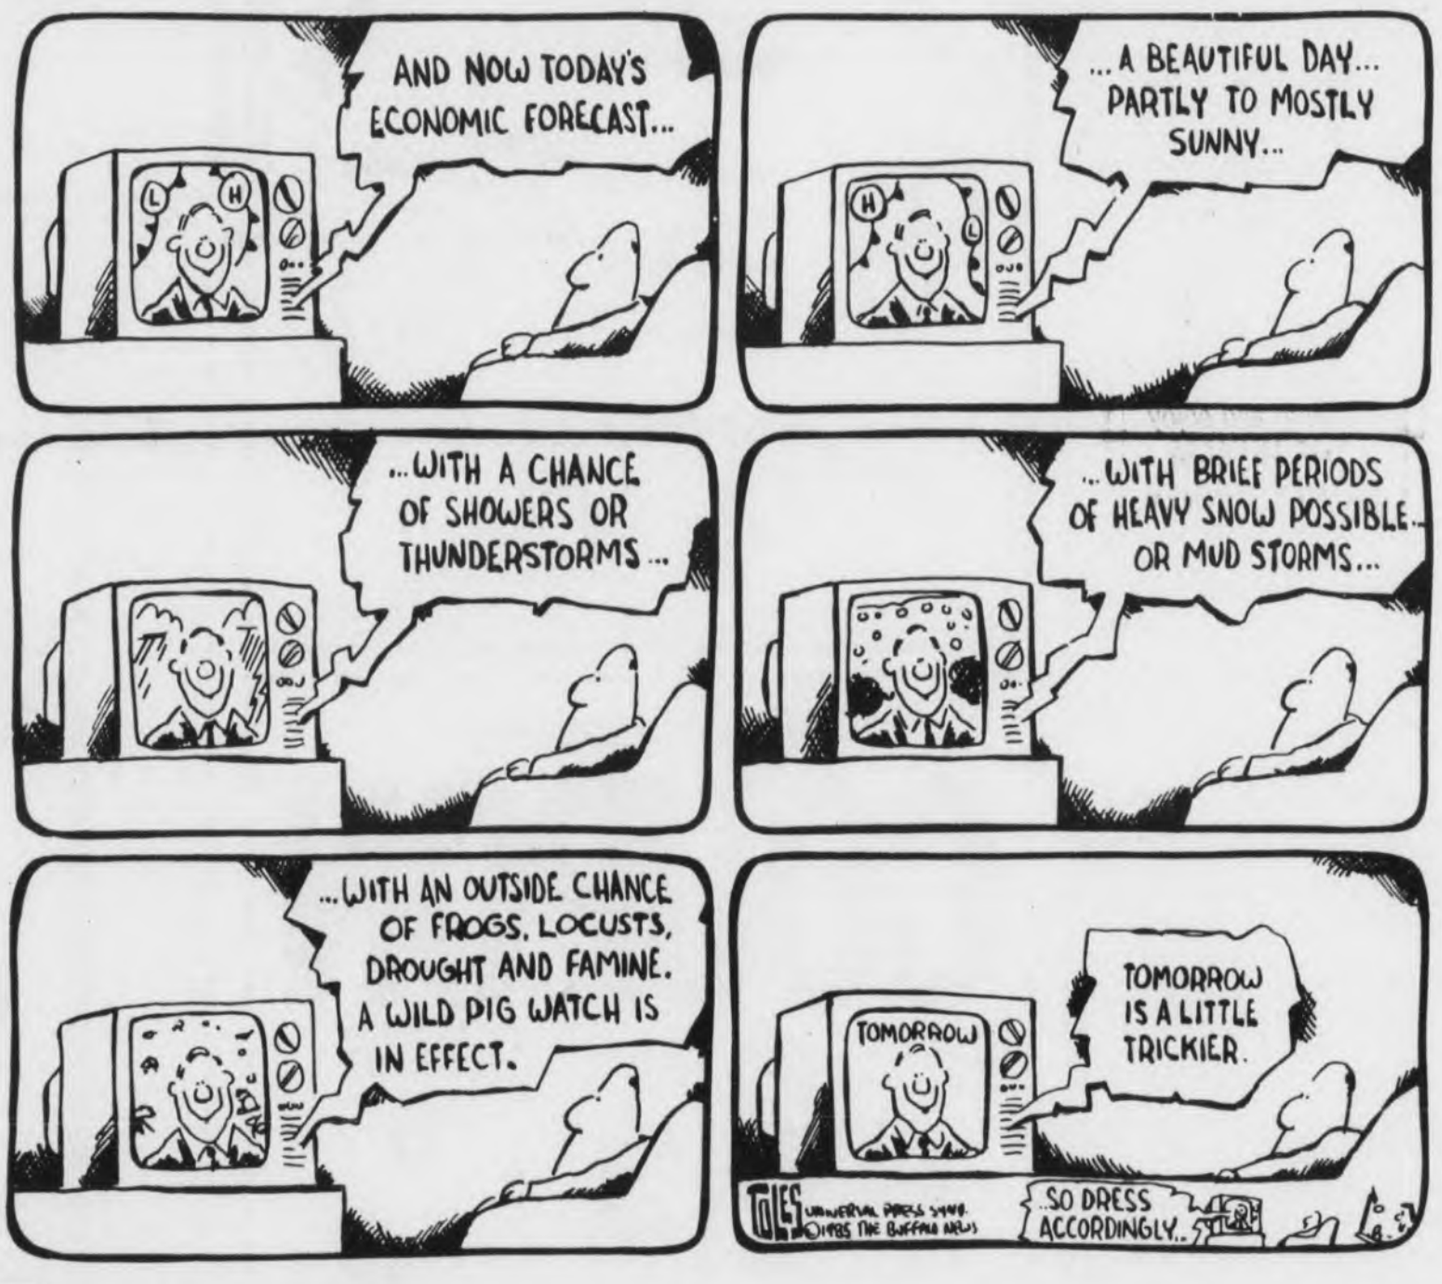
In 1983, U.S. District Judge Jack Tanner found in favor of the employees, and provided almost $1 billion in damages to 15,500 workers.

But the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has said a wage gap by itself did not show that the state intentionally discriminated against women.

The court also said federal laws banning sex discrimination in employment did not require an employer to provide equal pay for different jobs, even if the employer's own studies said the jobs had the same value.

The opinion, written by Judge Anthony Kennedy, said the 1964 Civil Rights Act doesn't obligate Washington "to eliminate an economic inequality which it did not create."

The court said employers could follow prevailing market wages in setting salaries, even if those wages underpaid women.



The court's decision to yield to the status quo — even when it discriminates against a certain segment of the population — is a step back.

And the problem is not confined to one state. A similar lawsuit is pending in California on behalf of 37,000 workers in female-dominated jobs.

What is the purpose of federal sex discrimination laws if they fail to eliminate discrimination?

Intentional or not, discrimination is wrong and should be righted. And where better to set the example than in state government?

Judgment of Christianity based only on God's word

Editor,

Re: Daniel Grubb's column, "Religion is a 'fairy tale' for believers," in the Aug. 27 Collegian:

Daniel Grubb has taken it upon himself to warn the world against this evil, anti-intellectual entity called "religion."

This was obviously an attempt to start an argument about religion in the public media. Well, I'm accepting your invitation. But be forewarned: When you argue against God, you are bound to lose, "for the foolishness of God is wiser than men" (I Corinthians 1:25).

Maybe I'm being dense. But I know of no other religion whose founder gave his life, not for the sake of his disciples, but for the salvation of all men. "But God shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Romans 5:8).

You see, the story of Christianity is a story of love. It is the story of a God who loved us so much that he was willing to pay the ultimate price — facing death in every sense of the word — to reconcile us to him.

But the story doesn't end there. Not only did he face death, but he also defeated it.

I would refer anyone who would claim that religion is "intellectually worse than useless" to my favorite chapter of the Bible, I Corinthians 13. This chapter contains the essence of Christianity. It describes in beautiful and poignant words the essence of true love.

To judge Christianity by the acts of those who claim to be Christians makes as much sense as judging the English language by those who claim to speak it. There is one standard by which Christianity may be judged: the word of God. On it alone will I base my defense of my faith.

Just to be fair, I will outline my conditions of defeat:

— When you can strip the Bible of its power to guide lives, spiritually and philosophically.

— When you can explain the wholeness of the Bible as a work, and the hundreds of its prophecies that history has seen fulfilled.

— When you can see the lives of those who have been saved from utter defeat and been led to victory in Jesus Christ, and dismiss Christianity as "worse than useless."

— When you can explain the miracles I have seen and experienced.

— When you can experience the power of Christ in you that I have experienced every day of my life since I have received his salvation, and dismiss it as a "fairy tale for believers."

Then, and only then, will I accept your atheistic views.

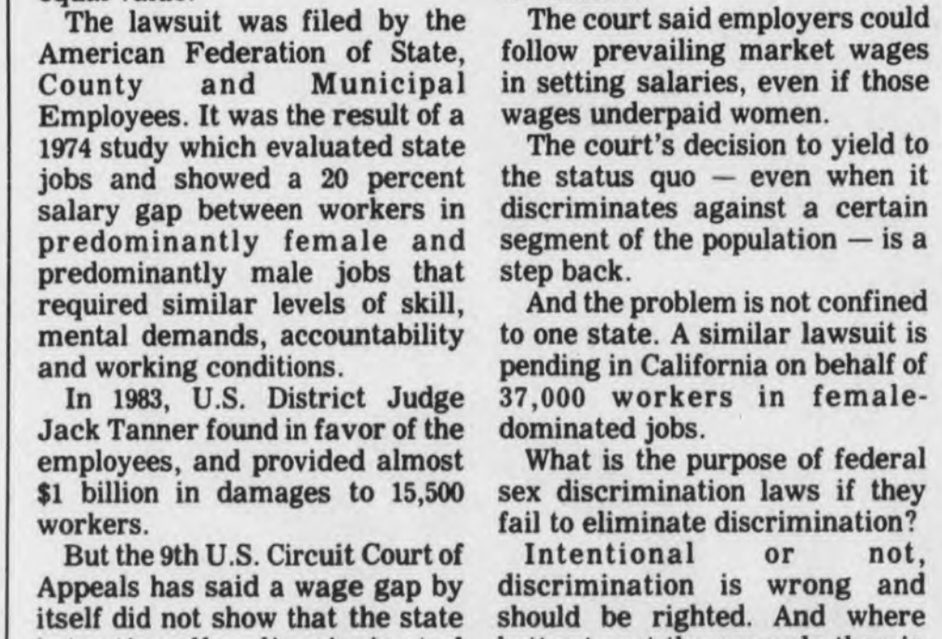
Safety on campus should be responsibility of police

Editor,

Congratulations are due to the KSU Police Department. What a great night they had Monday!

Not only was there a rather unexpected storm and a very flooded road that brought extra cars to the Dickens Hall staff parking lot, but there were women students attending lectures at Bluemont Hall until 9:30 p.m. who needed a "safe" car park.

Can you say "safe" when there is inadequate lighting, very little available parking and muggers and rapists in the area? The KSU officer — or should I say Officer No. 123 — got himself there 20 minutes after the storm and, I assume, got us all.



I hope his commission is adequate. I noticed he wasn't around when lectures were complete. I guess you get no revenue from protecting students — only the $8 parking violation, a kind of "student protection insurance."

I suppose you may at least be able to walk to your car with someone from your class if you are lucky and if he or she can also afford the $8 fine every time there is a late-night lecture.

Good work, 123. Glad to see your heart is in the right place — collecting revenue. You served the needs of some students well. I hope you didn't get too wet or muddied tracking us down.

Can't let these "frightened" women feel as though they can get away with parking illegally just to protect themselves. That's what the police are for.

American businesses begin to withdraw from South Africa

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Many American businesses and banks are gradually but steadily pulling out of South Africa because, as one bank spokesman put it, they no long find that country "an attractive place to do business."

"The private market is sending a much stronger message than official sanctions have to the South African government that their policies are creating an economic climate that is unconducive for conducting business," says Jeffrey J. Schott, research associate at the Institute for International Economics.

"The compromise sanctions coming out of Congress pale by comparison to what the private sector is doing," Schott says, referring to the House-passed bill that is now before the Senate. On Monday, President Reagan on his own put into effect most of the provisions of that measure.

Hundreds of millions of dollars in U.S. investments remain in South Africa. But government figures show an annual decline, except in private loans, since 1981.

Some of the changes that are under way:

—Engelhard Corp., a big New Jersey manufacturer of chemical and metallurgical products, this year liquidated its wholly owned South African affiliate. The operation had $4.5 million in sales in 1983, 2 percent of the company's total.

"It was a pure business decision, based on the present performance of that business, the growth potential and the overall economics involved," said spokesman Frank Vitale.

—Phibro-Salomon Inc., an investment banking firm, announced last month a withdrawal from South African operations. Spokesman Mel Adams declined to comment on reasons. The company's South African assets had been estimated at less than $420 million.

—Coca-Cola Co. announced sale of majority interest in its group of South African bottling plants to a South African company, though it will continue to hold a minority stake. Soft drink sales in South Africa have been down, spokesman Randy Donaldson said.

—West Point-Pepperall, a Georgia-based textile company, sold its minority interest in a South African affiliate to local managers for one rand — less than 40 cents. "Really there was no relationship between the social activity there," said spokesman Donald Downs. "It was a purely business decision based on the fact the operation wasn't profitable."

But while officials of most companies withdrawing from South Africa said the decisions were based on dollars-and-cents business judgments, several acknowledged that political factors also came into play.

"While most of them cite economic reasons, and with good reason,...I think it's also just fact that politics come into consideration at some point," says Cathy Bowers, an analyst with the Investor Responsibility Research Center Inc., which surveys U.S. and British business activity in South Africa.

In some cases, the decision to end business dealings with South Africa was prompted by laws discouraging ties with the apartheid regime.

For example, Motorola Inc. dropped its sales of two-way radios to the South African police forces this year in response to a New York City ordinance barring purchases from firms dealing with South Africa, spokesman George Grimsrud said. The company had no choice if it wanted to sell radios to New York City.

Some companies say they are firm in their intention to remain in South Africa, however.

"There's been no change; it's just business as usual," said Cameron Calder, vice president of international operations for American Cyanamide, the big chemical company. Its South African affiliates have 700 employees and had 1983 sales of $50 million.

The latest jolt was a credit pinchoff last week by U.S. banks on South African companies. The banks are expected to resume lending money to South Africans after that country ends a four-month moratorium on repaying loans.

Nonetheless, economists call the move the most significant step yet to affect private businesses in the controversy over South Africa's racial policies.

"Political and economic issues have tended to merge in that country," said John Falb, head of the multinational department of Republicbank Corp. of Dallas.

"Most American banks that have lent money to that country are in a wait-and-hold, wait-and-see situation," he added. "We wouldn't be extending new loans until we find out just what the South African government intends to do and how they intend to react to the current economic situation."

Chase Manhattan Bank is one of many large institutions that won't lend money to the government of South Africa or government-owned corporations.

Because of racial turmoil, the Bank of Boston no longer finds South Africa "an attractive place to do busineses," says spokesman Wayne Taylor. He acknowledges pressure from anti-apartheid U.S. customers.

Commerce Department figures show U.S. business investment in South Africa, apart from loans, was $1.8 billion at the end of 1984, down from $2.3 billion at the en of 1983 and a high of $2.6 billion in 1981.

Bowers said the number of U.S. companies with sales or assets in South Africa has declined from 284 in January to around 270.

But most U.S. firms that are leaving have relatively small operations in South Africa, she says, adding, "The large companies that have pretty big stakes are there to stay."

Coliseum

Galyardt said everyone left the Friday meeting feeling this project could be done and still have the quality factor, however, he said "there was also a lot of finger-crossing."

Keeping the student seating on the floor of the coliseum was a major concern, Brown said.

"They (architects) came in and outlined the whole project and showed the redesigned (rough draft) drawings," Brown said. "We had to go on the fact that we didn't have much of a choice. Mark and I just kept saying that we wanted to keep the student seats on the floor."

At the meeting, the decision was made to cut seating by 2,500 seats, leaving a 500-seat difference between the instructions given by Warren Corman, director of facilities for the regents, at the Sept. 5 Board of Regents meeting. Corman recommended decreasing the seating of the proposed 16,000 seat coliseum by "at least" 3,000 seats.

Brown said student seating of 500 floor seats created the difference and that those 500 seats would be left in the plan.

The changes in seating must now be approved by the regents. University President Duane Acker is scheduled to make a detailed report of the redesign options to the regents at their Sept. 19-20 meeting.

Galyardt said he thought the regents would accept the proposed changes even though 3,000 seats were not cut out.

Brown said he is going to look for students' reactions to the recent changes at the student senate meeting Thursday.

"Right now I don't want to say how students feel about the changes, I will know more after the student senate meeting Thursday," he said.

In the meeting Friday, the architectural firm of Gossen Livingston Associates, Wichita, agreed to redesign the $16.1 million arena to eliminate 2,500 seats free of charge as agreed to in its contract with the state.

The architects must redesign the single-purpose facility because all bids opened Aug. 20 in Topeka were at least $3.4 million over the anticipated construction cost of $14.5 million.

The lowest construction bid, $17.95 million, came from the Martin K. Eby Construction Co. of Wichita.

Because of the redesign, re-bidding on the project must take place and delays in redesign could postpone the groundbreaking ceremony for six months. It was originally scheduled for last Saturday.

The coliseum will be located at the northwest corner of campus at the south end of KSU Stadium. The project will be paid for with $2 million from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, $7.1 million in private gifts guaranteed by the KSU Foundation and $7 million in student fees.

world can link up with TELENET.

If people don't want to use TELENET for a conference, each person contacts the bridge, and the operator joins them together. Jerome Frieman, associate professor of psychology and last year's faculty senate chairman, met once a month with his senate counterparts at six campuses through TELEbridge, Kruh said.

Other school systems with telecommunication capabilities can participate in joint programs with the Kansas Regents Network by using TELEbridge, she said.

Through bridging, TELENET had joint programs in science high school honors with the Montana school system and programs in food services with Texas and Oklahoma, Kruh said.

National organizations and state and federal agencies also use the bridge or buy their own bridge.

After talking with her about the TELEbridge, the United States Department of Agriculture bought a bridge to use nationally for continuing education and updating agriculture schools.

Gunmen kill guard, kidnap oldest daughter of Duarte

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Gunmen attacked presidential security guards outside a private university here Tuesday, and witnesses said the daughter of President Jose Napoleon Duarte was kidnapped.

Employees at a local radio station owned by the daughter, Ines Guadalupe Duarte Duran, 34, also said they had been notified by the family that she had been kidnapped. One of her security guards was killed and one was wounded in the shootout.

"We only know that she has been kidnapped and that there is one dead," said an employee of the Armed Forces Press Committee when asked about the reports.

An official at the presidential house, Gertrudis Sandoval, identified the slain guard as Mauricio Alfredo Elena Palomares and said he and the wounded man were Duarte Duran's personal bodyguards.

Troops and presidential security guards swarmed over the area on a main street on the west edge of the capital where the New San Salvador University is located.

She is the oldest of President Duarte's six children, has three children and is divorced. She owns Radio Liberty, a commercial radio station and managed Duarte's presidential campaigns in 1984.

Leftist guerrillas and the U.S.-supported government are locked in a nearly six-year-old civil war here.

No group took immediate responsibility for the kidnapping, but a captain from the presidential security office, who would not give his name, said, "Certainly it was the guerrillas."

Group will travel to China

Trip's goal exchange of ideas

By MIKE MCQUEEN
Collegian Reporter

Participating in an 18-day educational exchange, Virginia Quiring, associate dean of public services, will be making a trip to the People's Republic of China.

Although the University has been active with many different nations in such areas as agriculture and engineering, it will soon be recognized as contributing help in the area of library education.

The group, which departs Oct. 8 from San Francisco, is sponsored by China-U.S. Scientific Exchanges. This non-profit foundation's goal is to promote a cultural exchange of talent and ideas between professionals of the two countries.

Quiring and about 20 other librarians will tour the country to exchange ideas and information on library and information science. Other University faculty members have participated in the China-U.S. Scientific Exchanges program in the past in fields such as agriculture and administration. The program is not just for librarians, Quiring said, but she is the first librarian from the University to travel with the exchange.

Quiring's specific task will be to cover the topic of marketing the library by way of bibliographic instruction — the instruction of how to use a library and its resources. She will also be involved with the training and education of Chinese library staffs.

Quiring was informed about the program when she received an invitation from the exchange, which is based in Grossepointe, Mich. Those interested were asked to send a reply with a resume. From the responses, the personnel best qualified were selected. The participants selected represent the states of Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Nevada, Colorado, Kansas and California.

"I am anxious to see their system of libraries and education," Quiring said. "The communication will be difficult because of the use of interpreters, but it should be an interesting experience."

Quiring received degrees in Library Science and Educational Administration at Emporia State University. She has knowledge dealing with humanities, instructional services and cataloging. She also helped establish a library in Haiti in 1979.

Quiring has never been to China. During the summer, she made a brief and non-professional trip to the Soviet Union. She believes, however, the trip to China holds a greater amount of interest.

"I prefer a working tour instead of one for mere pleasure," Quiring said. "I feel that a person can get a better understanding of people and culture when the trip is professionally based."

She does hope the Chinese will allow time for the group to do some sightseeing.

The exchange group will have an orientation meeting in San Francisco before flying to China. The group will follow a tentative schedule to visit Peking, Nanking, Wuhan, Changsha, Canton and Hong Kong. The group will visit libraries on the academic, public and school levels.

Quiring hopes the exchange will develop a better understanding of the library and educational services in the two countries. She also hopes to establish an exchange of materials between the University and the Chinese educational system.

Division extends registration hours

By The Collegian Staff

In an effort to better respond to student needs, the Division of Continuing Education has extended its registration hours.

Since Sept. 2, the Continuing Education registration office has stayed open until 6 p.m. Monday through Friday, said Linda Morse, division registrar. Previously, the office was open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Morse said the registration office is staying open longer "in an effort to be more responsive to the adults who enroll in the continuing education programs."

"Though it has been possible for full-time students to come into the registration office, it has been virtually impossible for working students who have class and other responsibilities to enroll unless they come in during the noon hour or after work. Thus, we made the decision to extend our registration hours to better respond to the students' needs," said Laverne Lindsey, assistant provost for continuing education.

The office has remained open over the noon hour for approximately 18 months.

Credit programs administered by the academic outreach staff of the Division of Continuing Education offer students the chance to work toward both graduate and undergraduate degrees through off-campus courses, non-traditional study programs, Telenet and other formats.

Campus experiences administrative turnover

John Moore

John Moore, the University controller since March 1, is 41 years old. He succeeds the retired Ralph Perry, who took the job about the same time Moore took his first steps, nearly 40 years ago.

Perry served as controller, or financial adviser, for 32 of his 39 years at the University.

Under Moore, the controller's office will see some changes. To start, Moore said he has identified two major objectives.

His first, is to accomplish what University officials and employees desire, but remain objective and within policy guidelines, he said.

He said he will reduce emphasis on the control aspect of that function and direct more attention toward a support role.

The second major objective is to take advantage of the computer revolution and install a "state-of-the-art financial records system."

Perry would like to have a fully automated computer system for the controller's office operational by July 1986.

Moore worked 11 years at the University of Nebraska-Omaha where he was also the university controller.

Before starting at Nebraska in 1974, Moore worked as a systems analyst and coordinator of administrative systems at the University of Texas Health Science Center from 1968 to 1974.

Moore earned a bachelor's of business administration degree in accounting from the University of Texas in 1972 and a master's of business administration from the University of Nebraska in 1983.

William Sutton

William Sutton, 54, came to the University Aug. 1 to assume the position of vice president for educational and student services. He succeeds Chester E. Peters, who retired June 30 from his position as vice president for student affairs.

Before coming to K-State, Sutton served four years as provost and academic vice president at Chicago State University, an urban institution with an enrollment of 7,400.

Sutton's new responsibilities include the supervision of departments providing educational and student support services. Academic services include student financial assistance, new student programs, undergraduate admissions, career planning and placement and the counseling center, among others.

Student support services include student health, student government, housing, greek affairs and others. Sutton will report activities of educational units to the provost and activities of student support services to the president.

Sutton has been charged with the responsibility of reorganizing the structure of educational and student support departments under his direction. These departments were identified by a University task force in a report last February.

Sutton said the University must place more emphasis on efforts to recruit and retain students.

Sutton has a bachelor's degree in science from Dillard University, New Orleans, and master's and doctoral degrees in zoology from Howard University, Washington, D.C.

George Miller

Miller, 51, added to his workload by accepting responsibility for the functions administered by Gene Cross, former vice president for University Facilities. Cross accepted a post as vice president of facilities at Columbia University in New York City.

Miller serves as fiscal adviser to the president, contracting officer for the University and supervisor of the Controller's Office. Miller also monitors the operation of University Computing Activities — including the Data Processing Center — Office of Personnel Services, Budget Office and Office of Employee Relations.

Miller has assumed responsibility for construction and maintenance work falling under the jurisdiction of University facilities. He took on the additional duties following an administrative reorganization implemented by President Duane Acker in July.

Miller has been in charge of administration and finance for the University since May 1984. From 1970-79, Miller served as vice president of administration at Eastern Illinois University, Charleston, Ill.

Miller received his bachelor's degree in business education in 1961, master's degree in information systems in 1963 and doctoral degree in information systems in 1969, all from the University of Maryland, College Park.

Charles Beckom

Charles A. Beckom, 42, is the University's first superintendent of police. His position as head of the KSU Police Department was created in June after the University reorganized the department.

Before the reorganization, the department was headed by a director with a captain of police beneath him. The change in organization eliminated the director's post and substituted the captain's title with that of superintendent, Beckom said.

Beckom was the department's acting director and Art Stone's successor after Stone resigned in January.

The future of the department will include attempts to computerize, to increase the number of students working as building security officers and to publish a newsletter of crime prevention tips and department announcements, Beckom said.

The newsletter will be part of Beckom's goal toward preventing crime instead of relying on after-the-fact enforcement. The McGruff crime-fighting dog seen on television in public service announcements has already been used and has been well received, Beckom said.

Beckom began in the department as a patrol officer in 1970, working his way up to captain in 1983.

His education and professional training include FBI and Secret Service courses with 500 hours of other specialized training and a 1976 associate degree in administration of justice from Wichita State University.

Duane DaPron

Duane DaPron plans to put the University back on the map in Big Eight competition.

DaPron, 28, took over as head of the Office of Sports Information, within the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, in May. His main goal is to put K-State on the map by increasing the publicity of intercollegiate sporting events.

DaPron replaces Mike Scott, who now works for Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. in Topeka.

DaPron received his bachelor's and master's degrees in communications in 1979 and 1980 from Fort Hays State University. He was a student assistant in the sports information department at Fort Hays State from 1975-1980.

DaPron became assistant sports information director at Citadel, a military liberal arts college in Charleston, S.C., in 1980. In 1982, he became sports information director.

His position at the University is "a go-between between the media and the sports department," he said. "We handle publicizing the University, programs, media guides, statistics and background data for all the teams. We also work closely with the coaches.

A native Kansan, DaPron said he is familiar with the Kansas media and knows where to send information to publicize the athletic program.

"The background I've attained...has really provided me with the background and knowlege I need to best promote the athletic department," he said. "Communication is the key. I believe athletics is a window to the University."

Richard Diehl

Since becoming McCain Auditorium's director, Richard Diehl has initiated a plan to increase the number of season ticket holders. The combination of a strong McCain line up and enhanced ticket promotion may push sales 100 percent above one year ago.

Diehl, 34, from Louisville, Ky., served more than a year as acting director of McCain before being named to the post June 6, to replace Doreen Bauman who accepted a position as general manager of the East County Performing Arts Center in El Cajon, Calif., in September 1984.

Season ticket sales will probably peak at 900 tickets by the end of this season, Diehl said. McCain attracted 600 season ticket holders for the 1984-85 schedule.

In addition to boosting ticket sales, Diehl said he hopes to promote McCain as a site for cultural events in a nine-county, 50-mile radius of Manhattan.

Prior to coming to K-State in the summer of 1984, Diehl was general manager and program coordinator for the Showboat Majestic, a floating theater, and an instructor at the University of Cincinnati for nine years.

Diehl holds a bachelor's degree in drama from Eastern Kentucky University. He also received a master's and master's of fine arts with special emphasis in directing and theater management from the University of Cincinnati.

John Evans

A University alumnus became head of the Department of Military Science within the College of Arts and Sciences on May 17 when Lt. John Evans, 38, replaced Lt. Col. Don McCann.

McCann received orders to serve at an ammunition depot in Rock Island, Ill. Being transferred is nothing new to personnel in the Department of Military Science because the government transfers them every three years to serve at different posts.

Evans graduated in 1976 with a bachelor's degree in business management and in 1983 received a master's degree in management from the Florida Institute of Technology. He has served 19 years in the Army, having "numerous command and staff positions in stateside and overseas units."

He has traveled to Japan, Germany and Vietnam during his Army career. He was transferred to K-State, his first university position, from Fort Hood, Texas.

"My job is to recruit, train, retrain and commission quality second lieutenants," Evans said.

"We have an excellent quality of people coming out of the University, and I would like to maintain the quality here while broadening the horizons of interest for more quality men and women to join the program," he said.

"I spent a great deal of time working with junior students, so I know what the Army expects from them," Evans said. "The military offers a viable career."

William Feyerharm

Direction of an accelerated program of academic student assistance has been the objective of William Feyerharm, since his appointment as associate dean in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Until accepting the post Aug. 26, Feyerharm, 50, served as assistant provost of the University. Feyerharm said his charge is to attract top academic achievers and concentrate on recruitment and retention activities.

"I'm working with the other deans in the college on academic review," Feyerharm said. "This is when we talk to the students, faculty and everyone in the department about the problems and strengths" of the college.

The review is one way he intends to identify students struggling in their classes. Once identified, students will be given counseling by members of the academic assistant center.

The Congressional Service Medal winner was assistant dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences at the Univerisity of Illinois in Champaigne from 1970-76. From 1976-79 he served as associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Montana, Missoula, before coming to K-State.

Feyerharm received his bachelor's degree at Carlton College, Minn., in 1957, attended the University of Michigan Law School for one year and received master's and doctorate degrees at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis. He completed requirements for a doctorate in 1971.

Jerry Gillespie

Increasing the productivity in animal health and research is one of the goals for Jerry Gillespie, head of the Department of Surgery and Medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Gillespie, 48, who came to the University this spring, will strive to maintain the school's strong veterinary teaching program. He replaced James Coffman, now dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"We anticipate developing areas of excellence in food, animal and environmental toxicology" and establishing a working relationship with other veterinary institutions in the United States, he said.

Gillespie said the primary reason he accepted a position at the University was because the structure of the college allows faculty to incorporate ideas in veterinary medicine instruction. His duties include coordinating the teaching and research aspects of the college and veterinary hospital. He also teaches respiratory medicine.

Gillespie received his bachelor's degree in veterinary medicine in 1957 from the University of Nebraska, Lincoln, and his doctorate of veterinary medicine from Oklahoma State University Veterinary College, Stillwater, in 1961.

He entered private practice in 1961, and following graduation from the doctoral program at Oklahoma State in 1965, he began teaching clinical veterinary medicine and veterinary physiology at the University of California, Davis.

Joseph Graf

Administering activities in the Department of Geology, within the College of Arts and Sciences, is Joseph L. Graf, associate professor of geology. Graf, 38, replaced James R. Underwood Jr. as department head on Aug. 18.

Before joining the faculty as an assistant professor in 1980, Graf worked for Oremco in New York City on exploration for mineral deposits in Brazil.

He received his bachelor's degree from Columbia University in 1968, and his doctoral degree from Yale in 1975.

Graf said he wants to aid faculty research and continue the department's good relationship with its alumni, as well as serve the students.

"I want to work toward developing our course offerings so we can offer the best courses to majors and non-majors," he said. "Another of the goals I have is to enhance the reputation of the department outside and inside the University, especially in the geological community."

Mark Johnson

The new head of the Department of Agricultural Economics is a native Kansan who grew up on a fruit farm in Segwick County.

Mark Johnson said his experience on the farm, as well as his background in the areas of agriculture marketing and transportation will be an asset to his career at the University.

He replaced Milton Manuel, who is retiring, as head of the department on March 18.

Johnson, 37, received his bachelor's degree in biology from Emporia State University in 1970 and his master's degree in technology of international development in 1971. He finished his education at Michigan State University earning a master's degree in economics in 1973 and a doctorate in agricultural economics in 1975.

Johnson was an assistant and associate professor at Oklahoma State University from 1974-1978. He then joined the staff of North Carolina State University as a professor in the department of economics and business until 1985. Johnson held the position of associate department head of extension economics from 1983-1985.

Johnson's position requires the "administration of undergraduate and graduate teaching, research, extension and international programs for the Department of Agricultural Economics," he said.

Ron Jones

Ron Jones, 38, associate dean and assistant director of Extension Home Economics in the College of Home Economics. He was named to the position when Extension Home Economics was transfered to the College of Home Economics in August.

Jones has been a member of the Home Economics Extension staff for two years.

"This move has made it easier to take out to the citizens of Kansas all the extension information," Jones said. "We have 18 specialists on campus, five in the surrounding area and over 120 home economists in the delivery system that covers the state."

One of Jones' goals is to strengthen the link between the consumers of the extension department's resources, the people transfering the information to these individuals and the professionals conducting research. For example, Jones said the extension department can provide informational assistance to farmers.

"We want to help in the rural crisis," he said. "The extension department can help them deal with the stress and pressures of the transition."

Jones was an extension specialist at Iowa State University in Ames from 1977-83. In 1972, he received a bachelor's degree in sociology from Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, a master's degree in family counseling from Utah State University in 1973 and a doctorate in education from the University of Saraota in Florida in 1977.

Al Keithley

Al Keithley, head of the Department of Regional and Community Planning in the College of Architecture and Design, said he is a "homebred" product of K-State and the U.S. Navy — which comes out in his educational and professional experience.

Keithley, 44, received one bachelor's and two master's degrees from K-State from 1965-73, taking time off between the bachelor's and master's studies for a stint in the Navy as a staff planning officer for the Naval Facilities Engineering Command in Boston from 1968-69. He was also an assistant operations officer in Seoul, South Korea from 1969-70.

Kiethley was an instructor at the University in the College of Architecture and Design from 1970-73; from 1973-79, Keithley was an assistant professor for the Department of Regional and Community Planning. From 1979 until he became the department head, he was an associate professor in the department.

The job is the result of departmental changes which will decentralize the work load and spread administrative responsibility and work among the tenured faculty, he said.

Keithley replaced Vernon Deines, the head of planning for 18 years. In two to four years, Keithley will be replaced by another faculty member, he said.

Faculty members decided to rotate the department head duties as part of the reorganization. Rather than hiring someone from outside the University, Keithley said, the department's faculty opted to move to a "participatory structure."

Ronald Hess

Ronald Hess, new head of the Department of Architecture within the College of Architecture and Design, plans to initiate changes in the department through his personality and style as an administrator.

Hess, 49, said he tends to be a facilitator and an organizer rather than a departmental dictator.

He describes himself as a native Midwesterner because he has degrees and has held both professional and academic jobs in Nebraska, Iowa, Oklahoma and Kansas.

Hess replaced Eugene Kremer, who is still teaching within the department, in June.

He began his administrative career in 1961 at Iowa State University, and gained experience working as an interim dean at the University of Oklahoma and as the administrator for research and restoration projects undertaken by the Oklahoma Historical Society and the Oklahoma Energy Commission.

Architecture is an "urban profession" according to Hess.

In a smaller city like Manhattan, he said, it is easy to lose contact with the professional architectural community. Keeping in touch with that community will be one of his goals.

Hess said he would try to maintain the department's strong reputation in academic and professional circles, which he accredited to the faculty and students.

Richard Hoag

After seeking a new department head for two years, the Department of Pre-Design Professions in the College of Architecture and Design, found Richard Hoag.

Hoag, 39, was named to head the department July 1. He succeeds James Jones, who was appointed for the two-year interim between the previous head's departure and Hoag's arrival. Jones has returned to his teaching post in the Department of Architecture.

As department head Hoag is responsible for curriculum planning and evaluating and supervising faculty. Hoag described his department as "interdisciplinary," because it brings all of the architectural students in the college together during their freshman and sophomore years. Only students that have not been admitted into a specific emphasis of study in the college are assigned to the pre-design profession department.

Two changes have been made

toward Hoag's goal of improving advising and student retention within the department.

The first brought to an end the practice of randomly assigning advisers to students. Individuals must share at least one class with their adviser, Hoag said. The second change provides a "backup" adviser for students if their assigned adviser is unavailable.

Hoag received bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Washington, Seattle, in 1971 and 1977. Hoag is a doctoral candidate for a communications degree from the University of Illinois, Urbana.

Don Holand

Don Holand, new director for the Office of Student Personnel Services in the College of Education, hopes to administer a program to provide extensive academic advising, particularly for freshmen.

Holand, whose age was unavailable, replaced Margaret Bloomquist, who retired in January.

Holand came to the University in May, after being a career counselor at Chadron State College in Chadron, Neb., for three years.

His job at the University includes overseeing academic advisement, enhancing current programs in student advisement, developing and implementing an effective undergraduate recruiting program and other duties for the College of Education.

"We (the office) want early warning about students who are having trouble at mid-semester," Holand said. "We want to assist the students and follow the students' progress more closely than in the past."

One of Holand's main goals is to increase student retention. He said another goal is to create more contacts with community colleges to determine what credits transfer to the University.

Another goal of Holand's is to help students in preparation for pre-certification tests and pre-professional skills exams.

Holand earned bachelor's degree in education in 1967 and a master's degree in counseling and guidance in 1973, both at the University of North Dakota, Grand Forks.

Bill Liddell

Specializing programs and majors in the Department of Management in the College of Business Administration, are two ideas department head Bill Liddell is carving into reality.

Liddell, 43, replaced acting head C. Clyde Jones who filled the position when former department head Robert Paul stepped down to teach.

Liddell plans to emphasize the rejuvenation of student business-oriented groups and to contact businesses which might enhance placement, consulting and research for students in business administration.

After serving four years at the Brock Institute in Canada as the Chairman of Management Groups, Liddell said he was ready to come back to a major American University.

"I came back because I like the idea of the University being a total University — involving both the student and the state. Along with that, I'd like to establish a real outreach to clients," Liddell said.

Minor additions to the curriculum, such as human resource management and information system management are on his agenda. He also favors shifting the learning process out of the classroom and encourages interaction between individuals in the department and community.

Liddell majored in economics at Western Michigan University at Kalamazoo, earned a master's from Wayne State University in Detroit and a doctorate from Pennsylvania State University in University Park.

John McCulloh

Promoting group spirit within the Department of History in the College of Arts and Sciences is the goal of John McCulloh, new department head.

McCulloh 41, was appointed head of the department in August 1984 to replace Joseph M. Hawes, but was on leave until August 1985. Hawes left the University to become head of the Department of History at Memphis State University.

McCulloh was named department head two days before he was to leave for Munich, West Germany, where he conducted research at a German historical institute. Burton Kaufman, professor of history, served as acting department head from 1984-85.

McCulloh, said he hopes the department will adapt to meet the demands of the changing University student, and wants to attract more students to the department.

"I want to emphasize the recruitment of new students by the University and by the College of Arts and Sciences, as well as through the department of history," he said. "I would like to promote a little bit of group spirit" within the department.

McCulloh received his bachelor's degree from the University of Kansas in 1965, his master's degree from the University of California at Berkeley in 1966, as well as his doctoral degree in 1971.

McCulloh joined K-State in 1973 as an assistant professor, and was appointed associate professor in 1976.

Virginia Moxley

Virginia Moxley, associate dean for academic affairs in the College of Home Economics, is eager to get the faculty involved in the college through academic planning.

Moxley, 39, replaced Elnora Huyck July 18, who retired after 12 years in the department. Moxley is responsible for curriculum management and student services, including honors programs, alumni relations, clubs and honor societies.

"I work with the departments in helping to make curricular changes and (assisting in) the academic planning of the college," she said.

Moxley also advises students, but wants to teach in the near future. She would likely concentrate her teaching efforts in the area of family and marriage enrichment.

Her primary objective, like many other administrators and department heads, is to recruit quality students into the college, she said, and to strengthen the honors program.

Moxley completed her bachelor's, master's and doctorate degrees at K-State; finishing the doctorate in 1977.

Before returning to K-State, Moxley was chairperson of the Division of Sociology, Family Sciences and Anthropology at Emporia State University.

"I'm really delighted to be back and feel very fortunate," she said. "Not many people get the chance to return to their alma mater."

George Milliken

A long-term goal of George A. Milliken, 42, new head of the Department of Statistics in the College of Arts and Sciences, is to see the department become more involved in the recruitment of new students by introducing high school and graduate students to the program.

Milliken replaces Arthur Dayton, now working in private industry, first as acting department head from Feb. 1 to July 1. He became department head July 1.

Milliken attended Colorado State University where he received his bachelor's degree in 1965, master's degree in 1968 and doctorate in 1969.

"Other than the general responsibilities that any other department head has, we have a statistical laboratory which is a consulting unit of the Agricultural Experiment Station," he said. "We help them analyze their data and develop experiments.

"We would like to continue to stress excellence in teaching and extend the graduate and undergraduate programs in statistics," Milliken said. "We want to put together a program to talk to high school, and two-year and four-year college students. We recruit for the graduate school, too."

A long-term goal of Milliken's is to reduce class sizes to half the current levels, although he is not certain when a plan can be implemented.

John Murray

The new head of the Department of Family and Child Development accepted a position at K-State because he wants to make the job of conducting practical-application research a high priority of the department.

John Murray, 42, said he believes the department has an obligation to transfer balanced research findings to the public so decisions are based on accurate information — not speculation.

Murray has been working at his post since Aug. 5. He replaces Judy Rollings who is now dean of the College of Home Economics at East Carolina University, in Greensville, N.C. Murray's main goal includes working with home economics extension.

"I want to capitalize on the good fortune of merging the extension area with this department," Murray said. "We want to be cooperative with extension.

Prior to coming to K-State, he worked at Boys Town Center for the Study of Youth Development, Boys Town, Neb., to study the impact of the media on children and the juvenile justice system. He concentrates on administrative work for the department, which is in the College of Home Economics, but also teaches a course on family violence.

Murray received his bachelor's degree from John Carroll University and master's and doctoral degrees at the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., in developmental and clinical psychology.

Louis Pigno

High standards of scholarship are one of the goals Louis Pigno, head of the department of mathematics within the College of Arts and Sciences, plans to implement this year.

Pigno, 46, replaced R. Richard Summerhill, associate professor of mathematics, in August, when Summerhill stepped down to devote time to teaching.

Pigno received his bachelor's degree from the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn in 1961, his master's degree from the University of Connecticut in 1965 and his doctoral degree from State University of New York at Stony Brook in 1967.

He joined the University in 1969 as an assistant professor and was appointed professor in 1978.

Pigno said "Dedicated teaching and University and community service" are goals he wants to promote.

Bert Pulaski

A new senior business and finance officer for the agricultural experiment station has been on campus since early June.

Bert Pulaski, 50, was chosen to succeed Gil Dodge, who died Dec. 16, 1984.

One of Pulaski's goals is to enhance the existing use of computers in the College of Agriculture in financial record keeping.

Pulaski held a similar position at Michigan State University, although the position was broader in scope.

"At Michigan State I also dealt with extension, but here I deal more directly with the dean than I did there," he said.

His responsibilities include handling all financial matters for the College of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment station such as salaries, purchases and nearly 700 accounts totaling about $35 million.

Pulaski said his duties also include interpreting the University's spending and budgeting guidelines for all appropriated dollars including gifts and grants from the private and business sector, as well as federal and state funding.

Pulaski received a bachelor's of science degree in management from Michigan State University, East Lansing, in 1977, and is working on a master's degree in public administration from Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo.

Walter Woods

Students in the College of Agriculture have a new dean to become acquainted with this fall.

Dean Walter Woods, 53, former head of the Purdue University Department of Animal Sciences, succeeds John O. Dunbar, who retired June 30.

Woods, who arrived on campus July 22, brings more than 20 years of experience in teaching, research and organizing animal science programs to K-State.

In addition to his work as dean, Woods will serve as director of the Agricultural Experiment Station and head of the Cooperative Extension Service.

President Duane Acker said Woods' task is to aid Kansas agriculture by designing the most efficient use of the University's agricultural teaching, research and extension services.

Woods received his bachelor's of science degree in agriculture from Murray State University in Kentucky in 1954. He received his master's degree from the University of Kentucky in 1955 and his doctorate from Oklahoma State University in 1957. Both advanced degrees are in animal nutrition.

Woods comes to K-State from western Virginia, but has a strong Midwest agriculture background.

Before becoming the department head at Purdue, he taught at the University of Nebraska, Iowa State University a Oklahoma State University.

Fund-raising efforts begin

Club will sing at Harvard

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Men's Glee Club has accepted an invitation to perform at the Intercollegiate Musical Council convention March 13-15, 1986 at Harvard University.

"It's a tremendous opportunity for the men of K-State to be able to travel to Harvard and listen to seven other extremely good glee clubs from the eastern United States and Japan," said Gerald Polich, associate professor of music and director of the men's glee club.

Members of the glee club are primarily responsible for helping raise enough money to make the trip. Glee club members are raising funds through activities such as plane washes at Manhattan Airport and a K-State music run in which members will collect pledges for the number of laps they can run around a track in one hour.

"The goal of the trip is two-fold — first to bring recognition to the K-State campus and second to allow the members of the glee club to expand their horizons in terms of travel," said Bert Frost, senior in marketing and president of the glee club.

The K-State Men's Glee Club will travel to Washington, D.C., Boston and New York where members will have the chance to sing for K-State alumni.

Other IMC member choruses accepting invitations are the University of California Schubertians, Amherst College Glee Club, University of Wisconsin Eau-Clair Men's Glee Club, the University of Michigan Glee Club, Harvard University Glee Club and special guest the Kwansei Gakuin Glee Club of Japan.

Coach of cattle judging team offers smiles, bits of wisdom

By GISELE McMINIMY
Collegian Reporter

A warm smile, direct eye contact and a hearty hello to people he passes on campus are characteristic of Charles Norton, professor of animal sciences and industry.

"I sometimes get annoyed at people who aren't very friendly," Norton said. "I believe an agreeable person is more likely to enjoy life and be successful."

Norton, a dairy science specialist and coach of the dairy cattle judging team, shares bits of wisdom with his students and team members.

"One thing I do is present my classes with two thoughts for the day. One is somewhat humorous, and one is thought-provoking," Norton said.

Two examples of his large collection of thoughts are Kit Carson's "Cowards never started and the weak died on the way" and Swartz's maxim "Live every day as your last and someday you'll be right."

Judging team members, in addition to his students, also get a dose of Norton's views on life. Norton said he believes he has more responsibility to the team than just coaching.

"When a guy leaves Kansas State University, he ought to have a little polish. And when he doesn't, it's up to me to see he's aware of what's expected of him," Norton said.

Norton advises people to broaden their interests.

"You've got to broaden yourself, because as a person you ought to be aware of your environment. You ought to enjoy the trees and whatever the campus has to offer," Norton said. "People who are at home in their environment are better adjusted people and get more out of life.

Norton, often called "Doc" by his team members, stresses the importance of individuals doing their personal best. "If you're going to do something, get in there and do it the very best way you can," he said.

While growing up in Neponset, Ill., Norton tried to do his best in school, 4-H and Future Farmers of America. He earned the American Farmer Degree, a top-level achievement award in FFA.

After receiving a master's degree from the University of Illinois, Norton said he "decided going to school wasn't that bad" and continued his education at Cornell University.

Norton served an assistantship at Cornell for four years and later worked as an assistant professor of dairy sciences. He eventually became head of the dairy department at Oklahoma State University. He served in this capacity for eight years before coming to K-State in November 1958.

At K-State, Norton served as head of the dairy and poultry departments until the separate departments were consolidated into the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

Norton said he entered the dairy science field by chance. The assistantship that Norton wanted at Cornell was the swine assistantship. But a good friend of his had applied and received that one. So when Cornell offered Norton an assistantship in dairy, he decided to accept it.

"I'm never sorry it happened. But if it hadn't been for Jake, chances are my career would have been entirely different. Jake and I are still good friends," Norton said.

Once he retires Norton plans to spend more time reading in libraries. However, he's not ready for retirement yet.

"I could retire. I'm over 65, but I have about four months off during the year," Norton said. "I jokingly refer to my nine-month appointment as a way of oozing into retirement."

Violence hampers cease-fire efforts

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — New fighting broke out at Beirut's Bourj el-Barajneh refugee camp Tuesday despite the efforts of Syrian-led teams to enforce a cease-fire at the shell-battered shantytown.

It was the sixth day of battles between the camp's Palestinian defenders and Shiite Moslem militiamen who say they are trying to gain control of the camp to drive the Palestinian Liberation Organization from Beirut.

Syria has been trying to end Lebanon's civil war but has been wary of direct involvement by Syrian troops in Beirut's street fighting. But it did send Syrian officers to head observer teams to monitor a cease-fire.

It was not clear what triggered Tuesday's renewed shooting.

The fighting around the camp, which started a week ago was unfinished business for both sides. The Shiites and the Palestinians fought each other last May and June in five weeks of battles in which 600 people were killed and 2,500 wounded.

The latest bout of fighting has, by police count, killed at least 53 and wounded 250. Lebanese security officials said at least 60 Palestinian wounded, some critically, are lying in basements in the camp waiting to be moved to hospitals.

The Syrian-backed Amal, supported by the Lebanese Army's 6th Brigade and its tanks, assaulted Bourj el-Barajneh and the nearby Sabra and Chatilla camps in May to smash Arafat's efforts to rebuild the power base he lost in Israel's 1982 invasion.

Syria, once Arafat's ally, turned against him and backed a rebel faction within the PLO.

It's a deal that has no equal, for a calculator that has no equal.
Our new HP-41 Advantage software module packs 12K of ROM. One and a half times the capacity of any other HP-41 module. Large enough to hold the most popular engineering, mathematical and financial programs ever written for the HP-41.
You get comprehensive advanced matrix math functions, roots of equations and polynomials, integrations, base conversion and logic functions, and time value of money functions.
Our new module is also sub-programmable. So you can quickly access just a portion of a program, or transfer that section to your own program.
And it's even menu-driven. That eliminates overlays and reduces the number of prompts.
In short, you get everything it's going to take to help you make the grade in everything from Linear Algebra to Physics to Electronics to Statics and Dynamics.
The HP-41 is a deal all its own. Its operating system is so advanced, it doesn't need an "equals" key. Little wonder it's preferred by more engineers than any other calculator.
This is a limited time offer. Call (800) FOR-HPPC. Ask for Dept. 658B. We'll instantly give you the name of a dealer who has no equal.
Do it now. The phone call is free.
But our new module won't be for long.

Army actively recruits college students

Declining enrollment causes concern

By College Press Service

WASHINGTON — Worried about slipping enrollment figures and the declining high school population, the Department of Defense now is trolling the nation's two-year colleges for students to join the understaffed volunteer Army.

It's one of the few times in American history that the Army actively has recruited college students.

Part of a plan to promote the Army as a career choice to community and technical college students starts this month at 10 two-year schools in the Washington, D.C., area with help from the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges, said Sue Friedman, an association spokesperson.

With a $98,160, 12-month Pentagon contract, the association will help recruiters decide how to lure community college students into military careers by knitting the students' needs and interests with Army opportunities.

Project JOIN uses a portable microcomputer, developed about six years ago, to show potential recruits filmed previews of Army jobs and benefits. Recruiters hope to increase military enlistment by installing the computers at two-year colleges.

Last spring the Pentagon and the junior college association collaborated on Project HIGRAD to recruit junior college students by trading college credits, scholarships and other education benefits for $1,200 "contributions."

The new recruitment push — Project JOIN — reflects "some concern in the military about the declining youth population aged 16 to 19 years," said Paul Gade, spokesperson for the Army Research Institute.

"(The Army) saw the potential market in two-year schools as an extension of the traditional high school recruiting market," he said. "There are still the same people interested in pursuing the military for more education and advanced placement.

"We felt it was worth exploring," Gade said. "No one had attempted to recruit in (two-year schools) before."

"There would be no way to staff the Army by 1999 with high school graduates," Friedman said. "Associate of Arts degree holders also have more education and know-how than high school grads."

Project JOIN promotes the Army as "just another employer" recruiting from community colleges "that should prepare people for work," said Arthur Cohen of the Center for the Study of Community Colleges.

Near the end of the month community college association researchers will help the Army choose the first 10 schools for the program by analyzing school population demographics in Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania, Friedland said.

If the program is a success, Gade expects the defense department to expand the program beyond initial research and make it a department-wide program.

"But I don't see the military becoming highly restricted in screening recruits," Gade said.

Film's drollness due to oddball characters

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

After the success of "Gregory's Girl" and "Local Hero," enough interest was created in Bill Forsyth's work that his first film, "That Sinking Feeling," — previously unavailable in America — has been released.

Film Review

"That Sinking Feeling" is an incredibly droll little comedy filmed on a shoestring budget — just over $200,000. It tells the tale of a group of young men who decide that the way to the fortune of their dreams is in stealing a truckload full of stainless steel sinks. They are an oddball group who scrape by from day to day with no visible means of support and few chances for changing that situation.

Ronnie, their leader, is in love with cornflakes and the theft is his brainchild. The whole plan hits him in a flash when he sees a kitchen sink on sale in a shop window. So he pulls together his band of misfits and together they pull off the "Great Sink Robbery."

The biggest difference between this film and "Local Hero" is that the people in this Scottish town ("a fictitious town called Glasgow" Forsyth's advertising reads) have no foil to work against as they did in "Local Hero."

That movie gave the audience an American who was reacting with a deadpan, blank stare to all the odd goings-on surrounding him. "That Sinking Feeling" only gives the odd characters. There isn't a character that invites participation from the audience the same way that Peter Riegert did in "Local Hero." And as a result, the comedy becomes so droll that it hardly exists at all.

There is a nice bit early in the film when Ronnie and a couple of his friends are sitting in a car. It appears that the car is parked at the side of the road, but when Ronnie gets out the audience sees that the car has no tires and is sitting in an empty field. At times like that, Forsyth is able to surprise the audience, but at other times he only supplies what was telegraphed far in advance.

There is some good comedy when a tall, goonish young man named Vic becomes altogether too much interested in women's clothing. His part in the robbery is to dress in drag and divert the night guard. But the guard is more attracted to Vic's buddy, also dressed in drag, than he is in Vic. Vic gets jealous.

Spacecraft begins 'high risk' mission

Satellite nears rendezvous with comet

By The Associated Press

GREENBELT, Md. — A drum-shaped satellite, only five feet high but carrying antennas the length of a football field, was racing at more than 46,000 miles an hour Tuesday toward the first rendezvous of a man-made object with a comet.

"We are so close to what we aimed for, it's pitiful," Jim Elliott, a spokesman for NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center in this Washington, D.C., suburb, said in mock complaint.

When the two space travelers cross paths midway between Earth and the sun at 8:02 a.m. today, American scientists will have stolen some of the glory from their Soviet counterparts who have two spacecraft en route to probe Halley's Comet next year.

The U.S. satellite, sent into space in 1978 to study the "solar wind" — hot, charged gases that flow from the sun — was diverted in 1983 toward today's encounter with the comet Giacobini-Zinner.

The United States decided not to spend the money for a more ambitious mission to the more glamorous Halley's Comet, which will be visible in March.

The Soviets, the Japanese and the European Space Agency all are sending probes.

The sun-study satellite, renamed ICE for International Cometary Explorer, had already outlived its three-year design life and sampled the solar wind in front of Earth as well as behind it.

It cost $20 million originally, and its new job is budgeted for less than $3 million.

"This is the third mission for this spacecraft," said Robert Farquhar, flight director for the mission. "It has already fulfilled two missions and has performed them very well. It has already been bought and paid for a couple of times now, so that justifies us taking this high risk."

The risk is that the micron-sized grains of dust in the comet tail might damage or obscure the satellite's solar cells, robbing it of power needed to get the data to Earth. The satellite has no dust shield.

Scientists at Goddard will know within minutes whether the ICE comes through its celestial meeting intact, but results will take a long time to analyze.

ICE has traveled more than 1 billion miles since its launching. If it survives the Giacobini-Zinner contact, it will take readings from afar on Halley's Comet next year and possibly be retrieved and brought back to Earth in the year 2012 — on Aug. 2.

The spacecraft is targeted to pass 4,900 miles behind the comet's nucleus, which is hidden by a gas cloud that grows larger as the comet gets nearer to the sun.

Originally, plans were to traverse the tail 6,000 miles behind the nucleus, but the comet's orbit has shifted slightly and Giacobini-Zinner was flying rather erratically — "burping" gas that affected its path.

Dr. Robert Taussig, associate professor of surgery and medicine, examines Sterling, an African Grey parrot, who is suffering from a poor diet and an injured leg, at the Veterinary Medicine Clinic.

Clinic treats rare species

Methods similar to humans'

By LESLIE STOKES
Collegian Reporter

Nearly every animal found in a pet shop has been treated at the Kansas State Veterinary Clinic. Most people know the clinic treats dogs and cats, but the staff also treats tropical birds.

The clinic staff has seen between 15 and 20 species of birds including parrots, macaws, cockatoos, myna birds and finches, said Robert Taussig, associate professor of surgery and medicine.

Many of these birds contract diseases similar to human ailments such as cancer, pneumonia, broken bones and psychological problems.

"The drugs used on birds are similar to drugs used on humans," Taussig said. Penicillin and certain antibiotics are used for treatment and vaporizers can be used for respiratory problems. X-rays and blood tests are used for diagnosis.

The cost of treatment varies according to the breed of bird and the type of disease being treated. A normal office call is $10. If surgery is needed, the cost can range from $5 to $100.

Birds have a natural ability to fake or hide a disease, Taussig said. Doctors are presently looking for a method to detect when a bird is faking a disease.

Usually, a bird has a good survival rate if treated in the proper manner. Some suggested precautions for bird owners are:

— Don't allow birds in air conditioning currents.

— Keep aerosols away from the bird, especially Pam® .

— Remember each variety of bird has its peculiarities. It is important to consult an aviculturalist — a person who raises birds professsionally for sale — or a veterinarian upon purchase of the bird.

"Many of the diseases tropical birds get involve diet," Taussig said. The birds come from jungle countries where they are able to eat a balance of vegetation and insects.

When the birds are captured and brought to America, they don't always receive a balanced diet. The birds are given a mixture of seed and they pick out what they like.

"Most of the birds love sunflower seeds. Unfortunately, these seeds are very high in fat content," Taussig said. "If the tropical birds eat too many sunflower seeds, they get fat and die young." Improper feeding is the chief cause of disease and death in pet birds, Taussig said.

When asked if he had any odd experiences with birds, Taussig said, "They are all odd."

One incident involved an African Grey Parrot whose mate had died. The parrot began plucking its feathers out and despite all medical efforts, the behavior continued. Finally, doctors introduced the parrot to a dove and it fell in love. The feather-plucking ceased. Who said birds of a feather flock together?

Taussig told the story of a man who bought a $200 parrot, only to have it die a few weeks later. He bought another bird and it also died. When a third bird died, the veterinarians finally found the problem. The man kept the bird in the kitchen and used Pam® . Pam® is poisonous to birds.

For those who love pets and aren't allowed to keep dogs or cats in apartments or dorms, a bird may make a nice pet.

Birds do require attention and companionship, but a bird can become one of the best friends a person could have. A bird would certainly add a "chipper note" to the day.

Rural couple kidnapped, sheriff says

By The Associated Press

LYONS — Three people, including a fugitive on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted List, who kidnapped a Kansas Highway Patrol trooper last month also kidnapped a rural Sterling couple the same day and forced them to drive 60 miles in search of another vehicle, authorities revealed Tuesday.

"We've known about this since Thursday. We decided we had better explain the situation so people in the area can rest a little easier, and so they will know that the mysterious disappearance of the three is no longer so mysterious," said Rice County Sheriff Dale Higgins.

The unidentified couple was interviewed as other families in their area had been, but they never revealed any information until officers approached them with their suspicions, Higgins said.

"It was a matter of us finally piecing together enough informaton to go and ask," the sheriff said. "I really can't say that I blame them too much. They have been very frightened of retribution if they came forward.

Fear of retribution results in cover-up

"They tell me they have remained fearful ever since this occurred, and they have been bothered so much by it they have been unable to sleep."

Two men and a woman kidnapped Sgt. Dan Gifford on Aug. 24 after he stopped their mobile home along Interstate 70 in central Kansas to warn them a piece of baggage was about to fall off a luggage rack atop the vehicle.

One of the men was identified as Lohman Ray Mays Jr., 42, who escaped from a prison at Only, Tenn., on July 1, 1984, where he was serving a life sentence as a hibitual criminal. He has a criminal record that includes murder, armed robbery, aggravated assault, receiving stolen property, firearms violations and wounding a police officer.

The FBI listed him on its most wanted list after he was thought to have committed up to three robberies since his escape.

The woman was identified as his girlfriend, Patricia Anne Barrett, 28. The third person is as yet unidentified, although Higgins said the couple helped authorities create a better composite picture.

Gifford was taken to a farm house near Wilson, Kan., where he was bound along with three members of the family living there. They managed to untie themselves and the officer; no one was hurt.

The three suspects then stole the farm family's car and later hid it under a haystack at an abandoned farm in the Sterling area about 40 miles from the Wilson farm, authorities said.

Higgins said the couple by chance drove up to the abandoned farm that afternoon about 4:30.

"They drove up unaware, and the three came right out of the house, before they knew it or could do anything," Higgins said. The kidnappers discussed "taking down a trooper" and the couple, unaware of the kidnapping, assumed they had killed an officer somewhere.

"They definitely were in fear of their lives, and about three times they thought they had had it," Higgins said.

However, the hostages were "treated very well," Higgins said.

Once it was dark, the five left for Wichita, about 60 miles southeast, along back roads. The kidnappers located a Dodge pickup in Wichita, then left the couple bound in the car about five miles west of Wichita.

One of the two men said he would drop the keys to the couple's car on the road several yards ahead, where they could be easliy found. They left the couple with a watch and one of their rifles "for their trouble," the sheriff said.

The couple freed themselves in about five minutes.

The sheriff said the kidnappers drove around Wichita before finding a Dodge van, which they stole and presumably left Kansas in.

"We were skeptical that they would still be in the area or maybe tried to walk out and we really started having our doubts when there were no reports of stolen vehicles in the area. It just doesn't happen in a situation like this," Higgins said.

Town puts tombstone on teen-ager's grave site

By The Associated Press

POPE, Miss. — A marble tombstone is all that this small town can do now for Paula Houston, a 14-year-old honor student whose death has embroiled the state in controversy over its response to child abuse cases.

"The tombstone she's going to have will be the nicest one out there," said Sandra Martindale, who helped raise nearly $500 for the monument which will be placed on the grave Thursday.

"We're not looking for a star in our crowns, but we're proud we did it," Martindale said. "We don't want a big to-do about it."

The ninth-grader's nude body was found June 3 in a dump near her home — two days before she was to receive top honors in English, science and history at her junior high graduation.

The body was found hours after her mother, Judy Houston, 37, had reported her missing.

Houston was charged with murder and later indicted by a county grand jury for capital murder.

An autopsy determined the child had been strangled with a belt, and Panola County Sheriff David Bryan said at the time of the arrest, "This looks like a long history of child abuse. There were prior beatings of this child."

Although Bryan said in June that she had confessed, Houston has pleaded innocent. She remains in jail in nearby Oxford, being held without bond, and is scheduled for trial Dec. 2.

The death outraged many of the 200 residents of this northwestern Mississippi community. School authorities said they made five reports to the Panola County Welfare Department over nine years that the girl was being abused.

Carlock Broome, principal of Pope School, and Martha Lynn Johnson, the girl's guidance counselor for five years, said Paula sometimes showed up with bruises and other ailments.

Rose goes hitless; record put on hold

By The Associated Press

CINCINNATI — Pete Rose came up empty Tuesday in his first attempt to break the tie with Ty Cobb, going 0-for-4 and postponing his date with destiny for at least one night.

Rose tied Cobb's lifetime mark of 4,191 hits last Sunday in Chicago, going 2-for-5. He did not play in the opener of a 10-game homestand Monday night against San Diego because the Padres threw a left-hander, Dave Dravecky.

But, on Tuesday night, before a packed house at Riverfront Stadium, Rose took his place in the lineup at first base for the Cincinati Reds against Padres right-hander LaMarr Hoyt, against whom he had an 0-for-2 lifetime mark.

The Reds player-manager popped out to shortstop twice and lined out to left field twice. It was the fifth time in his past nine games Rose has gone without a hit, and he is now hitless in his last six at-bats.

Rose came to bat against Hoyt in the first inning, greeted by a standing ovation and illuminated by the thousands of flashbulbs popping in the stands. When the count went to 3-1, the crowd booed Hoyt, but Rose popped up the next pitch behind second base to Padres shortstop Garry Templeton.

Rose came up again against Hoyt as the leadoff hitter in the fourth inning. He stepped into the batter's box to the cheers of the crowd, but on the first pitch, he hit a soft liner to Padres left fielder Carmelo Martinez, and he was 0-for-2.

Leading off the sixth inning against Hoyt, Rose went hitless for a third at-bat, hitting a blooper toward shallow left that Templeton drifted back on and handled without trouble. The count was 2-1.

For a fleeting moment, it had a chance to drop for The Hit, but Martinez ran in and to his left, making a relatively easy catch on the ball as it hung up long enough for him to reach it on the run.

After the out, Padres right fielder Tony Gwynn was caught in a swirl of confetti and toilet paper, dumped onto the field by apparently disgusted fans who had paid their money only to see Rose come up empty.

The only chance Rose had left in the game was if the Reds could have forced extra innings. But Rich Gossage retired the side in order in the ninth inning, and the Padres won 3-2.

Another right-hander, Eric Show, will start for the Padres Wednesday, giving Rose his next chance to break Cobb's 57-year-old record.

Right hand pitcher Rocky Ferguson, a transfer student from a junior college in Ohio, is one of the new promising recruits from junior colleges for K-State this season. According to Coach Vaught, with the help of the recruits and the returning players, the team should be a contender for the title.

Baseball recruits please 'Cats' Vaught

By BUTCH LACY
Collegian Reporter

K-State head baseball coach Gary Vaught isn't afraid to say he thinks this year's team will be a top contender in the Big Eight.

"I think we'll finish in the top three," Vaught said confidently Monday night. "I know I'll get criticism for saying this, but that is my true feeling and I invite people to come out and see us play."

Vaught's optimism stems from 16 new players — 14 of them junior college transfers — whom he signed to help the 'Cats continue their upward march in the conference.

"I've coached for 12 years, and this will be the best ball club I've coached when you look at the individuals. We're faster, stronger, have more pitching depth, and we're going to hit the ball a little farther than before," he said.

The 'Cats placed fourth in the Big Eight this past spring in Vaught's first year at K-State. Last year's spot in the standings was the first time K-State has finished in the upper division since 1977.

Vaught said the reason this year's recruiting has been successful is because he has received a lot of help from the administration and players.

"The athlete today is a lot smarter. It helps when (Athletic Director) Larry Travis comes out and says he supports baseball," Vaught said.

"The kids already here were a big help in recruiting, too."

With the large recruiting class this fall, Vaught said the team has increased its depth to where injuries won't be a problem.

"This year we're stronger at every position, and I'm excited about the season," he said. "Last year, if we lost someone (to an injury), we had to scramble."

Vaught emphasized that the players brought in this fall will help strengthen positions that were weak last year.

"We're expecting great things from all of them (recruits), and we feel like we can challenge anyone in the Big Eight," he said.

The first task for the baseball team, though, is tackling the fall schedule of junior college teams. Big Eight games will wait until the spring season.

One recruit expected to see immediate action this fall is pitcher Rocky Ferguson. Ferguson, who pitched at a college in Ohio last year, was a first-team All-American pick. He compiled a 15-0 mark with a 1.10 earned run average and 141 strikeouts.

Another recruit high on Vaught's list is Jeff Turtle, a catcher from Connors (Okla.) Junior College who last year batted .500 with 33 home runs and finished second in the nation with 127 RBIs.

"He had 17 major schools after him. He is a tremendous catcher," Vaught said.

Mets, Cards avoid brawl

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The St. Louis Cardinals and the New York Mets, battling for first place in the National League East, engaged in a bench-clearing incident during the first inning of Tuesday night's game after George Foster was hit by a pitch from St. Louis' Danny Cox.

Foster, known for taking his time getting into the batter's box, had stepped out several times before facing Cox with runners on first and second. When Foster finally settled in, he was hit in the hip by Cox's first pitch.

Foster walked slowly toward first base, carrying his bat with him. He and Cox began exchanging words as St. Louis infielders and the four umpires converged on the center of the diamond.

Foster then pointed at Cox with his bat and Cox moved toward Foster. At that point, both benches and

Berra says Madlock, Stargell provided drugs

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — New York Yankees infielder Dale Berra testified Tuesday that former team captains Bill Madlock and Willie Stargell provided him with amphetamines while all three played for the Pittsburgh Pirates and that the "uppers" were commonly used by Pirate players.

Berra, a prosecution witness in the drug distribution trial of former Philadelphia Phillies caterer Curtis Strong, said he saw nothing wrong with using the stimulant because veteran players used them.

The son of Hall of Famer and former Yankees Manager Yogi Berra on Monday testified that he and four of his former Pirates teammates — Dave Parker, Lee Lacy, Rod Scurry and John Milner — used cocaine at various times.

San Francisco Giants outfielder Jeff Leonard followed Berra to the witness stand and testified he twice purchased cocaine from Strong in 1982, once in a Pittsburgh hotel and once in an Atlanta hotel.

Leonard said former Giants teammates Al Holland and Chili Davis were both present when he purchased $100 worth of cocaine from Strong. He said he entered a drug rehabilitation center in Orange County, Calif., later that year and has not used cocaine or alcohol since.

"I went in because of the concern from others ... a deterioration of skills," Leonard said. "I was lagging in attention to my family and I was heading downhill."

Leonard also said he used cocaine with former Astros teammates Enos Cabell and J.R. Richard. Cabell also has testified he shared cocaine with Leonard and Richard.

Berra, who played for Pittsburgh from 1977 to 1984, said he learned during the Pirates' 1979 world championship season that Madlock and Stargell were sources of the pills, which generally produce feelings of high energy and alertness.

"I heard that if (I) asked them for one that I could get one, but I didn't ask for any and they never gave me one," said Berra. The infielder later testified that Stargell and Madlock provided him with "greenies" on an unspecified number of occasions after he began playing fulltime for the Pirates in 1980.

Berra did not name any other Pirates players as users of the stimulant whose purchase by law require a prescription. He also said he doesn't believe amphetamine use is now as prevalent in the major leagues as it once was.

Stargell, now the Pirates first base coach, said at Three Rivers Stadium that he was "surprised" by Berra's accusation.

"It's not true. That's about all I can say about it," he said.

Bill Madlock, in Atlanta where the Dodgers were facing the Braves, first refused to respond to Berra's testimony, saying, "I don't have anything to say about anything like that."

However he added, "A lot of those guys up there are trying to get some people mentioned to take the monkey off their back."

Pirates Manager Chuck Tanner denied any knowledge of Pirates distributing stimulants to other players.

Strong's attorney, Adam O. Renfroe Jr., asked Berra if Madlock and Stargell were ever prosecuted for distributing the pills, and U.S. Attorney J. Alan Johnson immediately stood and said, "The investigation continues."

U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond immediately told the jury to disregard the statement.

On Monday, Berra said Stargell was among those gathered for a meal in a Philadelphia hotel suite in 1982 where Berra first met Strong. Berra said he bought cocaine from the defendant in an adjoining bedroom that day but the Yankees player said Stargell was not in the bedroom when the sale took place.

Royals beat Angels; Leibrandt gets win

By The Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Frank White and Lonnie Smith hit two-run homers to back the three-hit pitching of Charlie Leibrandt Tuesday night as the Kansas City Royals blanked California 6-0 to extend their lead over the Angels in the American League West to 1½ games.

Leibrandt, 15-7, walked two and struck out four in hurling his eighth complete game and third shutout of the season. Leibrandt never faced more than four batters in any inning and the Angels did not get a batter past second base.

The Royals went ahead to stay in the first inning off losing pitcher Kirk McCaskill, 9-11, on a two-out single by George Brett and a run-scoring double by Hal McRae. The hit was the 2,000th of McRae's big-league career. He became the 155th player to accomplish that feat.

Brett started a three-run fourth inning with a one-out single and McRae followed with another run-scoring double, this one to left-center. White then slugged an 0-1 pitch over the left-field fence for his 19th homer.

The Royals completed the scoring in the top of the fifth on Smith's fifth home run, a two-out shot which followed a walk to Omar Moreno.

Smith's blow knocked out McCaskill, who suffered his fourth straight loss.

The teams play the third and final game of their series Wednesday night.

'Cats plan two games under lights

By The Collegian Staff

With the addition of new stadium lights this summer at Frank Meyers Field, night games have become a reality for the K-State baseball team.

"In the spring we've got close to 21 dates to use the lights," said Gary Vaught, the Wildcats' head baseball coach.

This fall only two games out of 20 have been scheduled under the lights.

"We can't use the lights a lot in the fall," Vaught said, "because it costs a little to use them."

Vaught said he hopes the lights draw the students' attention and entice students to the games.

"The lights are mainly going to help for promotion," he said.

Another advantage of having lights, Vaught said, is to enable people with classes or jobs during the day to attend the games in the evening.

"We will use those lights a lot; they're a real plus for us," Vaught said. "Everything in our park is going real well for us."

Local podiatrist says shoe industry decreases quality of running shoes

By MIKE ROBBINS
Collegian Reporter

The athletic shoe industry has grown dramatically in recent years. With the choice of available shoes on the market, buying athletic shoes should be a selective process, said Joseph Svoboda, a Manhattan podiatrist and podiatric consultant to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Svoboda spoke at a Wellness Week seminar Tuesday in the Union.

"Basically what the shoe companies are out for is a buck," Svoboda said. "Since running is so popular, companies are coming out with a new shoe every month. When this happens, quality control goes down the tubes."

Svoboda said the complexity of the shoe industry is a contributing factor in keeping bad shoes on the market.

"The complex shoe industry is making it difficult to weed out the good shoes from the bad," he said. He offered several basic tips for checking out good running shoes.

The first tip is to take the shoes out of the box to see if they sit perpendicular to the ground. This indicates good stability.

Secondly, Svoboda said to look at the bottom construction of the shoe. It is important to identify what type of tread the shoe has before purchasing it.

"For running, a person will want a tread that has plenty of shock absorption," he said.

A "tire-tread" pattern is best for absorbing shock, but people who play racquetball or tennis should not wear this type of shoe because of the shoe's lack of stability, Svoboda said. The tennis shoe, which usually has a "herringbone" tread, does not have much absorption but is ideal for tennis or racqetball use.

Svoboda said a third important tip is to observe carefully the construction of the shoe.

"Feel where the seams are in a shoe," he said. "Seams usually cause blisters on the heel or on the top of the foot which keep people from running."

Svoboda said a person should be able to tell if a shoe's construction will last by observing the seams.

The material inside a shoe is also important, Svoboda said. The buyer should check the inside of the shoe to determine if the material is comfortable to their foot. Sometimes the material inside the shoe will cause an irritating friction for the runner, even if the runner is wearing socks, he said.

The amount of flex in the front of the shoe is also important, Svoboda said. Lack of flexibility could cause great discomforts, such as ingrown toenails and blisters.

"Until you run in new shoes, it is hard to tell if they are going to be comfortable. I suggest, when you buy new shoes, that you break them in gradually. Wear them around the house before you take them out on a run," Svoboda said.

By following these shoe-buying tips, Svoboda said runners will be more confident in their shoe purchase and, as a result, will get more use out of the shoes.

Rifle teams place 7th, 9th in open meet

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Rifle Club placed two teams in the top 10 in the nation at the Open International Rifle Championships last spring, club members learned Monday.

The contest was completed in March, but results were not issued to the competitors until late last week.

The "KSU Purple" team finished seventh out of 152 teams. The team scored 4,318 out of a possible 4,800 points. Team members were sophomore Michael Woodson, junior Gordon Sandercox and seniors Alan Arwine and Andrew Dikman.

The "KSU White" team finished ninth with a score of 4,049. Team members were Tim Putnam, Stephanie Bowersock, Doug Torok and Jerry Judy, all juniors.

Intensity motivates Rose to excel

By The Associated Press

CINCINNATI — Intensity. To those who know him, it may be the single most appropriate word to describe Pete Rose.

And what is the single most amazing thing about him?

"It's the fact that he can maintain that intensity," says longtime teammate Johnny Bench, former Cincinnati Reds catcher.

"You can talk about the intellectual side and the physical side," Bench says, "but in order to do what he's done, you really have to want it."

Rose admitted that he was approaching an even higher level of intensity.

"I'll be sky high," Rose said of his record-breaking attempt. "I'll be about 6-foot-6, I'll be that high off the turf," the 5-11 Rose said.

One hit away from breaking Ty Cobb's all-time record of 4,191 hits, Rose went 0-4 Tuesday night to prolong the suspense at least one more day.

Rose tied Cobb's 57-year-old record with two hits in the final game of a six-game road trip in Chicago. Both hits were singles. His last extra-base hit was a two-run homer off Derek Botelho at Wrigley Field, his second of the season and hit No. 4,188 of his career.

Mesa (Ariz.) College; shortstop Pat Stivers, who batted .400 with 14 home runs at Pratt Community College; and Mike Hinkle, who recorded a 10-4 pitching record and hit .470 to earn second-team All-American honors as an outfielder, also highlight the recruiting class.

"Mike Hamacher is a tremendous athlete; Pat Stivers has the best hands on any kid I've ever seen; and Mike Hinkle is going to help us out a lot," Vaught said.

Vaught also said he realizes that adding quality players like the new recruits will make it tough to determine who will land a starting position on the team.

"Second base is going to be a dogfight to see who gets to play. We have four men at that position who are very capable," he said. "My feeling is that just because you have your position one year doesn't mean you'll have it again. The best competition you can have is intrateam competition."

Earning a position without any politics involved, Vaught said, is all any player can ask for.

"Coming off the practice field, knowing you are the best, will give the players the greatest feeling in the world," Vaught said.

Oklahoma falls out of No. 1 spot

By The Associated Press

Oklahoma Coach Barry Switzer wasn't surprised that the Sooners lost their No. 1 ranking in The Associated Press poll Tuesday.

"It's kind of what I anticipated," he told the AP.

"We got all the publicity in the preseason," said Switzer, whose Sooners were No. 1 in the preseason and first regular-season polls, "but we don't play our first game until Sept. 28 and I knew people would forget about us."

While Oklahoma slipped from No. 1 to No. 2, Auburn jumped from No. 2 to No. 1, just two points ahead of the Sooners, by routing Southwestern Louisiana 49-7 behind Bo Jackson's 290 yards rushing and four touchdowns.

"It's nice to be No. 1, but I really don't want to talk about it now. I'll talk about it in January," said Auburn Coach Pat Dye.

"I'm more concerned with facing the No. 1 defense in the nation this weekend." That's Southern Mississippi, which allowed only 138 yards in blanking Louisiana Tech 28-0.

Auburn received 16 first-place votes to Oklahoma's 28 from a nationwide panel of 60 sports writers and sportscasters. But the Tigers, who totaled 1,118 of a possible 1,200 points, received 25 second-place votes and were not rated lower than seventh on any ballot while two voters placed Oklahoma in the Second Ten, nullifying the Sooners' edge in first-place votes. Oklahoma received 1,116 points.

There was considerable shuffling from last week's rankings but the only team to drop out of the Top Twenty was No. 12 Washington, which lost to Oklahoma State 31-17. The Huskies were replaced by Alabama, which made the Top 20 for the first time since the second week of the 1984 season.

Florida, a 35-23 winner over Miami, jumped from fifth to third with three first-place votes and 974 points. The Gators replaced Southern Methodist, which had problems before defeating Texas-El Paso 35-23 and slipped to sixth.

Southern Cal rose from sixth to fourth with six first-place ballots and 970 points on the strength of a 20-10 triumph over Illinois, which had been No. 11 but fell to 19th. Iowa, which has not yet played a game, slipped from fourth to fifth with five first-place votes and 911 points. Sixth-place SMU received the other two first-place ballots and 908 points.

Florida State vaulted from 17th to seventh with 755 points by upsetting No. 10 Nebraska 17-13 and Oklahoma State went from 16th to eighth with 741 points by trouncing Washington.

Ohio State, which gets under way this weekend, remained in ninth place with 686 points while UCLA shot from 20th to 10th with 612 points by beating BYU and dropping the Cougars from eighth to 16th. Maryland, which had been No. 7, lost to Penn State 20-18 and skidded to 17th. The victory boosted moved the Nittany Lions from 19th to 11th.

Rounding out the Second Ten are LSU, Notre Dame, Arkansas, South Carolina, BYU, Maryland, Nebraska, Illinois and Alabama.

Last week's Second Ten consisted of Illinois, Washington, LSU, Notre Dame, Arkansas, Oklahoma State, Florida State, South Carolina, Penn State and UCLA.

Jaworski replaced by Eagles' Cunningham

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Rookie quarterback Randall Cunningham, chosen as a surprise remedy for an ailing Philadelphia Eagles offense, said Tuesday he looked forward to his first professional start Sunday against the Los Angeles Rams.

"I'm young, but I've got a lot of confidence in myself. It's a great opportunity for me," said Cunningham, 22, the replacement for veteran Ron Jaworski. "I'm a winner. I want to win. I won't settle for less."

A battered Jaworski was benched Monday in favor of the scrambling Cunningham by Coach Marion Campbell. In a 21-0 loss to the New York Giants, Jaworski completed 12 of 25 passes for 137 yards and was sacked eight times for losses of 73 yards. The Eagles never got past the Giants' 37-yard line.

The 6-foot-5, 195-pound Cunningham, a three-year starter at Nevada-Las Vegas, where he passed for more than 8,000 yards, was a second-round draft pick and the first quarterback chosen in the National Football League draft. He replaces Jaworksi, who had started 116 straight games for the Eagles before he broke his leg with three games remaining last season.

Cunningham admitted that Jaworksi was the more accomplished quarterback, but the rookie said his mobility in dodging a pass rush prompted the change.

"I didn't win the job from him. It's just a decision that was made," said Cunningham. "I'm not a better quarterback than he is. He's got a great arm. He's got a brain that never quits."

Faculty Senate passes curriculum changes

By the Collegian Staff

Faculty Senate approved course and curriculum changes for the College of Business Administration and the College of Engineering in its meeting Tuesday in the Union Big Eight room.

Included in these changes are the proposed new bachelor of science degree in computer engineering and courses approved by the Graduate Council.

"These curriculum course changes are mainly changes in course descriptions," said Albert Davis, associate professor of family and child development and Academic Affairs Committee chairman.

Davis said the committee would also be reviewing the non-traditional studies program.

"We'll be looking into the academic procedures referring to this," Davis said.

Faculty Senate also heard a report concerning the subcommittees under the Faculty Affairs Committee from Stuart Swartz, professor of civil engineering and committee chairman.

The committee studies subjects including: election procedures; faculty conflicts of interest; faculty evaluation review procedures; legislative visitation program; implementation of the policy dealing with sexual harassment in the classroom; problems of temporary faculty; improvements in the handling of grades for graduating seniors; faculty funeral leave policy; and procedures for appointing and re-

Swartz also brought to senate's attention that classes are scheduled to be in session on Veterans Day, a legal holiday. Swartz said he was concerned K-State might be the "laughingstock" among Board of Regents' schools if it held classes.

"It is not good for our image," Swartz said.

Museum displays 50 years of cartoons

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Ssshh. Be ve-wy, ve-wy quiet. You're in the Museum of Modern Art — and it's wabbit season.

There they all are, cheek to fuzzy jowl on the museum's walls — Picasso, Van Gogh, Degas, Yosemite Sam, Foghorn Leghorn, Daffy, Speedy, Tweety, Elmer and...Bugs Bunny.

It's the 50th anniversary of Warner Bros. Looney Tunes and Merrie Melodies cartoons, which combined the bite of adult satire with childlike sight gags and belly laughs as none before or since.

The museum is paying homage to these cartoons, recognizing them as the art works that they truly are, in a special exhibit titled "That's NOT All, Folks!"

On hand for the show's opening Tuesday were Friz Freleng, 79, and Chuck Jones, 73 — names any Bugs buff instantly recognizes as longtime animators of the whole stable of Warner Bros. characters. Freleng, in addition, created the Pink Panther after Warner closed its internal animation department in 1963. Both are doing only occasional cartooning these days.

Their favorite? No surprise.

"We both favor Bugs Bunny," said Jones. "He's the kind of character I'd like to be. Bugs became a sort of male Dorothy Parker, always quick with the one-liner."

The exhibit includes early sketches from the 1930s, when Freleng, Jones and the other underpaid, wisecracking animators toiled unobtrusively in what they dubbed "termite terrace," a back-alley building on the old Warner movie lot.

The museum exhibit shows the cartoons in their formative stages, from pencil drafts to vivid color.

There are sketches of rarely seen oldies from the World War II days when Bugs and Daffy worked shifts with Rosie the Riveter or shot down German planes.

And there's a color sketch of perhaps the greatest cartoon of all, "One Froggy Evening," a tale of what happens to a man who believes he has found his pot of gold in a frog who sings "Hello, My Baby" — but only when the mood strikes him.

In the golden era of cartooning from the 1930s through '50s, Freleng recalled, six-minute cartoons cost about $10,000 to make. Today cartoons made with the same time, care and skill would cost about $1,000 a second — about $360,000. That pricetag, along with the demise of the movie double feature and short subject explains why they don't make them like that anymore.

But a cartoon fanatic cannot live by art exhibits alone. The museum will run uncut, uncensored Warner Bros. cartoons Saturdays and Sundays through Jan. 26.

And Looney Tunes remain a Saturday morning television fixture as they have for the last 25 years — only this year they've switched from CBS to ABC.

As an added bonus for museumgoers, Jones spent last weekend doodling his characters all over the museum's walls in magic marker.

UFM seminar will highlight latchkey children's problems

By The Collegian Staff

In an effort to draw community attention to the problems of latchkey children, Southwestern Bell Telephone and the University for Man are sponsoring a seminar.

Latchkey children are children home alone before and after school while both parents are working.

The seminar, scheduled for Thursday at 7 p.m. in Koller Hall of the First Christian Church, 115 Courthouse Plaza, is being conducted to address the problems of latchkey children from the point of view of both the child and parent, said Julie Coates, campus programs director for UFM.

Donna Jackson, development director for the Kansas Committee for the Prevention of Child Abuse, is scheduled to be the main speaker for the seminar.

Coates said a film, "Lord of the Locks," will be shown to teach parents and children alike on how to deal with children being left alone.

Those interested in attending should contact Coates at 532-5866.

College-course pressures create students' stress

By College Press Service

Students entering school this fall will encounter stresses they've never dealt with before, and will probably endure regular "academic calendar of stress" periods before they finish college, a new University of Utah study reveals.

"Students are away from home, many for the first time, and dealing with pressures and resonsiblities they've never had before," said study co-author Neal Whitman, a researcher with the university's Department of Family Planning.

At the same time, though, students experience less serious stress because they have greater control over their lives than their non-student peers in the real world, according to the summary study of more than 150 major stress reports.

"Stress is directly related to how much control you have over your life," Whitman said, "and let's face it, a college student has a lot of control. Going to cllege itself is a matter of coice. You control your use of time, decide what classes to take and how to study."

Still, college has plenty of pressures and stresses, many of which affect students at certain times and places in their educations.

Last spring a Michigan State University study reported that students — like their counterparts with full-time jobs — often become frustrated, apathetic and burned out.

Law and medical student, with more intense schedules and greater focus on jobs, tend to feel more pressures than liberal arts majors, the Utah study said.

A recent Louisiana State Universtity study showed that medical school often proves "hazardous to the health of many students" who are unable to handle the stresses and pressures that come with the degree.

"The job market is the most significant trigger of stress for students," Whitman said. "particularly for exiting and professional students. And we have also found that there is an 'academic' calendar of stress' that typically applies to students during college."

Such stressful periods include "arrival and moving into dorms, midsemester and midterm blues, Thanksgiving and Christmas vacations, the winter doldrums and spring fever," the study shows.

More than 300 die as 2 passenger trains collide in Portugal

By The Associated Press

VISEU, Portugal — An express train loaded with immigrant workers bound for France slammed head on into a domestic passenger train Wednesday, killing an estimated 300 people, a deputy fire chief said.

Prime Minister Mario Soares, who flew by helicopter to the crash site near this town in central Portugal, said the accident was the worst in the history of the country's railway system.

"People were being burnt alive, shouting, jumping from the carriages and succumbing at the train windows," said Duarte Santos Correia, 37, one of the passengers who survived.

Both trains were traveling on the same track in opposite directions, railway officials said, and the eastbound international slammed head on into the westbound local.

The officials told ANOP, the domestic news agency, that the seven-coach international train was going from Oporto on the Atlantic Coast to Hendaye, France. It was behind schedule and did not wait for the Coimbra-bound train to move onto a side track, said the officials, speaking anonymously.

Firefighters and witnesses said cars in the two trains tipped over and burst into flames, setting ablaze a pine forest along the tracks.

It was not known how many people were on the two trains, and no firm figure on the number of casualties was available.

Delfim Azevedo, deputy fire brigade chief from nearby Mangualde in Nelas state, told ANOP that most of the 300 people believed dead had been riding in the three front cars of the international train and the two lead cars of the regional train.

"Eighty percent of the passengers in the three front carriages must have died," ANOP quoted Azevedo as saying.

President Antonio Ramalho Eanes was reported also on his way to the crash site, and the defense ministry placed army units on alert to help with rescue operations.

Climbers search for ark at Mt. Ararat

By COLLEEN WILSON
Staff Writer

For centuries, the validity of Noah's Ark has been questioned by historians and many explorers but Brian Fisher, junior in geography, is a strong believer that the ark does exist on Mt. Ararat in Dogubayazit, Turkey.

On Aug. 10, the Salina native and 23 explorers set out to climb Mt. Ararat in search of the ark, which some believe — although it has never been proven there was even a flood — was deposited on the mountain after flood waters receded.

Although the group didn't actually get to climb the 16,690- foot mountain as planned because armed terrorists would not allow anyone near the area, they were able to climb the nearby Kapchek Mountains. Fisher said from there they saw a "boat-shaped object" on the side of Mt. Ararat around the 5,000-foot elevation point.

"We were about 15 miles away, but we could see the mountain (Mt. Ararat)," Fisher said. "It does look like a boat. It has a stern like a boat and it looks like it's about 450 feet long (the ark's length as defined in the Bible). It corresponds very closely to the ark as described in the Bible."

Fisher said the boat-shaped object appeared to be sliding down the mountain in a mud-slide.

The explorers were unsure if the object was the ark, Fisher said. There is historical confusion as to whether another ark, commissioned in 300 A.D. by Constantine, emperor of Rome, may be located in the same area.

"We don't know if it (Constantine's ark) was even built for sure," he said. "We only know it was commissioned. Even if it is Constantine's ark, it's still a significant discovery."

Fisher said if it is Noah's ark, he thinks it should be left where it is because it would be "monumentally impossible" to bring it down the mountain.

Fisher has always been interested in Noah's Ark, but his interest in searching for it began when he met former astronaut Jim Irwin, leader of the expedition, at a Full Gospel Businessmen's function in Salina in December 1982. After his visit with

Kansas to see growth in people, job market

From Staff and Wire Reports

A Manhattan Chamber of Commerce official and a Washington-based demographics expert agree that Kansas may gain close to 1 million people and 545,000 new jobs within 25 years.

Martin K. Holdrich, a senior economist with the Washington-based Woods and Poole Economics Inc., made the predictions in a presentation Tuesday designed to give the state Board of Education background for long-term policy decisions.

"We expect Kansas to be the fastest growing state among the Plains States," Holdrich said as he told the board the state's population should surge from an estimated 2.5 million in 1985 to 3.4 million in 2005.

Woods and Poole based its predictions on historical and economic information for all counties in the United States dating back to 1967, according to a Department of Education statement.

"We're trying to measure the health of the state's economy," Holdrich said. "This is what would happen without any external shocks."

He said an "external shock" would be a major industry moving from the state, the addition of large manufacturing plants or the opening or closing of a military base.

Holdrich said the state should gain 64,000 manufacturing jobs, 13,000 positions in agriculture-related industries and 1,800 jobs in mining and the petroleum industry within 25 years. He said the projections were mostly based on historical growth of those industries in Kansas.

Following a national trend, the so-called service sector of the economy should gain 172,000 jobs, with the largest increases coming in health service and repair service areas, Holdrich said.

Other industries that should see increases in employment are govern-

Kansans seek education funding,

Board proposes sales tax increase

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Board of Education seemed to inch closer Wednesday to recommending that the 1986 Legislature vote a tax increase to provide more money for public schools.

The board's legislative committee included in its proposals a recommendation the '86 Legislature consider raising additional revenue from taxes to provide funding for education.

Two board members told a news conference after the board concluded its monthly meeting they believe the board may formally recommend a tax increase to the Legislature.

"It depends on what people say to their legislators," said Theodore Von Fange, a retired educator from Lindsborg who has served on the state board the past 2½ years.

If the education community can drum up public support for increased funding, Von Fange said, the state board might endorse a tax increase as it did a year ago when it backed Gov. John Carlin's recommendation for a sales tax increase. However, the Legislature rejected the proposal.

Another board member, Mick Stevens of Wichita, said he believes the Legislature should creat a state lottery. Both Von Fange and Stevens said the board doesn't feel it should try to tell the Legislature where to get the money, but feels strongly that more money is needed for education than it appears is going to be available.

The state board's tentative recommendations to the Legislature would require $96 million in new funding — including $73 million to provide teachers with 7.5 percent pay raises.

Filibuster remains despite opposing vote

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Republican-controlled Senate on Wednesday refused for the second time to end a filibuster blocking legislation that would slap tougher economic sanctions against white-ruled South Africa than President Reagan has imposed.

The Democratic-led assault on the filibuster failed on a dramatic roll call of 57-41 — three votes shy of the 60 needed — with GOP leaders lobbying to get their way in the well of the Senate while several black House members looked on from the rear of the chamber.

Republicans said they would seek to postpone a final vote on the measure for several months, until the impact of Reagan's sanctions can be gauged in racially segregated South Africa. Democrats vowed to continue their fight for the bill, and another vote was likely on today. Reagan says he will veto the bill if it passes.

"This is no longer an issue of what's good for South Africa. It's a raw political issue," said Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole of Kansas in an appeal for GOP senators to close ranks.

He pledged to seek a final vote on the measure "if there's any slippage, if there's any turning back" by Reagan, who abandoned his longtime opposition to sanctions Monday.

But Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the vote that Democrats would succeed in winning a vote on the measure by the end of the year, and aides said an attempt might be made to attach it to another piece of legislation if today's vote falls short.

Forty-six Democrats and 11 Republicans voted to choke off the filibuster. Senate Minority Leader Robert Byrd of West Virginia was the only Democrat voting on the other side, and an aide said he did so to permit him to demand a reconsideration of the roll call. That reconsideration was tabled, and thus killed, on a 50-48 vote.

Chance to glimpse comet sparks amateurs' interests

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

Americans last saw Halley's comet in 1910. Now, 75 years later, amateur astronomers are catching the first glimpses of the astronomical phenomenon.

Ted Geisert, laboratory educational technologist in the Department of Physics, has been tracking Halley's comet and has spotted it twice in the past two weeks.

The first time was Aug. 27 and the second on Tuesday. Geisert has kept track of the movement of the comet with a telescope he built.

Geisert's telescope is the third largest in the state. The Kansas City Astronomers Organization and the University of Kansas are first and second respectively.

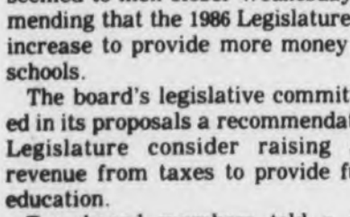
Major astronomers began tracking the comet in 1982 when it was located close to Saturn and could be seen with advanced telescopes. Visual sightings on the amateur level began this year, the first being Aug. 17.

The comet was named after Edmund Halley, an English astronomer who calculated the comet to appear every 75 years.

Halley's comet travels past Neptune, which is the eighth farthest planet from the sun. Once it reaches that point, the gravity of the sun pulls the comet back, Geisert said.

The comet reaches a maximum speed of 180,000 mph — a speed much faster than a bullet, Geisert said.

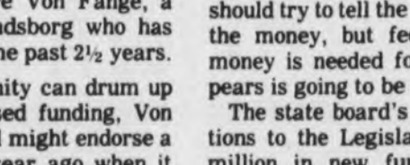
August was the earliest amateur sighting of Halley's and viewers won't have a chance to see it again until mid-November. It was officially rediscovered on Oct. 16, 1982, by professional astronomers.



"About Nov. 16 and 17 the solar system reaches a moonless point," Geisert said. During the new noon, the sky will be dark and viewers will be able to locate the comet just south of the Pleiades, a constellation similar to the Little Dipper.

"The comet will be easy to locate at this point and can probably be viewed with the naked eye," he said.

The point from mid- to late-November is when Halley's comet will make its first close pass to the earth — 60 million miles away. During this time it will be south of the Pleiades for two to three days.



In December, viewers can see the comet in the evening with the aid of binoculars or a telescope, Geisert said.

Turkey launches vaccination plan

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey launched a campaign on Wednesday to vaccinate 5 million children in an effort to bring down the nation's high infant mortality rate.

The mortality rate is 11 percent in Turkey, equal to that of much poorer countries such as Zaire, Liberia and Togo.

A 1985 UNICEF report claims that measles, polio, tetanus, whooping cough, tuberculosis and diphtheria kill an estimated 5 million children a year and leave 5 million others disabled in the world's developing countries.

Health officials said other causes of infant death in Turkey include birth traumas, pneumonia, diarrheal diseases and poor nutrition.

The Turkish program is a pioneering project in an effort to achieve a United Nations goal of providing protection for all the world's children against immunizable killer diseases by 1990.

Chinese mine explosion kills 24

PEKING — A gas explosion in a coal mine last month killed 29 miners and seriously injured 14, the official English-language China Daily reported Wednesday.

It was the second fatal accident in two months at Xinzhuangzi coal mine in Huainan City, Anhui province. Four miners died in an accident there in July, the report said.

Thirty-four people died in accidents at small coal mines across the central China province in the first eight months of the year, the newspaper said.

Fifty-six workers died in a mine accident in the southern province of Guangdong July 12.

Anhui provincial authorities urged all mines to improve safety measures and said they plan to carry out safety examinations.

Grand jury indicts 12 in scam

TOPEKA — U.S. Attorney Benjamin Burgess announced Wednesday that a federal grand jury had returned indictments charging 12 people with 63 counts of mail fraud and one count of conspiracy by operating an alleged pyramid scheme in the operation of Culture Farms Inc.

The indictment alleged that the defendants created Culture Farms Inc., Activator Supply Co. Inc. and other companies and misrepresented the demand for the activator kits but "in truth and fact the only demand for the cultures was the demand created by the defendants for the purpose of inducing investors to purcahse activators."

Among those charged were Terrence Taylor, 39, of Lawrence, Kan., the president of Culture Farms, Inc.

Under a marketing promotion by Culture Farms of Lawrence, Kan., and Activator Supply, of Pahrump, Nev., growers could invest as much as $3,500 in kits to start milk cultures from the Nevada firm. Growers would then ferment dried power from the kits with whole milk in glass jars for one week, dry the mixture and sell the product to Culture Farms.

Former building inspector sues city

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A former Salina building inspector who claims he was forced to resign for no good reason is seeking more than $2 million in damages from the city and city officials.

The suit was filed in U.S. District Court Tuesday on behalf of Ron Tremblay, who seeks at least $500,000 on each of four counts, punitive damages and reinstatement to the job he said he had held for 23 years.

Tremblay, 48, alleged his civil rights were violated, that he was a victim of age discrimination, that he was discharged in retaliation for city problems and that he was treated outrageously.

Tremblay said his resignation was effective Aug. 1.

Salina City Manager Rufus Nye, one of the defendants in the suit, could not be reached for comment on the suit.

Company to aid exploited children

WASHINGTON — Dole Foods said Wednesday it will seek to raise $250,000 to help missing and exploited children through a coupon promotion in major newspapers this month.

For every coupon or refund offer redeemed by customers, the company said, it will contribute 5 cents to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a clearinghouse, hotline and information center financed in part by the Justice Department.

On Sunday, the campaign, expected to reach 43 million households, will feature a message from President Reagan and photographs of four missing children in the coupon insert, as well as posters of missing children for display in supermarkets.

The inserts will contain 136 million coupons, of which 5 million would have to be redeemed to reach $250,000. But Dole vice president John D. Porter said $250,000 will be donated to the center up front.

Cessna may produce jet trainer

WASHINGTON — A Kansas aircraft company on Wednesday submitted cost estimates to the Defense Department on building a "state-of-the-art" jet trainer to replace a $3.5 billion plane program proposed for cancellation.

Russ Meyer, chairman of Cessna Aircraft Co., said the Pentagon had requested the information in considering alternatives to the T-46A being developed by the Fairchild Republic Co. in New York.

A government decision to switch to a trainer made in Kansas would be "extremely significant" for the state economy, according to Meyer, and could boost the company's employment by 400 to 500 in the the city of Wichita, with an additional 300-400 workers in aviation related industries statewide.

The Pentagon has tentatively decided to scrap the $3.5 billion Fairchild Republic trainer program as part of a budget-trimming effort and because of development problems. The plane is to replace the nearly 30-year-old Cessna T-37 trainer.

Charles to visit Texas celebration

AUSTIN, Texas — Britain's Prince Charles will visit Texas early next year to help mark the state's 150th anniversary, officials announced Wednesday.

Gov. Mark White said the heir to the British throne has accepted an invitation to visit Dallas and other Texas cities from Feb. 17 to Feb. 21.

In Dallas, Prince Charles will present the Winston Churchill Award to businessman H. Ross Perot.

"I've known all along that the Texas Sesquicentennial was going to be a celebration fit for a prince," White said.

Loss of life on Titanic avoidable

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The man who led the expedition that found the sunken liner Titanic said today he has "no doubt" the big loss of life could have been averted if another ship, the Californian, had moved to rescue the passengers.

Robert Ballard, chief scientist of the U.S.-French team, said the Californian was "inside of 10 miles, perhaps as close as four miles," when the Titanic began foundering after striking an iceberg on April 14, 1912, and "there is no doubt it could have gone in there and rescued those people."

The captain of the Californian, Stanley Lord, reported he was too far from the doomed liner to help. Another ship, the Carpathia, did steam to the area and helped rescue about 700 of the Titanic's survivors. More than 1,500 perished.

Ballard declined to be specific about his evidence that the Californian, a Leyland liner, was nearer the Titanic than it claimed, except to say that Lord "didn't report his position right."

Traffic board to abolish extra appeals

By BOB SCHEIBLER
Collegian Reporter

Because of the large number of traffic ticket appeals filed during the 1984-85 school year, there is a backlog of 740 appeals, said Carrie Rosencrans, senior in journalism and mass communications and assistant to the Student Governing Association attorney general.

During the past summer an ad hoc committee within the Traffic Appeals Board was created to eliminate the backlog. The committee consisted of Donald Koskelin, senior in management; Jolene Wheeler, senior in marketing; George Heid, senior in agricultural economics; Joe Hermes, junior in computer science; Steve Brown, junior in pre-veterinary medicine and student body president; and Rosencrans.

Because of the large number of appeals and their processing time, action has not be taken on 350 of the original 740 appeals, Rosencrans said.

Part of Rosencrans' duty is to oversee the Traffic Appeals Board and appoint members of the ad hoc committee. She is working to make students more aware of their rights concerning traffic regulations.

"An example is, that if a student's car stalls on campus, if they call the Department of Security and Traffic and tell them that their car has stalled, their name will be placed on a list and they will not be responsible for any traffic tickets that are issued to them within a certain amount of time," Rosencrans said.

Students are responsible for following all of the rules in the security and traffic handbook whether they read the book or not.

"A lot of time people don't realize that they need a permit to park any place on campus, even in a 30-minute parking stall. If a student is parked in a 30-minute and they receive a ticket, they automatically assume that it is because they were in the stall too long," she said.

Rosencrans wrote a new policy for denied appeals during the ad hoc committee's summer session. A new form is sent to the student stating the reason his or her appeal was denied. In the past, if an appeal was denied, the student was not given a reason for the denial. Rosencrans said she believes the new policy is more fair for the students.

The board is unsympathetic to people who file appeals based on their own ignorance in following the rules, Rosencrans said. For example, Rosencrans said there is no reason for a student to back into a parking stall.

By scheduling regular meetings every other week, the board is trying to ensure a large backlog does not occur.

"I wish that people wouldn't appeal a ticket unless they have a legitimate appeal," Rosencrans said. "A lot of the time people appeal just to get an extension on paying the ticket, because they know that the appeal will have to go through the red tape of the system.

Student protest needed on coliseum issue

STEVE SCOTT
Guest Columnist

Last semester, I was involved with a group that came to be known as "Students for the Best Coliseum," a group that devoted many hours in research, documentation, writing and campaigning to show that decisions concerning the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum were not following proven methods of design programming and practice.

We concluded the administration's decisions were resulting in a facility that was somewhat of a white elephant. We were accused of "beating a dead horse," however, for trying to stop the process and get it off track because the momentum pushing to build was too great.

We succeeded in collecting about 2,500 signatures requesting a student referendum to ask the Board of Regents to stop the planning process until formal studies were complete. Although it was during dead week, we fell only 44 votes (out of 2,018) short of passing it.

A lot of people extended sympathy to us, but we did not consider the referendum a failure. In fact, it helped to prove our point that 64.5 percent of the student body that voted believed we were right. But to the powers that be, it was just an expression of opinion and they would proceed as they wished.

To the majority of the people who were on campus last semester, this is just a history lesson. But what is probably not known is what has transpired since then.

First, at the June 28 meeting of the Board of Regents, the final plans for the coliseum were approved, but not as anticipated. Wendell Lady, an architectural engineer, voted against approval and stated concerns about the planning process; Patricia Caruthers and William Roy abstained; and only Frank Becker, Norman Brandeberry, Lawrence Jones and John Montgomery voted yes.

I think the Board of Regents heard our concerns and formed some of their own.

July 8 brought the advertisement for bids on the coliseum, and six weeks later, on Aug. 20, the truth came out. You can't build a 16,000-seat multi-purpose arena for under $14.5 million. In fact, with a low base bid of nearly $18 million, you can't build a 16,000-seat basketball complex and be proud of it.

The base bid is for a basic package without frills. With the extras outlined in the initial program — athletic administrative offices, VIP lounge, coaches suite, extra freestanding bleachers and telescoping bleachers, portable platform and stage curtains, performance lighting, aluminum benches in lieu of wooden benches, flagpoles and concrete entry drives — the low bid totals $18.4 million.

Now the dilemma facing the administration is twofold. 1) Should we cancel the project and admit that $600,000 was spent for design fees on a project that was underfunded and over-designed, or 2) Should we trim a few seats and what niceties might be left and proceed full speed ahead? Remember, last semester, time was of the essence.

If you chose option 2, go directly to Anderson Hall. You are ready to join the upper echelon. However, if you chose option 1, we need your help. Write or call some of the members of the Board of Regents and express your opinion. They have given us their ears, and the fate of the revised coliseum is in their hands as they have to re-approve the project at their Sept. 19 meeting.

Voice your opinion to our student leaders, Student Body President Steve Brown and Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones. They may not represent your opinion, but it might make you feel better knowing that you tried.

Or try voicing your concern to President Duane Acker directly. At the end of the year, he will leave this community, and we will face the task of finishing and maintaining a poorly planned facility with too few funds. How willing do you suppose the alumni will be to pledge support on future projects of a similar nature?

Perhaps you might suggest that since the new facility will seat only 2,000 more fans than Ahearn, we look into renovation of this facility and build a much needed parking garage next door with the left-over funds.

Whatever you do, do not remain silent. Apathy is how we get into these situations, but protest is how we overcome them.

$700,000 student decision

"But that's not fair," exclaimed Alice in Lewis Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland."

"Ah," said the queen, "that's the way things should be, not the way they are."

For all the Alices in this K-State wonderland, now is the time to act, the time for the idealists to try to change the way things are to the way things should be, within limits of course — a $700,000 limit.

Through refinancing of existing student bonds and with the pending purchase of student bonds to finance the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, $700,000 has surfaced as "excess" money. This is student money that students, in conjunction with the Office of Educational Services, can decide how to spend to improve life at K-State.

Mark Jones, senior in management and Student Senate chairman, will be choosing the members of an ad hoc committee which will review proposals on how to best spend the money. Five senators and three non-senators will be chosen. Applications are due Monday in the Student Governing Association office in the Union.

The three non-senators could give livelihood and vitality to an otherwise standard committee by suggesting ideas that the senators have not yet heard.

Judging by the large number of students who applied to be on the committee to assist in the search for the next University president, students are interested in the future of K-State and are willing to give input.

The options for the $700,000 are many: increasing campus security; improving handicapped accessability; funding essentials at Farrell Library; better equipping the campus radio station, KSDB-FM; helping to fund the new child-care cooperative; better protecting student art work; renovating Holton Hall; building a parking garage.... The list could go on and on.

The ad hoc committee will filter the myriad of ideas down to a feasible few. Student input on this committee is essential. Free thinkers, idealists, pragmatists and even realists should apply for this committee.

Deficit quietly expanding

The mind-boggling $1 trillion federal deficit does not evoke the same level of alarm for most people as the more visible economic ills of high inflation and unemployment — but it should.

Consumers are unsure of the impact of large deficits and are confused by the jargon used by economists to define the problem. The basic story, however, is very simple and serious. The federal government spends far more money than it collects in taxes.

This imbalance is bad for the economy because the deficit must be financed either by printing more money, which spurs inflation, or by floating government bonds, which diverts savings away from private investment.

The deficit is also worrisome because it adds to the national debt, which is the accumulation of past federal red ink. Like private debt, the national debt requires interest payments.

These federal interest payments must be financed by present and future American taxpayers. Large and rapidly expanding debt service payments add to pressures on the deficit yet fail to provide any goods or services in return.

There appears to be no action on Capitol Hill that could be construed as a bold attempt to place limits on the federal deficit. Both the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Mangagement and Budget now expect the 1985 deficit to top $200 billion.

Congress, before going home, adopted a budget resolution; now that they have returned it will start passing appropriations and some authorization bills to carry the resolution out.

Some congressional optimists say the economy is improving, but pessimists assert that the modest recession that began in 1984 is still with us.

The prognosis for a balanced budget — a possible solution to the economic nightmare — is not good. Without a reduction in the budget deficits, we will likely experience a decrease in savings and the investment it fuels. Investment is important because it promotes growth by improving productivity, moderating inflation and encouraging business expansion and job creation.

The methods used to determine federal budgets needs revision. The United States must review expenditures on defense, health care, social security, retirement benefits, federal subsidies to agriculture and transportation should be scrutinized and appropriations modified or the deficit will quietly continue to grow.

Respect involves toleration of bad habits

RICH HARRIS
Collegian Columnist

If you can't beat 'em, join 'em.

I have quit smoking, at least for a while. The recidivism rate for smokers is higher than it is for heroin addicts, something like 85 percent, so I may be a little premature in saying I've quit for good. But I am trying, and so far it has been successful.

Smoking has become a social disgrace. It is banned in some public places, discouraged in many more, and those who smoke find themselves the target of fanatics who scream loudly about the dangers of second-hand smoke, a mammoth fallacy discredited by the same agency that suggested it years ago. There is no health danger from second-hand smoke.

What there is is some discomfort and annoyance, the elimination of which, by unfair means, people are trying desperately to justify.

But the fact remains that smoking is no longer socially acceptable. The tobacco industries are finding they must advertise to avoid the avalanche of negative publicity coming down around their ears.

And as smoking becomes increasingly less popular, those who can't or won't kick the habit find they must retreat to little hideaways to sneak their nicotine fixes. The whole smoking issue has led to more persecution of a particular subgroup of society than any issue since race.

There is something to recognize and to fear in this: Those who fight vigorously for civil rights are often the same people who get frantic when their seatmate lights up. The message is this: Civil rights and personal privilege is great, but don't you dare mess around with mine, bucko. Of course, there are exceptions, but by and large, we are embarrassingly self-centered when it comes to questions of our own comfort versus the rights of others.

What does this say for the motives and convictions of these people? To me, it seems detrimental to any kind of social change to see those who profess a social conscience and a desire to see everyone treated fairly hound smokers out of the room as though they were carriers of some horrific plague. Smoking is not the scarlet letter here, folks.

When smoking became a social evil instead of a social grace, it opened up plenty of opportunities for do-gooders and busybodies to jump in and start proselytizing. If there is one thing this world needs, it is a few more people who know how to run our lives better than do we ourselves.

Everyone from the American Cancer Society to the Advertising Council got in on the act, and now we are bombarded with more advertising about the evils of smoking than the evils of drug abuse. The only anti-something group that lobbies harder is the MADD/SADD bunch.

I am not anti-smoking, nor am I anti-tobacco or anti-rights of others to breathe the air they want. What I am is anti-people who want to legislate my morality and my conscience, who want to tell me what is good for me on the basis of what they think is good for themselves, and anti-lobbyists who ignore the issues except for the dollars-and-cents of the matter. And I am as anti-them as I can be.

I do not argue that smoking is a health risk — that is not the issue. The issue at hand is whether it is within your rights as a person to affect the rights of others by your actions.

In other words, is it any more fair to evict smokers because you are bothered by their smoke than it is for smokers to bother you with their smoke? Whose rights take preference?

It is a question I am not equipped to answer. I suggest to you, however, that at the very least, it is unfair to smokers to segregate them from non-smokers simply because they smoke.

Smoking is a bad habit, at least in the eyes of modern society. So is picking one's nose, or belching loudly after a meal. So let's take everyone who burps after they slam a beer and lock them up on one side of the bar, so we don't have to listen to their noises.

What about people who don't bathe as often as we do? Let's have a smelling and non-smelling section in restaurants and on aircraft. "Coffee, tea or clothespin, sir?"

Why all the fuss? After all, I quit smoking, so it isn't my problem. Well, friends and neighbors, it's still my problem, and it's your problem, too.

What are we going to do with people whose personal habits don't strike our fancy? Are we going to start segregating our society into us versus them?

If we eliminate every person who does something we don't like, we are going to run out of people long before we run out of disagreeable habits.

Parking permit theft bothers handicapped students

Editor,

Hot summer weather prompted me to leave the windows down on my elderly automobile while I parked on campus. I figured there was nothing of value in it, and also enjoyed being able to drive off in a more comfortable atmosphere.

I didn't think about my handicapped parking permit, though, and one day this week it vanished. Of course I reported it missing and paid $5 for a replacement. Supposing this to be an isolated instance, I was amazed to learn that a handful of permits had been taken this week, including one from an employee of the KSU Police Department.

There are hundreds of student and faculty permits sold each year, but only slightly more than 40 handicapped ones. You can be sure that someone now using No. 19 (without the little decal in the corner of the windshield) will be noticed sooner or later. The handicapped parking spaces are closely observed by many of us and you will be found out.

While there may be many folks in the community who believe the handicapped spaces to be special treatment for a few, let me remind you a lot of self introspection, pain and sometimes bravery (guts) make up these special persons. To be able to clump off to class or office with the mainstream of society is very important. If you see No. 19, please call the KSU Police and tell them where it is.

Refinancing, constitution, go to Senate

By the Collegian Staff

Student Senate will vote on a resolution to revise the Business Administration College Council constitution and will hear first reading of a bill to form a Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee at 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight room.

The Business Council constitution revision calls for changes in the wording of the constitution for clarification purposes, establishment of five committees within the council, changes in council membership requirements and deletes the one vote per student clause, thereby providing for proxy voting. The legislation is sponsored by Sally Traeger, senior in business adminstration and council president.

The legislation establishing the Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee is being sponsored by Student Senate Executive Committee. Details about the legislation were not available.

Senate will also hear first reading of a resolution which calls for senate's support of the United Way fund-raising drive on campus. The legislation is being sponsored by Sandy Schmidt, senior in political science and State and Community Affairs Committee chairperson. Schmidt is also chairperson for the campus drive in conjunction with the city of Manhattan. Details about the resolution were not available.

Senate will also hear a presentation from John Moore, University controller, about the $700,000 students will be receiving from the refinancing of bonds for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Moore will also be answering any questions senators may have about the refinancing plan.

Judge falls from bridge

Dense fog hampers rescue

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A man who fell off a bridge in rural Kansas recalls how his frustration grew as he lay helpless for more than two days while cars whizzed by on the busy highway nearby.

"Two million people must have gone by and I hollered at every one of them, but nobody heard me," said Lawrence G. Zukel, an associate judge of the Wyandotte County District Court. "All I could move was my fingers and toes and my head about two inches. My glasses fell off and I couldn't see."

Zukel, 50, was released Tuesday from Lawrence Memorial Hospital, where he had been treated for three fractured vertebrae. He said he is able to stand up and walk now.

Zukel said he went to an annual fishing and supper outing with about a dozen friends and relatives on Aug. 23 at a cabin on Lakeview Lake. He started to leave about 11 p.m., but his next-door neighbor, J. Paul Maurin III, took his car keys away, he said.

"He didn't want me to leave," said Zukel, adding he drank about "four or five beers" during the day. Zukel said he wasn't drunk or unable to drive "even though some people are probably saying I was."

Zukel said he became apprehensive after walking about 7 miles in dense fog and decided to hitchhike back to the cabin. People looking for him apparently could not find him because of the fog.

"Boy, it was foggy," he said. "I couldn't even see my feet. I didn't even know I was on a bridge."

Zukel said he stepped across what he thought was a center line guard rail on the Interstate 70 overpass and tumbled about 20 feet onto a rocky patch of ground. There he lay for 2½ days.

A highway worker finally spotted Zukel, who waved a handkerchief.

"He waved back at me," Zukel said. "After several minutes he came back and looked over the edge. It was the first face I'd seen in days."

Irwin, Fisher wrote him several times about the expedition. Last January, Irwin told Fisher there was room for one more on the expedition.

To prepare himself, Fisher began backpacking, hiking and even joined the ROTC to overcome his fear of heights. However, the expedition was not such an easy task.

When Fisher and the other explorers arrived at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York, Irwin asked them to sign a waiver informing them of the terrorist activity around the region of Mt. Ararat. The waiver would relieve the Turkish government and Irwin of liability and give the explorers the option of canceling their trip.

"It was strange. This was the first we'd ever heard about this (terrorist activity)," Fisher said. "But I wasn't going to cancel out."

Fisher said the terrorists were the Kurdish Nationalist group who want to take a part of Turkey for their own homeland. He said just days before the expedition, a probe-expedition group was forced down Mt. Ararat at gunpoint with Soviet-made weapons.

"They stole and burned some of their things," Fisher said. "When they got them to the foot of the mountain at 5 a.m. they had a mock execution.

"All through it they kept saying 'Where's Jim Irwin? Where's Jim Irwin?' They were meaning to rob our expedition and take Jim Irwin captive. This has happened many times before."

Irwin's expedition was lucky to be able to climb the Kapchek Mountains, as many previous expeditions weren't able to get that close to Mt. Ararat because of the terrorists, Fisher said.

Just days before the expeditioners were scheduled to return, Irwin got permission from the Turkish government to climb Mt. Ararat with 30 Turkish soldiers. Irwin and three other explorers climbed Mt. Ararat but found no sign of what they believed was an ark from the Kapchek Mountains.

Fisher was unable to climb the mountain because he had to return home by Aug. 23 to prepare for the start of school.

"I would have gone if I could have," Fisher said. "I'd been planning this trip for four years."

Although Fisher admitted to being disappointed about not being able to climb Mt. Ararat, he said he has gained spiritual satisfaction from his trip and plans to pursue his mission again next summer.

Now that the adventure is over, Fisher plans to make a travelogue of the journey. He also wants to write a book about why he believes Noah's Ark exists.

Class offers seniors computer wisdom

Course result of positive feedback

By KAREN MEIS
Collegian reporter

A University organization has proven the adage true, a person is never too old to learn.

"Micro-Computer Fundamentals," a six-week introductory computer course, is being offered this fall by the KSU Center for Aging, a branch of the graduate school located in Fairchild Hall. With the exception of a $25 registration fee, the only requirement is that students be at least 60 years old.

Marilyn Legg, administrative assistant at the center, said the course is the result of positive feedback following a pilot course offered last spring.

"Last fall we (the center) had one or two calls from elderly people who wanted to learn about computers," Legg said. "After three calls, we decided it was a definite interest in the community."

Legg directed interested senior citizens to the Department of Continuing Education and to the University for Man. However, many of the elderly weren't satisfied with the pace of the course. They were interested, she said, in only a basic course taught at a slow pace.

The Community Outreach Committee, a branch of the Center for Aging, began searching for on-campus assistance.

The goal of Outreach, Legg said, is to take knowledge or expertise off-campus, such as to the Seniors' Service Center, when there appears to be a special need.

"We had 22 people enrolled last spring, and we had to turn people down," Legg said.

Senior citizens of the Manhattan community take the course for a variety of reasons, Legg said. Using a computer for income tax purposes and keeping in touch with grandchildren are two such reasons.

"I took the course simply because of my curiosity about computers," said Lois Fink, 69. "My grandchildren knew a lot more than I did, and I couldn't stand it."

Both Fink and Helen Long, were students in the pilot sessions last spring. They said the course is enjoyable and well worth the time and money.

Long said she took the course because she organizes indexes at home and she wanted to simplify her work. Although still indexing by hand, Long plans to use her newly acquired skills when she buys a computer this fall.

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, devised the lesson plans and taught the initial course offering. This fall, however, the course will be taught by Clifford Simpson, a supervisor for the computer practice sessions last spring. Ottenheimer's plans will be used again, but in a revised form.

Simpson said he enjoyed being a supervisor last spring and is looking forward to teaching the fall course.

"I am simply interested in electronics," Simpson said. "I always have been, and I always will be.

Computers and software for the class are being supplied by Bob Johnson from Midwest Computers, 3035 Anderson Ave. The registration fee for each student will be used to compensate Ottenheimer and Simpson for their lesson plans and teaching time respectively.

"This program is being done without a budget," Legg said, "so we tried to find a way for the elderly to have on-hands practice at a low cost.

"We would appreciate volunteers to be supervisors for the self-learning practice sessions. All that is necessary is for them to feel comfortable with micro-computers," she said.

LEARNING THE ROPES

Jay Domer, senior in animal sciences and industry, works his 12-year-old mare in the training arena at the horse research unit.

As the mare trotted around the dusty arena, she probably wondered why she had to go through it all again.

The heat and the exercise made her tired and slick with sweat, but she did as she was told. Finally, she was told to stop. She was patted on the neck, commended on the good job she had done, and taken back to the barn.

The 12-year-old mare being trained by Jay Domer, senior in animal sciences and industry, is used to this routine.

"She just needs some reminding and some re-teaching," said Dennis Sigler, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry and Domer's teacher in the horse training and management class.

Domer is not his only student. And the 12-year-old mare is one of 10 horses used this semester by horse enthusiasts in Sigler's training course.

"My reason for teaching this class is really simple," Sigler said. "In other species, you have slaughter classes, and classes about the end product, which is the meat. The end product with us is a riding horse."

The horses used in the course are owned by the University.

"Other schools bring in privately owned horses or the students use their own, but we don't," Sigler said. "That's what we have the horses here for, teaching and research."

The number of horses the University has each year is the limiting factor in the size of Sigler's class.

At the beginning of each semester, students fill out a survey detailing their previous experience with horses and note their preference for the type of horse they would like to train. Students are assigned a horse for the rest of the semester, Sigler said.

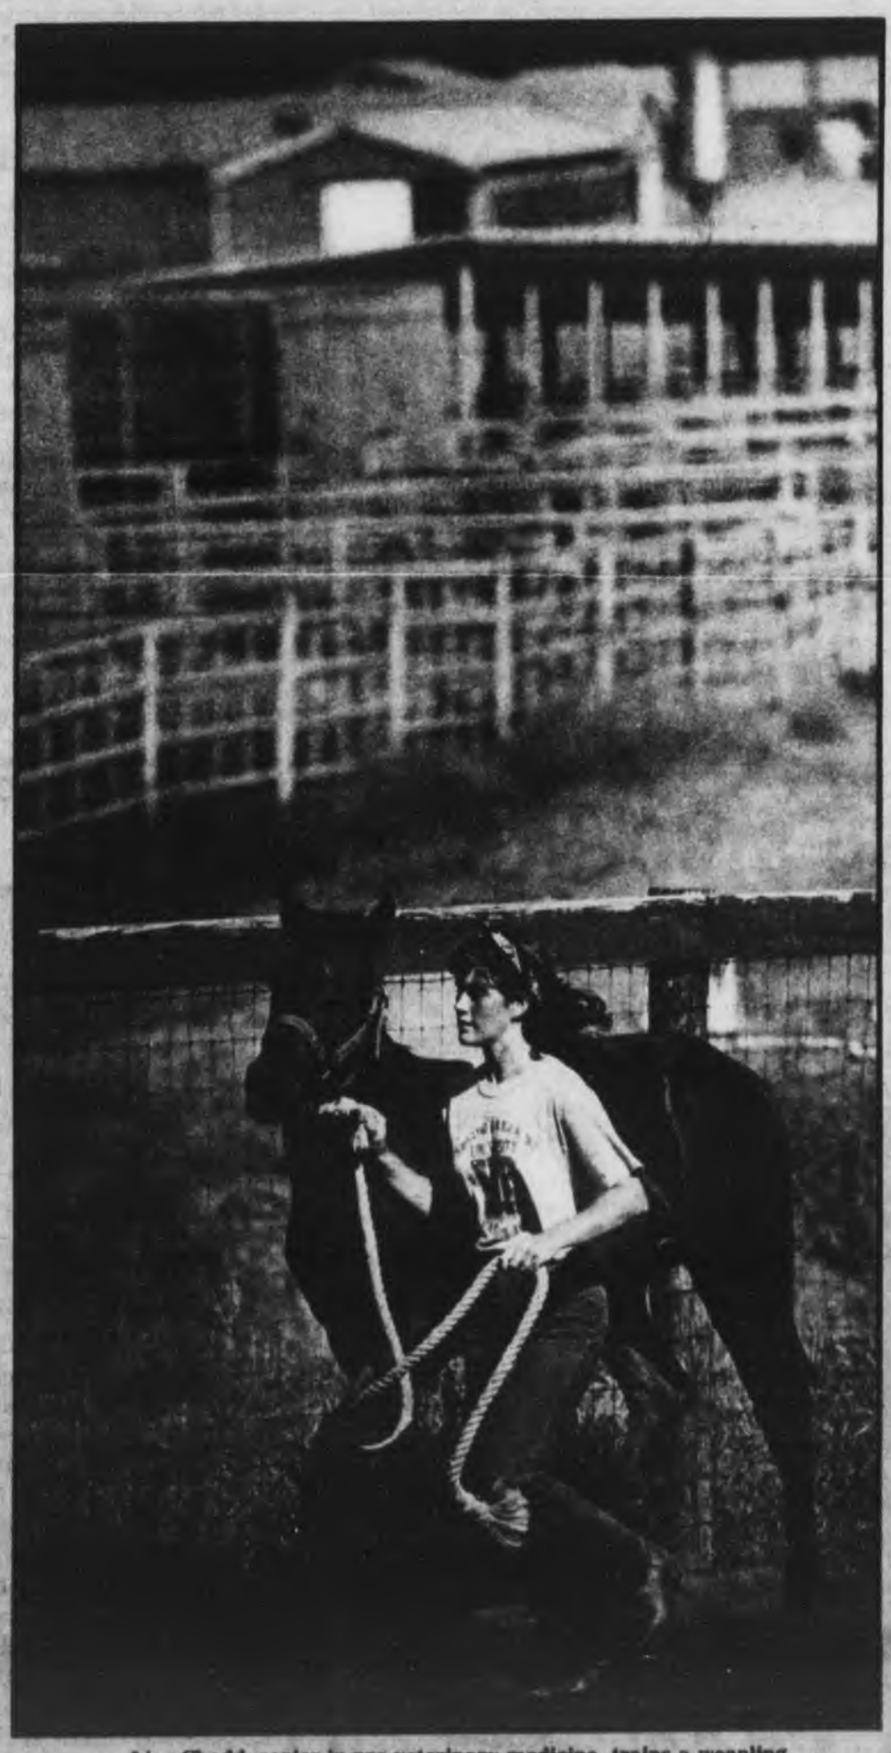
If the student wants to work with a mature horse, Sigler said, he often gives them a riding proficiency test.

"The students have to already know how to ride if they want one of the older horses," Sigler said. "This is not a riding class. I teach training. I just don't have the time to teach them how to ride along with the training."

Students have the choice of working with weanlings, yearlings, 2-year-olds or mature horses. The students who have the least experience with horses usually are assigned a weanling — a horse that is 5 to 7 months old.

Once the student is assigned a horse, that horse "belongs" to him or her for the rest of the semester. Depending on the age of the horse, each student has certain responsibilities to fulfill in caring and training the horse.

Employees at the horse teaching and research center feed the horses, but the students do the rest of the work.



"Everything else is up to them. They do the training, the grooming and other things like taking care of the feet," Sigler said.

Students also are required to furnish their own equipment.

"The kids with weanlings don't have to have as much equipment as those with older horses. If they have a 2-year-old or older, they have to have a saddle, reins and other things besides the ropes and grooming equipment," Sigler said. He takes equipment into consideration when he assigns a horse to a student.

"We try to make sure they don't have to go out and buy a brand-new saddle or call their dad and tell him they need a saddle for this class," Sigler said.

Rose's hit breaks 57-year-old record

By The Associated Press

CINCINNATI — Pete Rose broke Ty Cobb's career hit record Wednesday night, 57 years to the day after Cobb's last swing. The historic No. 4,192 was a characteristic single, giving the Cincinnati Reds player-manager the record at last and perhaps forever.

It may have been the biggest little hit in a century of baseball history.

With one swing of the bat, one of the biggest records in all of sports fell to the calloused, workman's hands of the 44-year-old Rose, in his 23rd major-league season.

He added a standup triple off Show into the left-field corner in the seventh, finishing the night 2-for-3 with 4,193 career hits. He also scored both runs in the Reds' 2-0 victory and had the game-ending assist, a diving stop on a hard grounder by the Padres' Steve Garvey.

But all that was anticlimactic.

On the record at-bat, Rose took the first pitch from Show high and outside, and he fouled the second pitch straight back. The third pitch was inside, and then came what people were waiting for.

The ball sliced gracefully into left-center field, falling in front of Carmelo Martinez, who fielded it on one bounce.

Peter Edward Rose, the scrappy "Charlie Hustle" and future Hall of Famer, had surpassed Tyrus Raymond Cobb, the brawling "Georgia Peach" and original Hall of Famer, as baseball's all-time hit king.

The hit triggered celebration in Cincinnati, his hometown and where he played his first 16 seasons and the last 1½ seasons as player-manager.

His teammates streamed out of the dugout to congratulate him, and he was hoisted briefly onto the shoulders of Tony Perez and Dave Concepcion. Reds owner Marge Schott led a sellout crowd, many of whom arrived too late to see the hit, in wild cheers as Rose wept on the shoulder of first base coach Tommy Helms. When his 15-year-old son, Pete Jr., came out to congratulate him, Rose told him: "I love you, and I hope you pass me."

The first-base bag was removed and taken to the dugout, along with the historic ball.

All Show could do was sit on the mound until the cheering died down.

Behind home plate Rose's mother, Laverne Noeth, her other son, Dave Rose, and relatives were alternately crying and laughing.

"I just want to give him a big kiss," Noeth said. "I'm just so happy for him. I'm happy, happy, happy."

Dave Rose, Pete's younger brother, could say little. "I just love him," he said.

Reds owner Marge Schott, who had rushed onto the field to hug Rose at first base and present him with a red Corvette, was emotionally congratulating everyone around her box seat. Security guards pushed well-wishers and reporters back up the aisles.

One person who got through, however, was Perry County Judge Linton Lewis of New Lexington, Ohio, who has made a career of following Pete Rose since 1973. "I got down there and I was shaking hands with everybody. I had the best seat in the house," Lewis said.

Later, Rose was almost at a rare loss for words.

"It was one of those situations where the puzzle slowly, but surely, went together. It was like somebody wrote the script and I was playing the part," Rose said.

"I wish every player in baseball could experience what I did tonight at first base."

Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth, who watched Rose try and fail to break the record Tuesday night, was in New York when the big moment came.

"All of baseball salutes Pete Rose for breaking a record experts said would never be broken," Ueberroth said in a statement. "His 4,192 hits is a tribute to his great talent and strength, his indomitable spirit and his iron will. Not only has he reserved a prominent spot in Cooperstown, he has reserved a special place in the heart of every fan alive today and every baseball fan to come."

It was Rose's 95th hit of a season highlighted from the beginning by a day-by-day countdown of the biggest record chase since Henry Aaron passed Babe Ruth in career home runs in 1974.

No one playing now is anywhere near Rose. The closest active player is Rod Carew of the California Angels with 3,030 hits, 1,163 back and 13th on the all-time list. And Carew is in the twilight of his career.

Struckhoff key to hopes of cross country team

By TONY CARBAJO
Collegian Reporter

The hopes and expectations of K-State's women's cross country team this fall lay squarely on the shoulders, or better yet, the legs of Jacque Struckhoff.

"You are only as good as the five people who score for you," said Steve Miller, head cross country coach. "I think our team will go as Jacque goes. If she runs well we can be super successful, and if not, we've got a problem."

Struckhoff, K-State's first All-American distance runner, is trying to improve on the 1984 campaign that saw her finish 32nd in the nation verall. She was the 25th American finisher, and thus was the final runner to be tabbed All-American.

If the Wildcats are going to make it to the NCAA meet, Struckhoff is going to have to lead them there, Miller said.

"Last year I was the last All-American to get in," Struckhoff said. "This year I would like to be further up in the line."

Struckhoff, a junior from Grinnell, said her goals for this season are to build upon last year's honors, both individually and as a team.

"I want to get to the nationals and place in the top 20," she said. "But more important, I want to see our team make it to the nationals. Getting to the nationals is going to be a little harder this year because they are only taking one team from our district."

Miller said, barring injuries, Struckhoff should be able to meet the goals he has set for her this year.

"Our goals (for her) increase each year," he said. "When Jacque came here three years ago, we just wanted her to make the team. Then a year ago, she became an All-American. This year we think she is a legitimate top-15 or top-25 athlete in the country."

For Struckhoff to improve on last year's finish, a little fine tuning is needed both physically and mentally, she said. Areas of improvement are running on hills, sprinting and finishing races.

"Emotionally I need to start thinking more positively, thinking that I can do it instead of placing other people above myself, thinking they're going to beat me," she said.

Miller is working to erase the weaknesses in Struckhoff's running. He has put her through strength and weight training to help her with hill running. And he has been put her through speed-oriented drills to help her on sprinting at the finish of races.

Miller said Struckhoff's power is improving dramatically.

"We're trying to improve her strength along with her distance running," he said.

Although Struckhoff does not have any immediate post-college plans, Miller said her potential is endless.

"I think her potential is unlimited," Miller said. "I said from the very begining three years ago that I think she can be one of the best in the country, and she is already that. I think if she stays away from injury, she can be one of the best in the world. I think she is a really, really talented girl."

It is a talent that Miller hopes will lead the team into great prominence and a national ranking this year.

Royals down Angels 2-1, increase lead in division

By The Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Jamie Quirk singled home one run and pinch-hitter Jorge Orta hit a run-scoring double in the seventh inning to snap a scoreless tie Wednesday night as the Kansas City Royals defeated the California Angels 2-1.

The victory gave the Royals, who won two games of a three-game set at Anaheim Stadium, a 2½-game lead over the Angels in the American League West.

Kansas City's Danny Jackson, who was winless in his three previous outings, allowed six hits over seven innings for his 13th victory against nine defeats. Dan Quisenberry pitched the final two innings for his 33rd save.

California's Ron Romanick, 13-8, yielded seven hits in the seven innings he pitched. Romanick has lost his last four decisions.

After neither team was able to mount a serious threat through the first six innings, Quirk's bloop single to right field gave the Royals a 1-0 lead.

Chiefs look to down archrivals, earn respect

DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

The big, bad Los Angeles (I still want to call them Oakland) Raiders are in Kansas City tonight to take on the Chiefs in a nationally televised game.

The contest should give die-hard Chiefs fans like myself a pretty good indication whether or not "our" team is a legitimate playoff contender.

The Chiefs opened their season last Sunday by thumping the New Orleans Saints, 47-27. The offense was truly impressive in the contest, gaining a total of 504 yards and converting on eight of 15 third-down plays.

As impressive as the offense looked on paper, however, there are still a few things about the Chiefs' offensive effort against the Saints that left me with that all too familiar bad taste in my mouth.

When Marv Levy was the Kansas City coach, the Chiefs offense seemed to have a way of marching downfield only to have its drive stall, settling for a field goal.

I realize that Nick Lowery is almost automatic from inside 45 yards, but the Chiefs showed four times Sunday that they will be content just to get three points out of a drive when they could have scored a touchdown.

Playoff teams like the Raiders put the ball in the end zone when they get inside the opponent's 30-yard line. The Chiefs are going to have to start doing so to be considered one of the National Football League's elite teams.

Nonetheless, the Chiefs' effort against New Orleans was outstanding for a season opener. The running game was fairly effective for the first time since the death of Joe Delaney a few years back. The pass defense was outstanding, too. The Chiefs defenders allowed just 3.7 yards a passing play.

As impressive as the Chiefs were, the Raiders may have even been more impressive in routing the New York Jets, 31-0.

The Raider offense had 19 first downs in the contest, and gained 356 yards of total offense. But the Raider defense was the real story of the day.

Los Angeles defenders sacked Jets quarterback Ken O'Brien 10 times for 61 yards in losses and recorded their first shutout in nearly eight years.

The last meeting at Arrowhead Stadium between Kansas City and Los Angeles was won by the Raiders, 22-20. The Raiders also won the last game between the teams in L.A., 17-7.

7 KU players ruled ineligible

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The University of Kansas, which had 10 players declared ineligible last season, will be without at least seven others this year, it was announced Wednesday.

The players are senior tailback Lynn Williams, senior offensive guard Doug Certain, senior defensive lineman Guy Gamble, junior outside linebacker Dane Griffin, senior tailback Robert Mimbs, sophomore linebacker Warren Shields and senior defensive back Alvin Walton. They have not been practicing with the team since questions about their eligibility came to light.

Raiders was in 1981 when Kansas City won both meetings, 27-0 and 28-17. The 1981 season was the last in which the Chiefs had a winning record (9-7).

Kansas City needs to knock off a team like the Raiders if they are to be considered one of the NFL's finest teams. The schedule doesn't get any easier after tonight, with games against the Miami Dolphins and Seattle Seahawks the following two weekends.

Coach John Mackovic's troops have two tough tasks ahead of them — defeating their archrivals, the Raiders, and convincing their fans that they are for real this year. I'll be among the 65,000 people screaming from the stands tonight, hoping that the Chiefs can accomplish both.

Depending upon the age of the horse, each has a specific list of training requirements the students must complete by the end of the semester. These requirements range from being easily caught and standing tied, to giving a demonstration in such events as western pleasure, roping or trail riding.

Half of the student's grade is determined by Sigler's evaluation of the horse's responsiveness to the "owner" at midterm and at the end of the semester. The remainder of the grade is decided by written quizzes.

The class meets once a week for lecture and three times a week to work with the horses. During each lecture, Sigler covers topics concerning equestrian care or training. Sigler demonstrates these techniques to the students before requiring them to put the practices to work.

"Some of the students take the class just to get outside and out of the classroom," Sigler said. "But I think most of them take the class with the intention of learning how to better train their own horses."

Domer said he was taking the course because he wanted to hear other people's point of view on how to train a horse.

"There are always new techniques you can learn no matter how many horses you have trained," Domer said. "I have broken a lot of colts, and I wasn't too interested in doing that for the class. So I have this older mare."

Domer will be working with his horse, trying to get her trained for roping by the end of the semester.

Tami Dyer, senior in preveterinary medicine, wants to learn more about breaking horses.

"I have broken about eight horses at home, and I give private riding lessons, but I want to learn more," she said.

Dyer's experience got her a special horse for her assignment in the class. She is working with a weanling that the University will show in a Kansas weanling futurity.

A futurity is a horse show that requires participants to enter their horses months in advance. Owners base their entries on a horse's bloodline and appearance.

Because it is for show, the horse requires some different preparation than the other weanlings. Dyer gives the horse a daily bath to make the horse's hair glossy and smooth. She also places a "sweat hood" on the horse during training exercises to eliminate excess fat.

According to Lisa Chadd, senior in animal sciences and industry, patience is important for class participants.

"You have to be patient. It gets very repetitious, but that is the way the horse learns," she said.

Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs, is auditing the lecture part of the class this semester. "I figure I am never too old to learn," she said. "This is a really good class for two reasons. It gets the horses worked with and trained, as well as giving the students the chance to learn."

Growth

ment; wholesale trade; retail trade; finance, insurance and real estate; construction; transportation; and independent business owners.

Although the total number of the projected new positions is nearly 558,000, Holdrich also predicted a decline of about 20,000 jobs in other sectors of the state's economy.

He said the school-age population under 24 years of age would increase slightly by the year 2005.

Of the metropolitan areas within the state, Holdrich predicted that Wichita would gain more than any other with 94,000 new jobs and a population increase of 190,000 by 2005.

The Federal Aviation Administration has forecast a 4 percent increase each year for the next 25 years in the number of hours flown in small aircraft, which Holdrich said can be translated into a greater demand for general aviation airplanes built in Wichita.

However, the effect of utility rate increases, such as those associated with the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington, were not taken into account, Holdrich said.

Manhattan may also gain new jobs and experience a population increase, said Tom Whalen, director of operations for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Whalen said predictions for the non-durable goods — wholesale and retail — and financial, insurance and real estate industries are optimistic. Jobs in the durable goods manufacturing area and construction industries showed no increase or experienced a slight drop in growth.

"The financial, insurance and real estate industry will probably show an increase," Whalen said, "and this will probably also mean a population growth. The industry grows only because there are more people to sell insurance to and more people needing financial institutions."

Whalen said this industry showed a string of 12 consecutive quarterly increases.

The Chamber of Commerce does several things to promote population and industry growth in the Manhattan area.

"(The chamber) is contracted with the city of Manhattan to try to bring as many conventions and visitors to Manhattan as possible," Whalen said.

Manhattan also has an economic development board and commission which attempts to attract industry to Manhattan.

"In the past three years, we've attracted 20 corporate visits. Out of those 20, we've gotten two (industries located in Manhattan)," Whalen said.

The Chamber of Commerce works with the retail community to establish three main programs, Whalen said. These programs include "Dog Days," "Octoberfest" and "Winter Dog Days."

Manhattan also engages in national advertising campaigns in order to attract industrial developers.

A program started three years ago, called By '87, is also widely publicized and used to promote community enthusiasm for Manhattan. The program notes continuing projects in Manhattan that will still be functioning in 1987 and describes them in terms of dollars for the community.

"This means about $400 million in terms of construction for Manhattan, K-State and the Fort Riley area," Whalen said. "A number of projects have also been added since the program began."

Manhattan's population, according to 1980 census figures, is approximately 32,600, excluding K-State students living on campus. Figures for long-range future growth in Manhattan were not available.

Topeka should gain about 10,000 new jobs for a population increase of about 21,000, Holdrich said, and Lawrence should add about 15,000 jobs and 33,000 in population.

Kansas City, including some counties in Missouri, should gain about 188,000 jobs and 388,000 people, Holdrich said.

Comet

In January and February, the comet comes in close contact with the sun and the tail of the comet will stretch because the sun's heat causes gases to release from the comet's nucleus, Geisert said.

In the early morning hours of March and April the comet will become spectacular because of its brightness, Geisert said.

On April 11, individuals will have the opportunity to see Halley's comet a second time. Two chances to see the comet are something that has never happened before in recorded history, Geisert said.

Those south of the equator will have the best opportunity to see Halley's comet at that time. Geisert said the northern hemisphere will be able to see it by looking to the south at approximately 2 a.m.

"Despite what people will say, binoculars will allow a person a good look at the comet," he said. "It is best to use a low power viewing device. Also become familiar with the night sky. Study a star chart, so if someone says it is close to Sagittarius, you'll know where to look. Most important don't get caught up in the hype of it all."

University employs 2nd lawyer

By SARAH KESSINGER
Collegian Reporter

With the number of court cases filed by faculty, staff and campus organizations on the rise, University Attorney Richard Seaton discovered his job was more than one person could handle.

Seaton said the number of cases is high now, with 10 or 11 pending cases in court and several more in state and federal agencies. The majority of those pending are for discrimination suits.

"The volume's gone up quite a bit in the last few years," Seaton said. "People are more conscious of legal rights and more willing to litigate than they ever were before."

Because Seaton worked only half-days on campus while working the other half at his private practice with Everett, Seaton and Knopp, the University hired Dorothy Thompson as a full-time attorney July 1.

Thompson had been director of the Affirmative Action Office since 1972. Affirmative Action monitors personnel appointments and resolves student and faculty grievances on discrimination. She also practiced privately with Everett, Seaton, Knopp and Thompson from 1980 to January 1984.

Thompson said the growth in the number of cases is occurring throughout society.

"Universities and colleges have become more and more subject to a growing number of law suits and legal entanglements that other organizations have been subject to for a long time," Thompson said. "Universities have not been totally immune to this type of litigation."

Bramlage remains optimistic about coliseum budget woes

By A. SCHARNHORST
Managing Editor

Pending Board of Regents' approval, the Fred Bramlage Coliseum will proceed as planned without extras — but those could be added within several years after construction, the coliseum's namesake said Thursday.

"If we don't get all the things we want this time, we'll have a (fund-raising) drive later on," Bramlage said. "I think we'll get what we need."

A theatrical stage and lighting, special seating areas for alumni and press, landscaping work and a coliseum driveway are reportedly among the needed items which may not be built. These items are not currently included because construction bids on the project came in more than $3 million over budget.

The Wichita architecture firm in charge of the project, Gossen Livingston Associates, has agreed to redesign the coliseum to bring it within the $14.5 million budget set by the regents. Redesigning will mean reducing the proposed size of the Coliseum from 16,000 to 13,500 seats — a fact that Bramlage said isn't disturbing.

"I'm sorry that there are less seats, but both the athletic director (Larry Travis) and (basketball coach Jack) Hartman say it's enough — and they're the two who have to deal with it.

"I think they kind of think it's better to have someone waiting (to get tickets). It's awfully nice to have a full house all of the time."

The 74-year-old Junction City businessman, a 1935 graduate of K-State in business, has pledged close to $1.75 million to the project and was instrumental in soliciting approximately $6 million in additional coliseum pledges. The regents approved a proposal to name the coliseum after Bramlage in light of his contributions and commitment to the project.

The honor of having the building named for him "is fine, but I didn't ask for it," Bramlage said. "I'd rather give anonymously...The only reason I got interested was because of the students. They said 'we need it, we want it.' I figure if the students would put up that kind of money they deserved to get the thing built."

Coliseum funding is based on $7 million in contributions, $7 million in student fees and $2 million from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Despite criticism of the project, Bramlage said the coliseum is the only alternative for K-State basketball. Renovation of Ahearn Field

Soviet spy defects to Britain

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The government announced Thursday that the Soviet spymaster for Britain has defected and has indentified 25 espionage agents who are being expelled from the country.

The Foreign Office said Oleg A. Gordievski, 46, had recently been appointed head of the Soviet KGB office in London but defected because he "wished to become a citizen of a democratic country and live in a free society." He was granted asylum in Britain.

Sir Geoffrey Howe, the foreign secretary, called the defection a "substantial coup," for the British security security services.

Erik Ninn-Hansen, Denmark's justice minister, indicated that Gordievski had been a double agent for the West since the 1970s, when he served with the Soviet Embassy in Copenhagen.

Ninn-Hansen, speaking on Danish television, said Gordievski "supplied police intelligence with much information, also on conversations he conducted, and he was an extremely important source of information of significance to our security."

The Danish minister said British and Danish counterintelligence services had been in contact with each other about Gordievski for some time.

The 25 Soviets were the largest number of alleged spies to be sent back to Moscow since 1971, when Britain expelled 105 Soviet diplomats and trade officials.

The Foreign Office said the Soviets were ordered to leave Britain by Oct. 3.

Gordievski officially held the senior rank of counselor in the Soviet Embassy.

Howe, asked what damage Britain had suffered from the 25 alleged spies, replied, "It's clearly serious. They were engaging in intelligence activities of a kind and on a scale that was unacceptable, and this ac-

Council to discuss second ATO appeal regarding sanctions

By WAYNE PRICE
Managing Editor

The Council on Student Affairs will discuss today the second appeal from Alpha Tau Omega regarding the alleged hazing of a number of pledges last fall.

William Sutton, vice president for Educational and Student Services and chairman of the 13-member board, said the council will set procedural rules and a timetable for the appeal if the council decides to hear the case.

Sanctions against the ATOs, 1632 McCain Lane, were imposed Aug. 26 by the Interfraternity Council board of directors after the Office of Greek Affairs received a hazing complaint from a number of former pledges in July.

Sutton refused to comment on the alleged hazing or give details on the sanctions imposed.

"I don't want to get into the specifics and that would be specific," Sutton said. "I don't want to do anything that would jeopardize them having a fair hearing."

Both Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs, and Gary Arroyo, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and IFC president, refused to comment on the hazing allegations or the sanctions while the matter is under appeal.

Arroyo is also a member of the student affairs council.

City ready to exercise eminent domain

By TOM SCHULTES
Business Editor

In a major move toward downtown redevelopment, the Manhattan City Commission presented a check for more than $1 million to Charlson & Wilson Bonded Abstracters last week to purchase land for a multi-million dollar downtown redevelopment project.

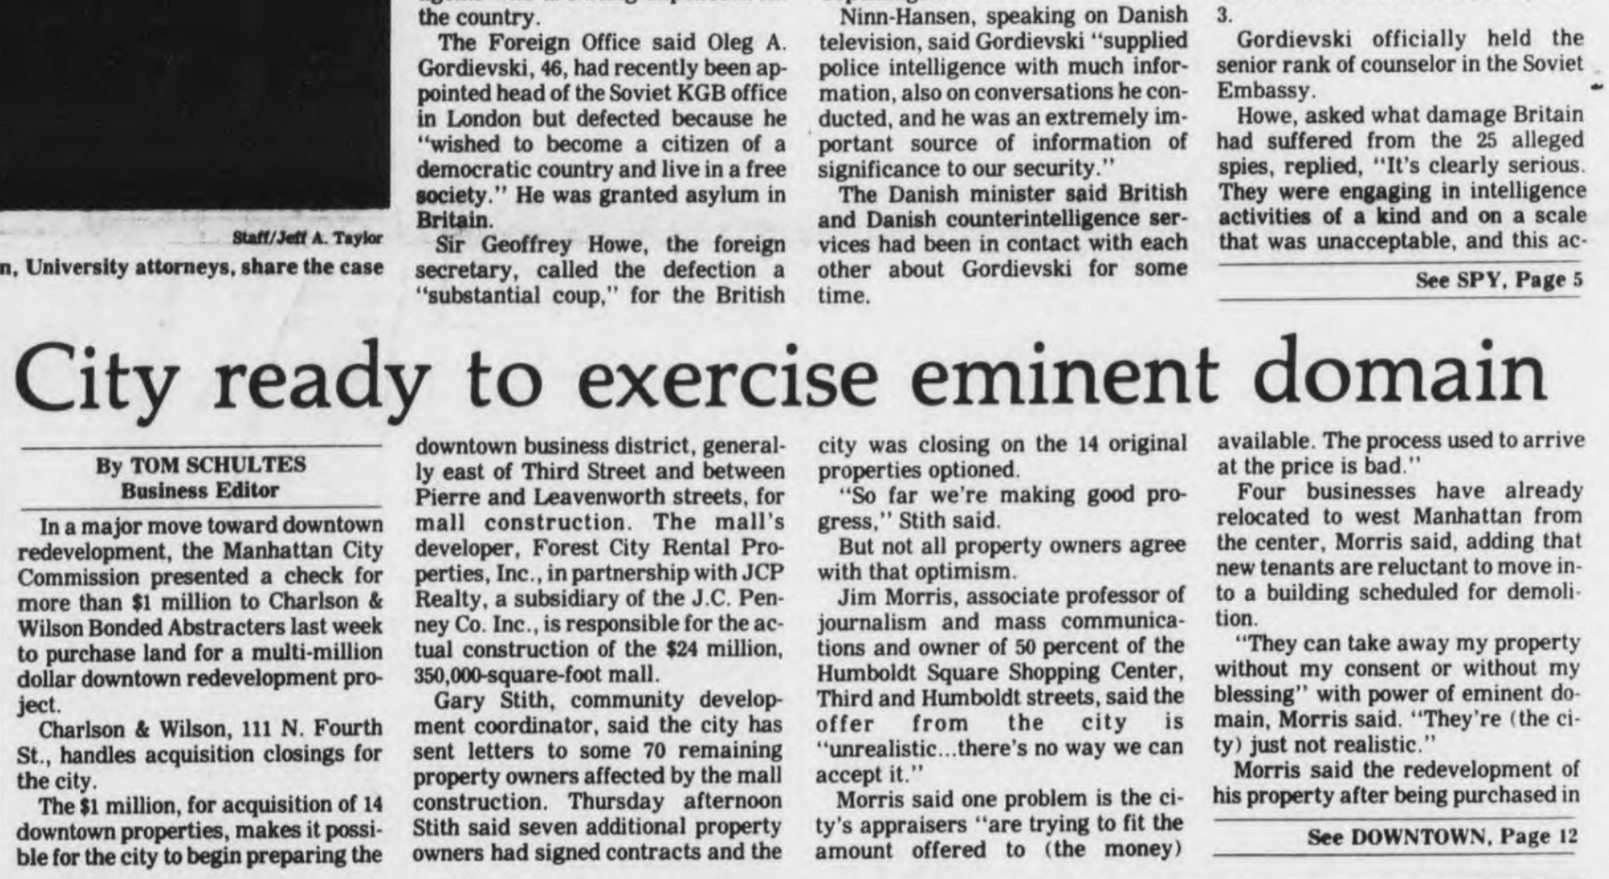
The $1 million, for acquisition of 14 downtown properties, makes it possible for the city to begin preparing the downtown business district, generally east of Third Street and between Pierre and Leavenworth streets, for mall construction. The mall's developer, Forest City Rental Properties, Inc., in partnership with JCP Realty, a subsidiary of the J.C. Penney Co. Inc., is responsible for the actual construction of the $24 million, 350,000-square-foot mall.

Gary Stith, community development coordinator, said the city has sent letters to some 70 remaining property owners affected by the mall construction. Thursday afternoon Stith said seven additional property owners had signed contracts and the city was closing on the 14 original properties optioned.

"So far we're making good progress," Stith said.

But not all property owners agree with that optimism.

Jim Morris, associate professor of journalism and mass communications and owner of 50 percent of the Humboldt Square Shopping Center, Third and Humboldt streets, said the offer from the city is "unrealistic...there's no way we can accept it."



Morris said one problem is the city's appraisers "are trying to fit the amount offered to (the money) available. The process used to arrive at the price is bad."

Four businesses have already relocated to west Manhattan from the center, Morris said, adding that new tenants are reluctant to move into a building scheduled for demolition.

"They can take away my property without my consent or without my blessing" with power of eminent domain, Morris said. "They're (the city) just not realistic."

Morris said the redevelopment of his property after being purchased in

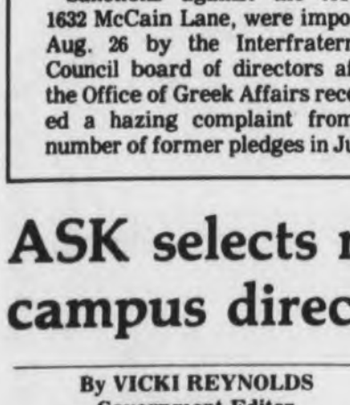
ASK selects new chairman, campus director announces

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

The appointment of the new chairman for the Associated Students of Kansas Board of Directors was announced at Student Senate Thursday night, although the current chairman hasn't officially relinquished the position.

Kevin Elmore, senior in computer science and ASK campus director, made the announcement, saying Doug Chamblin, senior in mechanical engineering and vice chairman of the ASK board of directors, will assume the responsibilities of the current chairman.

However, Chamblin's appointment is contingent upon the resignation of Jeff Polack, senior in political science at the University of Kansas and current board chairman.



Polack is also student body vice president at KU.

At the senate meeting, Elmore said Polack had resigned. However, in an interview Thursday night, Polack would not verify his resignation or make an official comment about the matter.

"I'm not in a position to say anything about that right now," he said.

Elmore said he also talked to Polack on the telephone Thursday and Polack told him about the resignation. A letter informing Workers find 49 dead after wreck

VISEU, Portugal — Weary firefighters using power saws and bulldozers pried apart burned and twisted wreckage Thursday to free injured passengers and retrieve the bodies of at least 49 people killed in the head-on crash of two trains.

More than 100 people were injured when an express train carrying hundreds of migrant workers to France crashed head-on Wednesday evening with a local train near this town in the mountains of central Portugal. Both of the diesel-powered trains were traveling at more than 60 mph, officials said.

The crushed coaches derailed, rolled down a 33-foot embankment and burst into flames that spread to an adjoining pine forest, firemen said.

Fire department officials and others at the site said in the confusion of the first few hours following the crash — when no one knew how many people were on the two trains — that they feared as many as 300 people might have been killed.

But railway officials said Thursday there were a total of about 350 people on the trains, and rescue workers drastically reduced their fatality estimates and stopped calling the crash the worst railroad disaster in Portugal's history.

Officials said Thursday they had identified 17 bodies.

"We know it was human error that caused this tragedy, but we are not sure who was responsible — a signal man on the ground or the engine driver of one of the trains," said Antonio Queiroz Martins, president of the Portuguese Railroad.

French officials destroy rocket

KOUROU, French Guiana — Space Center officials blew up the European Space Agency's Ariane rocket less than 10 minutes after liftoff late Thursday when it moved off course and threatened to fall over inhabited areas.

The order to destroy was given immediately after the rocket, carrying two communications satellites, left its prescribed trajectory and lost altitude, the officials said.

The failure was Ariane's third in 15 launches.

French President Francois Mitterrand, on a stopover here on his way to French Polynesia, watched the failed launch of the European rocket, which was made to compete with the American Space Shuttle in the billion-dollar satellite launching business.

The Ariane was reported on course, over the Atlantic ocean, during the first minutes of its ascension. Then at nine minutes and 52 seconds into the flight officials ordered the rocket destroyed. It was the first such destruct order for an Ariane.

The Ariane program is part of the 11-nation European Space Agency's ambitious effort to capture a third of the commercial satellite telecommunications business by the 1990s.

Producers looking for leading man

DALLAS — Producers of a five-hour mini-series about Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot and his company have not announced the selection of an actor for the leading role, and Perot says almost anyone could portray him.

Filming begins Oct. 10 for the two-part program based on Ken Follett's book, "On Wings of Eagles," about the rescue of employees of Perot's Electronic Data Systems Corp. from an Iranian jail in 1978.

Artist starts work on Paris bridge

PARIS — American artist Christo has begun work on wrapping the historic Pont Neuf, Paris' oldest bridge, with 430,000 square feet of silky sandstone-colored cloth.

Christo, best known for wrapping the Australian coastline, the Chicago Museum of Modern art and 11 of Florida's Bay Biscayne islands in pink plastic, arrived Wednesday to supervise the preliminary stage of the $2 million wrap.

Nobel Prize may not be found

MARTINEZ, Calif. — One of the items stolen in a two-year crime spree, the Nobel Prize medal of physicist Emilio Segre, will probably never be seen again, authorities said.

"It was gold and it was probably melted down," prosecutor Barbara Zunigas said. "It's gone."

Superior Court Judge Richard Arnason told Eugene Williams, who was convicted in a 100-house burglary spree, that if he returned the medal, his 11-year, four-month sentence could be reduced by more than a year.

Segre, a University of California scientist, shared the prize in 1959 with fellow physicist Owen Chamberlain for the discovery of the anti-proton, which confirmed the existence of anti-matter.

AIDS fear keeps blood supply low

Blood supplies are critically low in scattered sections of the nation and some health officials say unfounded fears of contracting AIDS may be keeping potential donors from giving blood.

"AIDS has just been in the public eye so much lately, you can't help but feel that plays a part in the shortage," said Dr. Adelisa Panlilio, acting director of blood services at the Red Cross chapter in Nashville, Tenn., where the inventory was 670 pints Wednesday, down from the usual 2,000 to 2,500 pints.

Some cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome have been linked to receiving transfusions of contaminated blood.

But "you cannot contract AIDS by giving blood," said Dr. William C. Sherwood, director of Red Cross Blood Services in Philadelphia. "Giving blood is an extremely safe and easy procedure."

It is routine practice in the United States for blood to be extracted from donors with sterilized needles that are used only once and thrown away. Health officials in some regions blamed shortages on the annual summer slump in donations and on increased demand.

AIDS cripples the body's immune system defense against disease. It is spread through contaminated needles shared by intravenous drug abusers, receiving of transfusions of infected blood, or sexual contact, usually between homosexual males, researchers say.

Couple fights satellite dish ban

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A subdivision regulation banning satellite television receivers is being fought in court by a couple who put one up next to their home.

Stanton and Merett Ross of Overland Park filed suit in U.S. District Court Wednesday, claiming that restrictive convenants governing use of property in the Summercrest subdivision are unconstitutional. Defendants are the five members of the Summercrest Homes Association.

Ross said he had the seven-foot-tall satellite dish installed about six weeks ago after getting perion from neighbors living closest to his lot. But the association board members called for its removal, citing a clause in the restrictive covenants that prohibits erection of free-standing outdoor television and radio antennas.

The Rosses, who have lived in the subdivision about a year, claim the restriction violates their freedom of speech.

Ross said the dish is "smaller than a swing set and they've got a lot of swing sets in here."

He said the antenna is partly obscured by a four-foot-high fence, the highest allowed by association rules, and that he also plans to plant shrubs around it.

A similar suit against a homes association in Platte County was settled out of court recently when a homeowner agreed to remove his antenna.

Group allocates funds for students

IOWA CITY, Iowa — A University of Iowa student government group has allocated $7,500 for students who are denied federal financial aid because they refuse to register for the draft.

Collegiate Associations Council voted 9-7 at a meeting earlier this week to create the fund from mandatory student fees. The fund requires approval from Philip Hubbard, vice president for student services.

"I'm sure there will be a knee-jerk reaction from people who say if you don't register, you shouldn't be funded," said Mike Reck, a CAC member. "But the issue is not draft registration. The issue is freedom of education."

The council was responding to the Solomon Amendment, a federal law that denies federal financial aid to students who refuse to verify they have registered for the draft.

Doctors remove Dole's bone spur

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole had a bone spur on his elbow removed Thursday during a "minor surgical procedure," but the Kansas Republican returned to work on Capitol Hill as if nothing had happened.

The bone spur on his right elbow was "shaved down" by orthopedic surgeons in a procedure that lasted about an hour, said Walter Riker, Dole's press secretary.

"The bone spur was pressing on a nerve and causing pain," said Riker. "It was the result of his World War II injuries."

Dole's right arm and shoulder were shattered by gunfire during fighting in Italy in 1945, and the senator has only partial use of the arm.

Correction

Due to an editing error in Thursday's Collegian story, "Class offers seniors computer wisdom," the name of the committee sponsoring the class was misidentified. The correct name is the KSU Center for Aging Outreach Committee.

Due to a reporting error in Thursday's editorial, "Deficit quietly expanding," the amount of the federal deficit was listed inaccurately. The correct amount is more than $2 trillion.

Campus group may reorganize

ASK seeks ways to draw participants

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

The Associated Students of Kansas may be implementing some reorganizational changes soon, said Kevin Elmore, senior in computer science and ASK campus director.

The changes are intended to solve some of the representational problems the K-State chapter has in recruiting delegates. The reorganization proposal, "New Federalism," aims at getting more student participation in ASK.

"K-State and some other schools have problems with getting strong campus organizations," Elmore said. "In the past, we've done good things for the students, but with little actual student involvement. Rather than have a central organization, we want to bring more to the campus structure and bring control to the campus directors."

Elmore said K-State was the first school among the ASK member schools to effect the primary reorganizational changes. ASK member schools are Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University, Pittsburg State University, University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Washburn University.

Under the new policy, Elmore and Doug Chamblin, senior in mechanical engineering and vice chairman for the ASK board of directors, would be ex officio members of the Student Senate State and Community Affairs Committee.

Each month, Chamblin would submit a report evaluating Elmore's campus representation. After the committee studied the report, it would be sent to the state ASK office in Topeka.

"This makes ASK a more viable organization on campus," Chamblin said. "The campus would have more say in this way and the senate would have more say in what goes on, and more control."

Elmore agreed that the campus would have more control under the new proposal because "the campus decides what my job is, not the state.

"In the long run, we're hoping to turn payment of the campus directors over to the campus as part of the ASK budget. Right now I get eight payments of $132 from the state," he said.

Elmore said that under the new plan the ASK state-wide organization would take over the meeting expenses for delegates at the ASK legislative assemblies.

"Right now, (K-State) students are paying out of their own pockets to go," Elmore said, "and this makes it hard for me to get 16 students to go to the legislative assembly to make ASK policy."

Elmore said K-State proposed this initial change because it is the only school that does not pay for delegates to attend the ASK legislative assemblies.

"This way we get our full brace of delegates. Last year at the legislative assembly I had problems getting 17 delegates. We ended up with eight delegates, which means we lost one vote because each delegate is allowed only one vote by proxy," Elmore said.

Chamblin said the reaction of the ASK board of directors was favorable when the proposal was brought to its attention.

"I think they're all pretty excited about it," Chamblin said. "It would make clerical things in Topeka a lot simpler."

Chamblin said implementation of the reorganization plan is tentatively subject to the approval of each school's senate.

"We anticipate that our senate will be excited about it," Chamblin said.

The changes will be officially presented to ASK members at the legislative assembly Sept. 27 and 28. Anyone wishing to participate as a delegate may contact Elmore at the Student Government Services office.

South Africa proposes second major change in system of apartheid

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A government panel on Thursday proposed repeal of the hated "pass laws" that keep South Africa's blacks out of white areas — the second major change in the apartheid system announced in two days.

Even whites who oppose the government hailed the step.

"This is the beginning of the end of apartheid," said Sheena Duncan, president of the Black Sash women's movement, which opposes the nation's system of racial segregation. "I really do think it means something. They are not playing around with words this time."

Helen Suzman, an anti-apartheid member of Parliament, said, "This is probably the most important step forward in 30 years."

A primary effect will be that families now restricted to their tribal homelands could join the men working in the cities, preventing the breakup of families.

On Wednesday, President P.W. Botha told a congress of his National Party that the government was giving up its policy that blacks eventually have to become citizens of black homelands and relinquish citizenship in South Africa.

Blacks, however, still will have political rights only in the homeland, and still will not be able to vote in South Africa.

Government policy allows the country's 5 million whites to settle almost anywhere while its 24 million blacks need permits, or passes, to live near white areas and hold jobs there.

Between 200,000 and 300,000 blacks a year are arrested for violations of the pass laws and sent back to the tribal homelands, usually for trying to work in cities illegally.

A committee of the President's Council, an advisory panel to President P.W. Botha, on Thursday announced a report that said pass laws — technically called "influx control" — do not work and cost too much.

Colbert takes position as director of athletics

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Sports Editor

Conrad Colbert, assistant athletic director and business manager at K-State, will be leaving the post to accept a similar job at Pan American University in Edinburg, Texas.

Colbert has been chosen as Pan American's athletic director, replacing Lon Kruger, a former K-State basketball player who was the athletic director and head basketball coach at Pan American. Kruger will remain as basketball coach.

Colbert, who will begin his duties at Pan American Oct. 1., said Thursday that his last day at K-State would be Sept. 28, the day K-State's football team plays North Texas State University in KSU Stadium.

The move, Colbert said, provides him a chance for "revitalization and new challenges."

"That's what I'm into," he said. "It's just one of those progressive things people think about."

The primary task for Colbert at K-State is handling the athletic department's finances. Colbert took the K-State position in June 1976.

Athletic Director Larry Travis said that the athletic budget has become more sound as a direct result of Colbert.

"In the last 10 years, our control of finances has improved," Travis said. "He's done much to make K-State's athletic department fiscally sound."

A search for a successor will begin in the next eight to 10 days, Travis said, and the person probably will come from outside of the athletic department.

A committee involving several people within the University will be formed to choose a replacement, Travis said.

Although Travis said Colbert has been instrumental in training the people in the department's business office, a successor will need to be named as soon as possible.

"We need to get somebody into our business office," he said.

Colbert, an Iowa City, Iowa native, was a sales representative for Champion Products in Omaha, Neb., for three years before coming to K-State. For seven years Colbert also was an assistant athletic director and business manager for the University of Iowa.

"I think it's a good move. He finally gets a chance to run his own program," Travis said.

Lectors bring honor to Landon series

By TONI OGLESBY
Collegian Reporter

Vice President George Bush referred to the Landon Lecture series as the most prestigious lecture series in the country when he spoke Monday in Ahearn Field House.

To understand how the Landon Lecture Series has become so prestigious, one has to look at its history, said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series and professor of philosophy.

"It's the most prestigious because you look at the list of speakers we've had. Very few other lecture series, certainly none at universities, have had anything like our list of such distinguished speakers," Reagan said.

The first important event leading to the status of the series was when Sen. Robert Kennedy opened his presidential campaign at a lecture in 1968.

"He announced the night before that he would run for president and after making that announcement, the Landon Lecture at Kansas State was the first public speech he gave," Reagan said. This was the first time the Landon Lecture Series drew national attention.

The following year, in 1969, Gen. W.C. Westmoreland attracted a large crowd due to interest in the Vietnam War. In 1970, President Richard Nixon and Chief Justice Earl Warren were among the distinguished lecturers. Dan Rather, a reporter at Nixon's Landon Lecture, returned in 1972 to deliver his own lecture.

Other renowned speakers included President Gerald Ford in 1978, Vice President Walter Mondale in 1979, and Secretary of State Edmund Muskie in 1980.

President Ronald Reagan, two-time Landon lecturer, spoke in 1967 as governor of California and in 1982 as president. Reagan's 1982 lecture coincided with the birthday of Alfred M. Landon, whom the lecture series honors.

Sen. Edward Kennedy spoke at a Landon Lecture in 1984 and three noted public officials visited the University in 1985: Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole of Kansas, Speaker of the House Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill and El Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte.

"Once you start getting people of this caliber, it makes it easier and easier to get others to accept (invitations to speak)," Reagan said.

Reagan has been chairman of the Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues since May 1984, when he was chosen by President Duane Acker to fill the position.

The process for inviting speakers to the Landon Lecture Series begins with a list comprising current public figures which is then narrowed by Reagan after conferring with faculty senate leaders, Acker and Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., Reagan said.

"I'll then make a proposal to President Acker that we invite a certain person for a specified month or semester," Reagan said. The invitations are issued after the proposal is approved. Reagan said his goal is to have two Landon Lectures each semester.

"I think it's well worth mentioning that the Lecture Series is supported wholly by the patrons (Landon Lecture Patrons) — not one dime of University money is spent on it," Reagan said.

House would not be feasible, he said.

"There's no way. That would be a waste of money for a basketball court," he said.

"The good Lord knows we sure to hell need a coliseum. The project's got to go through for the good of K-State."

Bramlage foresees no funding problems with the project. There is no danger of alumni contributions being pulled because of controversy surrounding coliseum planning, he said.

"I haven't had one negative call, and I know quite a few of the guys who gave the money. I don't think any backer will back out, if he's a K-Stater. If a man pledges money, he's in it for the duration, unless he goes bankrupt or something," he said. "You never lose the big givers, as a rule. You're not going to lose any money on me."

Bramlage said he was not asked to donate more money to the project after the bids were opened because the regents have frozen the coliseum construction budget at approximately $14.5 million.

"If the money's not available, we'll go out and try to raise enough money on the side," he said.

The future of the coliseum project, including the reduction of seating, is on the agenda of the Sept. 19-20 regents meeting.

Ahearn renovation could provide answer

Not just any book — a book that skillfully depicts traditional American thought and why it must change; a book that, by analogy, depicts precisely the problems with the continuing zealousness to build a new coliseum.

Stewart Udall, who served as Secretary of the Interior for the eight years of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, explains in his book, "Agenda for Tomorrow," that the once essential trait of thinking expansively in building a nation is fast becoming a trait that may bring about the nation's downfall.

Udall acknowledges the difficulty the traditional American has in changing from an expansionist philosophy to a conservationist one, but he insists that we must soon understand that our resources are finite.

It's hard to do, but now is the time for coliseum planners to become conservationists, too.

The original reason for building a new coliseum was that Ahearn Field House, which seats 11,500, needed to be much larger to accommodate growing basketball crowds and an NCAA tournament. The reasoning, which was not based on a formal demographic study, was sold to the students and the public.

It was spurred by the expansionists' optimism until last month when the dismal news broke — the low construction bid was 23 percent over the estimated cost.

The only alternative, planners said, is to scale down the number of seats to 13,500. Still, though — and above all — the planners wanted a new structure.

CATHERINE SAYLER
Collegian Columnist

To sink $14.5 million into land more than a mile away from the core of the campus simply to gain an additional 2,000 seats is, at this point, a wasteful misuse of limited funds.

With proper renovation of Ahearn, the structure could seat 12,500, leaving the gap between old and the "no-frills" new at only 1,000 seats. Cost estimates for the renovation of Ahearn are outdated, but experts agree they fall within the $14.5 million construction budget.

Investing the $14.5 million into a core campus area is the most fiscally responsible move the University could make. Money spent on parking improvements would serve a dual purpose by meeting the needs of the fans as well as the needs of the faculty and students year round.

Because of Ahearn's proximity, it could be used for academic purposes during non-game times. The state of Kansas will pay for the operating expenses of an athletic facility only for the portion of time that it is used for academic purposes. With the Ahearn location, the state would be obligated to share much more of the operating costs, an option that should be attractive to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

In a few years, the KSU Foundation will assume full ownership of the University Ramada Inn. What better way to make the Ramada a profitable business for the Foundation than to have a basketball arena, the Union and, perhaps, an alumni center less than a block away?

A rather unquantifiable advantage is that of leaving the K-State fans with a good impression. The core campus is a beautiful area, one which would welcome fans as they walked toward Ahearn. The same cannot be said of the barren location of the proposed coliseum, a location to which most fans would have to drive.

For alumni, the nostalgia of Ahearn has a certain appeal that would seem to outweigh the need for an extra 1,000 seats.

Those who still cling to the "new is better" concept will argue that K-State must build a new coliseum. Since the University has collected money from alumni for the expressed purpose of a new structure, renovating an old structure would be illegal. All the alumni donations would need to be returned, and a new fund-raising drive for Ahearn would need to begin.

It's time, though, to put money — whatever amount we have — to dual purpose. It's time to reevaluate and study the feasibility of Ahearn renovation. It's time to be sensible and conserve.

Code enforcement needed

In an effort to improve the enforcement of housing code requirements, Manhattan officials have begun plans to double the number of inspectors and institute a licensing program for apartment occupancy.

The effort, scheduled to begin early next year, is to be commended. But let's be aware of continued limitations.

Yes, after Jan. 1 the number of code inspectors for the city will be doubled, reaching a grand total of two.

The code inspection office has been hampered for too long by insufficient funding for personnel. Isn't it asking a lot for two individuals to take care of the huge number of possible violators?

The major change planned is through a proposed inspection program. Current regulations call for inspections only after a complaint is filed, and then only after the tenant or landlord allows entry to the structure.

In the proposed program, computer files will keep an accounting of inspections. This would allow code inspection personnel to know what properties are scheduled for inspection, thus ending inspections made on a complaint basis alone.

In order to continue operation as a rental unit, the property must meet code requirements and be issued an occupancy permit.

Manhattan City Manager Don Harmon acknowledged that some structures may not be able to be brought to code economically. But that will not be an argument, and rightly so, for the structures' continued use for habitation.

The economic viability of a commercial, rental investment should not be a deciding factor in whether or not a building in violation shall be allowed to continue in that state of disrepair.

The predominant factor for enforcement should be whether or not the housing unit meets the regulations. The health and safety of the tenants, not the return on monetary investments to the owner, must be the basis for forced compliance.

None of this means drastic changes in housing conditions will occur overnight, or even in a few weeks after implementation. What it does mean is that instead of sitting around tables talking about the lack of code enforcement, the City Commission has seen fit to provide the funding to enforce existing regulations — something that should have been done years ago.

Evaluations pose dilemma

Efforts to improve methods of evaluating faculty at Board of Regents institutions are currently being attempted by the Student Advisory Committee and the Associated Students of Kansas. They plan to present a proposal to the regents in October.

The proposed changes seem to be written with the students' best interest in mind, while placing pressure on faculty to, for once, "make the grade."

One proposed change would allow students access to the evaluations, an idea some faculty find disagreeable. This idea may sound logical and beneficial to students, but the issue requires examination.

As it stands, evaluation results are overgeneralized. Questions are too superficial to be an accurate representation of what went on in the classroom. If a student gained access to the results, judgment would be based on incomplete information.

Students should not rely on others' attitudes of an instructor. After all, there is no indication the student fulfilled his or her obligation in the learning process.

University departments are currently using different criteria to judge the effectiveness of instructors in the classroom. Considering the diversity among departments, this makes some sense, but all instructors should be required to have certain skills. Namely, the ability to communicate knowledge to a wide variety of students. The instructor must also be able to recognize if he or she isn't effectively doing so, and be willing to adapt the style of teaching to students' needs.

Every student must be thoughtful and conscientious as he or she evaluates, not apathetic or spiteful. Otherwise the evaluation is useless.

But the responsibility to react to an unfavorable evaluation is not the student's. It is the department's. If the instructor does not provide for a quality learning experience, he or she does not belong in education.

The effectiveness of an instructor will influence a student's decision to continue studies at this University. Standards must be outlined and adhered to at department and college levels. For this reason, the standards expected of our faculty should be equal to those expected of our students.

Choice of speaker results in empty seats

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

I was having a hard time writing my column this week, and I was running out of time. I wanted to find out how the professionals — the big men of journalism — handled this pressure, so naturally I went out and bought a Manhattan Mercury.

As I flipped through Tuesday's paper, a picture on the editorial page caught my attention. It was obviously a picture of Monday's Landon Lecture, but something just didn't look quite right, until I read the caption: "Not even floor-level seats were filled for Bush's speech Monday."

Of course, silly me, it was all those empty seats. I would never have figured it out.

Quickly I jumped to the beginning of the editorial:

"There is no other way to say it than to be blunt: The size of the crowd at Monday's Landon Lecture featuring Vice President George Bush was a disappointment...An additional 3,000 persons could have comfortably availed themselves of the opportunity to hear the nation's second-ranking figure."

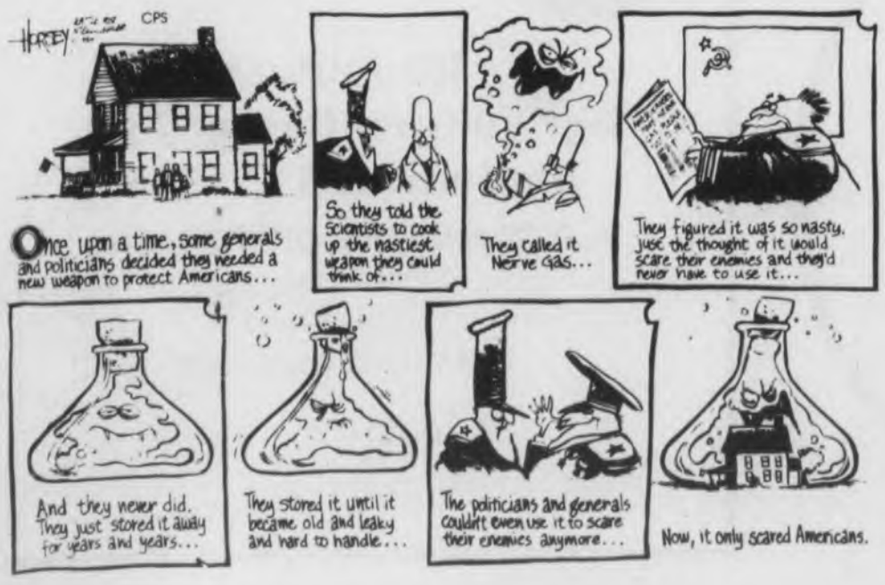
Beginning to get delightfully interested in this article, I continued to read as the editorial began to offer some explanations for the poor showing of students:

"One student suggested that the real problem lay in the University's refusal for security concerns to permit the bringing of backpacks into the field house. So heavily dependent are K-Staters on backpacks, the theory goes, that they would sooner ignore the speech than to consider for one-half of one day the potential employment of their arms to carry textbooks."

Potential employment of their arms? This is an outright insult. I employ my arms everyday.

I could see the student's point, however — even though I don't think I'm dependent on my backpack as much as I am the bomb I carry in my backpack. I would gladly have taken it out if security would have asked me and placed it with the other artillery students often carry to class.



I eagerly read on, for I wanted to see if the column mentioned why I didn't go to the lecture:

"All of which brings us around to the correct answer:, apathy. Where were the students? At the library, the Union, in their dorm rooms."

Nope, not this student. The library wasn't letting people in with "T-95" hats on, the Union always takes my money and I didn't have a residence hall permit to park at the dorms. Where was I? I was in genetics class being apathetic about my upcoming test.

"Unless K-Staters promulgate an alternative explanation for their miserable lack of interest in affairs both of the nation and of the campus, they'll stand indicted as of Monday on a charge of apathy. We assume they'll file the indictment away in their backpacks, and let it accumulate dust for awhile."

Why were there empty seats? Someone who attended the lecture said it best: "Bush didn't say anything. All he did was let big words cover up the issues."

Supporters of coliseum should begin with planning

Editor,

The opening of the construction bids for the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum demonstrated the grand and glorious leadership that we have enjoyed during the 15-month planning period. The normal sequential planning process recommended by the architects was rejected by the administration.

Also, the architects were directed to increase the building capacity by 7 percent without a similar increase in the budget. The University provided two — not one — cost consultants to guide the architects' design and to ensure that there would be no cost overrun.

Now we have an opportunity to do proper planning and in the normal sequence, with professionals.

A 1977 feasibility study showed that Ahearn Field House could be renovated and expanded to 12,600 seats for about $3.8 million. If that price is $5 million today (a "guesstimate"), it would cost $397 per seat to stay in Ahearn.

The coliseum construction is $14.5 million for 13,000 seats (not 13,500 as reported). That figures out to be $1,115 per seat.

Put another way, we will be paying $9.5 million for 400 more seats in the new coliseum than is available in a renovated Ahearn. That's $23,750 per seat for the 400 extra seats. Not a terrific investment in my opinion.

Why not take this opportunity to start at square one in the normal planning process — define the problem instead of giving predetermined solutions to the architects to draw up.

We have many other needs — convention center, faculty/alumni club, parking garage, etc. Let's see if many of these can be accomplished along with the push for basketball.

I propose that we do the following studies to determine need and feasibility: 1) convention center; 2) basketball in Ahearn; 3) additional hotel rooms; 4) parking garage to serve Ahearn, Union, McCain, Nichols, Ramada Inn; 5) faculty/alumni club; and 6) Ramada Inn management of convention/faculty club complex.

The project cost — not construction cost — for this sports/convention center/hotel/faculty club center might just match the $16.1 million for the coliseum out in the boondocks. And I might bet a few quid that it might be lower.

Benefits of this complex are several: It would be campus-centered and student-accessible; the management is already in place; the state will pay all operating costs; and it will be a quality image for the public.

Job prospects bring changes for dietitians

By MARIBETH GOTTSCHALK
Collegian Reporter

Not long ago most people related dietitians to strictly working in a hospital cafeteria. Not anymore. Today, dietitians are finding much greater opportunities.

"The job market is very good. Dietetics is changing, with the increased emphasis on management and the greater number of wellness programs and food service programs," said Faith Roach, associate professor of dietetics.

"The care of the patient is changing. Dietitians are going into private practice and taking on consulting positions with various wellness programs in hospitals," she said.

By the time dietetics students graduate, they have firsthand experience. During their senior year, students are required to spend a management semester in one of the residence halls or work in conjunction with the Union Food Service program. The following semester — the clinical semester — is spent in Wichita at the KSU Dietetics Center.

"This helps in applying themselves to real life situations," Roach said.

Rebecca De Young, senior in dietetics, is currently spending her management semester as the student dietitian for the Clovia 4-H House. She plans menus, orders food, works with inventory and price control, and aids in the selection of food supply companies.

"In the field of dietetics one is really open to creativity. It is important for the dietitian to have his or her own identity, even if it isn't in a clinical setting," De Young said.

De Young spent this past summer in Mexico as the dietitian for TIME for Christ Ministry through the Mexican Ministries of San Antonio, Texas. During her internship she taught Mexicans basic dietetics.

"The setting itself was such a challenge because you didn't have much to work with," De Young said.

The dietetics program at the University offers students the chance to select either a coordinated undergraduate program in dietetics, general dietetics or administrative dietetics.

Farmers use sunflowers as second crop

RANAE YOUNG
Collegian Reporter

Sunflowers have been associated with Kansas as the state flower for many years. Now, due to the increase in doublecropping, sunflowers may also have some commercial value to farmers state wide.

Doublecropping is the practice of growing one crop, harvesting it and immediatly planting a second one. Some Kansas farmers are using sunflowers in combination with wheat, rather than doublecropping with the usual soybeans or grain sorghum, said James Shroyer, extension specialist in crop production.

An advantage in growing sunflowers is the extensive root system, which gathers water from deep in the soil, he said. Sunflowers are also more heat and stress tolerant when moisture is low, as well as being more freeze tolerant than soybeans or grain sorghum.

Another advantage is that farmers can use their regular wheat equipment when they harvest. However, if a smaller sunflower attachment is used, an increase in efficiency can be expected, said David Pacey, assistant professor of agricultural engineering. Some growers have also received good results using a row crop or soybean header when harvesting.

Sunflowers can also be grown in ground prepared for grain sorghum or soybeans. Planting in no-till fields with sunflowers is an additional advantage, conserving moisture after the wheat has been harvested, Shroyer said. The best way to plant is to use a good variety of seed and plant it directly after harvesting.

For the sunflower to gain acceptance in Kansas, it must have a profit potential exceeding soybeans or grain sorghum, he said. High yields and a good constant price for the crop are the two factors that will determine this acceptance.

However, growers must take into consideration the drawbacks when planting sunflowers.

According to Randall Higgins, extension specialist in entomology, insects pose the major threat to sunflowers. Since the cultivated sunflower is so close in type to the wild native variety, they are often plagued by many of the same pests.

"The Sunflower moth is the most serious general pest which affects the plants. The larvae does the damage by boring into the seed after hatching," Higgins said. "To stop the larvae a grower must get the Thiodan spray (an insecticide) on early, while they are still near the top of the head. If they do not, it is very hard to stop their destruction of the seed."

The storage and transportation of sunflower seeds is also a problem because of light weight and bulkiness, Shroyer added.

"Farmers can get burned growing sunflowers if they do not know proper growing procedures," he said. "Combine this with a serious pest problem and low prices and a farmer can lose his whole operation in one year.

"On the other hand, sunflowers are like any crop, if the grower knows how to properly raise them he will be successful in production," Shroyer said.

Nuclear war elicits famine, scientists say

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Billions of people who somehow survived the first blasts of a nuclear war would merely face drawn-out deaths by starvation, an international scientific group said Thursday in a new study supporting the theory of a crop-ruining global "nuclear winter."

Though an image of total devastation after a nuclear attack may well be accurate for areas around actual targets, one of the report's authors said famine conditions in unscathed areas would be far more typical as hundreds of millions of tons of black smoke drastically cut sunlight and robbed crops of needed warmth and light from the sun.

"We are left with images of Ethiopia and the Sudan as being more representative of what the world would look like after a nuclear war for most of the people than the sorts of images we have of Hiroshima and Nagasaki," Mark Harwell of Cornell University said at a news conference on the report.

He said it estimated famine deaths of 1 billion to 4 billion of the world's 5 billion people after direct blast and radiation effects of actual attacks cost several hundred million lives.

"The main mechanism by which people would die after a large-scale nuclear war would not be blast effect, would not be burns, would not be radiation but rather would be mass starvation," he said.

The two-volume report, prepared by a special committee of the International Council of Scientific Unions, suggests that black smoke from nuclear attacks on urban areas — the main trigger for a "nuclear winter" — would cause sudden and perhaps long-term declines in temperatures and in light reaching the Earth, even in nations far from those attacked.

Pastureland to playground: Park exhibits historical variety

By KITSY BOSNAK
Contributing Writer

The Manhattan City Park, where many students and residents jog and play tennis, is rich in historical background.

The park boundaries — Fremont Street on the north, Poyntz Avenue to the south, 11th Street on the east and 14th Street to the west — and dimensions have remained the same since the Cincinnati and Kansas Land Company reserved the original site for the park in 1855.

Owen Jones, a retired farmer and a member of the Riley County Historical Society, said the park was nothing but a pasture before 1870. A trail ran from the Blue River on the east, through the town and the park itself, to the Kansas River on the south, he said.

The first actual utilization of the park, however, was as a fairground. According to a 1961 Manhattan Mercury article, the annual Riley County Fair took place in the park for three days in late summer during the 1870s and early 1880s. Bedspreads, quilts, canned goods, bread, homemade jams and other items were displayed in a wooden building in the northeast section of the park.

Jones said this building was replaced in 1875 by one made of stone, known as Horticulture Hall. The hexagonal stone building still stands in its original location and is now known as the Round-House Dance Studio, where lessons are conducted.

According to Jones' collected records, the fair had been moved out of the park by 1890, the year the Park Commission was created. Townspeople wanted the park to be divided when the city grew near park boundaries, but city officials wouldn't allow it.

Park Superintendent Jerry Dishman said that for many years the park's fountain, erected in 1895, was allowed to run on the city's water pressure. It was, in effect, a giant faucet in the park which was continually left open. After an electrical pump was installed, Dishman and several other park officials decided that the fountain was too dangerous to be left running. Children waded through the fountain, which was quite deep and often full of broken glass and garbage, so it was drained. Dishman said plans are now being made to renovate the fountain, install a new pump system and move it near the city's rose garden.

Near the fountain's present location stands a large granite obelisk erected in 1904. It is a monument honoring the Harahey Indian tribe, which inhabited the Manhattan area in the 16th century. Jones said the chief of the tribe, Tatarrax, and his warriors supposedly met with Coronado while the explorer passed near Manhattan on his journey in search of the city of Quivira.

Coronado had been told by his Indian guides that Quivira was filled with gold and riches, but it was, in fact, just another village. The inscription upon the obelisk reads, 'Harahey, Governed by Chief Tatarrax, Discovered by Coronado, 1541, Rediscovered by J.V. Brower, 1896, Erected by W.J. Griffing and F.B. Elliot for Quivira Historical Society, 1904, Kansas, U.S.A.'

According to a 1904 Manhattan Nationalist article, Griffing was an archeologist living in Riley County at the time and Brower, an archeologist from St. Paul, Minn., was president of the Quivira Historical Society. These men had been working with remains found in village sites and burial grounds in the Manhattan area.

Jones' records show that in 1910 the first playground, with slides and swings, was opened and in 1916 the log cabin, located near the swimming pool, was completed. The Mercury article said the cabin was built to show young people the kind of house the first settlers lived in. It was built of walnut logs contributed mainly by the descendants of pioneer settlers in this area.

The log cabin was built in the traditional way, with those who built it hewing the logs and notching the ends so that they would lock into each other. In 1960, the cabin was chinked, which means that the cracks between the logs were filled in with plaster.

In 1920, according to Jones' records, the City Band began to play in what is now the Pavillion. This building presently is used for many activities, including ice skating in the winter.

The well-known rose garden was built in 1927 by the Manhattan Kiwanis Club. In 1941, many of the roses were killed by a November frost after that year's mild autumn. The Kiwanis Club divided payment with the city for 1,100 roses ordered to replace those lost. Dishman said a trust fund has been set up for the maintenance of the garden, and any person, by contacting City Hall, can donate money which will be used to purchase roses for the park.

The first baseball diamonds and tennis courts were built in the 1930s and the swimming pool opened in 1938.

That big man standing at the corner of 11th and Poyntz really isn't Paul Bunyan.

Many area residents know his name is Johnnie Kaw and the scythe, or sickle, he holds gives him away as being a representation of the Kansas wheat farmer.

Attorneys

attorneys include providing legal counseling, advice and representation for the institution.

Seaton said their work involves administrators, faculty or student organizations involved with the University.

"We do some work with the Union, UPC (Union Program Council) and SGA (Student Governing Association), but the student attorney does a lot of this work," Seaton said.

The students' attorney is Dianne Urban, whose office is located in the SGS office. Seaton said students with legal problems should see her for advice.

"Students who have legal problems should go to the student attorney. We can't help them here unless it's an institutional problem," Seaton said.

Thompson said her work concerns a wide range of legal matters — from personal advice to environmental regulations to reviewing of contracts.

Most of the litigation is in the hands of Seaton because it was pending before Thompson was hired. However, the workload has been divided.

Some of the more recent cases for Seaton include two employment discrimination cases last year. One concerned two assistant professors in the College of Home Economics, Patty Annis and Albie Rasmussen, who were denied promotions. Another was a racial discrimination suit brought by a Union secretary, Brenetta Kerney, who was demoted. Seaton said the University won both cases.

A trial date for another discrimination case, brought by former assistant women's basketball coach Sally Anthony, has not been set, Seaton said.

ASK

Chamblin of the decision is in the mail, Elmore said.

Elmore said Polack resigned "for the good of the association." He said Polack said he had a question in his mind as to whether ASK was becoming a political issue at KU.

Elmore said the KU student senate was "party-oriented," and this caused some problems for Polack.

Chamblin indicated that Polack's decision was not recent and he was planning to step down anyway.

Chamblin said he hasn't had time to make any plans for his new position.

Appeal

ATO, denied the allegations and said he felt the sanctions were "inappropriate." Hermes also would not comment on the charges or the sanctions while the matter is still being appealed.

The ATOs appealed the board of directors' ruling to the IFC at a special meeting on Sept. 4. The IFC voted to uphold the board of director's sanctions.

The IFC is composed of presidents of all fraternities recognized by the Office of Greek Affairs.

Hermes said the ATOs are appealing the "entire process" — meaning the alleged hazing acts and the sanctions. In the first appeal, the ATOs only appealed certain sanctions.

Arroyo said when the ATOs first appealed the sanctions at the Aug. 26 IFC meeting, it was a "snap decision" by the fraternity because they wanted to make a statement about the charges. Arroyo said the ATOs had up to 10 days to file an appeal.

"I understand they expounded a lot more on this appeal than they did on the first one," Arroyo said. "There's a discrepancy problem. It's like, yes they admitted this happened, but ATO doesn't think it was hazing."

At Sutton's urging, the fraternity will abide by the sanctions even though they're not required to do so while the matter is under appeal.

Also on the agenda for today's meeting will be a discussion of a new University alcohol policy which was drafted by the Ad Hoc Committee on Campus Drinking — a group formed this summer consisting of students and University personnel.

The student affairs council meets at 3 p.m. in Anderson Hall. It's the council's first meeting this semester.

Student pianist experiences music diversity

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

For an hour, page after page of musical notes were transferred from Don Livingston's mind to his finger tips as he played several movements from various Beethoven sonatas.

Etudes of Chopin and a rhapsody composed by Rachmaninoff drifted from the Union Art Gallery Thursday as Livingston performed as part of Midday Arts, sponsored by the Union Program Council Arts Committee.

From a family of six children — five of them musical — Livingston, a sophomore in the piano performance option of music, has made the past 15 years piano-playing years.

After hearing Livingston perform, one wouldn't think that for several years he was quite frustrated and felt the time spent at the piano restricted him.

Livingston said he got a "boost" when he won the piano division at the Topeka Civic Symphony Youth Auditions, as a sophomore in high school.

"I don't have the resentment anymore," Livingston said. "I feel comfortable because now I have a choice, I don't have to play."

In the fall of 1984, Livingston said pain in his arm caused him to retreat from playing for three months. Deciding it was some sort of tendinitis, Livingston took up voice lessons and decided to minor in harp.

"That year I went through a phase where I had to establish within myself that there are things I can do in music without ever touching a piano again," Livingston said.

"It (playing the harp) was one of the most frustrating things. It's so easy to make mistakes, but when you learn how to play one thing well, then that's a glorious feeling.

"With this exposure to other idioms of music I became aware that solo piano isn't the only thing for me to do," Livingston said.

Livingston's arm pains him less as he continues to play the piano and this fall he is broadening his musical experiences by playing the bass drum in the marching band.

"Because of my diversity in music, I'm just a heavy-duty music appreciator," Livingston said.

Along with enjoying music, Livingston appreciates a good performance.

"A good performance is the ultimate thing every performer has to come to," he said. "I've seen technical wizards at pianos and not been impressed with them because they didn't perform well.

"It's when a performer knows that he is adequately prepared and is performing at the best of his ability that it is a good performance."

Performances involve a lot of work and the "delicacies" have to be worked out, Livingston said.

"The delicacies of ways to play involve how you use your arms, the tension in your neck or if you're all cramped over the piano," Livingston said. A pianist needs to work these out before he can advance, he said, "or you can no longer improve."

Livingston said the combination of naturals, flats and spaces in music are the guidelines for the basis of causing an effect — a road map for making an image in mind.

"I hope to always create the effect that the composer had in mind," he said.

"I may not always be playing this hard (degree) of music. I hope to be playing more difficult music.

"The difficulty of the music has nothing to do with the ability of the performer," he said.

Simply playing the piano, Livingston said, is the most important thing an aspiring pianist can do.

"If you're playing or considering it as a profession, you need to consider how serious you are about it. It becomes more than a hobby."

Livingston encourages people not to limit themselves to just the kind of music they like, because people tend to reject music they're unfamiliar with because they don't understand it.

"There's a niche for everybody in books and there's a niche for everybody in music."

Catskeller location for UPC dance

By The Collegian Staff

A night of lights, music and "ultimate entertainment" is planned for students tonight in the Union Catskeller.

Union Program Council is sponsoring an All University Dance from 9 p.m. to midnight.

"There's free admission, refreshments and we'll be raffling off prizes," said Janice Kiser, Union program adviser. "We'll be giving away albums, coupons and candy from area merchants and from the Union.

"We're not just targeting the freshman. We just want to provide a place where students can go besides the bars where they have to fight the crowds."

Previous to tonight's dance, UPC has sponsored a video dance in connection with Late Night at K-State Union. Tonight the music entertainment will be provided by Dave Turner, who is donating the use of his system and running it, Kiser said.

"We use a lot of audience participation," Turner said, "like a request line where a girl from the audience can dedicate a song to her boyfriend over the speakers and the whole room can hear it.

"Instead of the disc jockey being the star, the people are the stars."

Kiser said if tonight's dance is a success, it may be made into a monthly event.

Music instructor views harp as 'wonderful' for beginners

By LISA BOOTHE
Staff Writer

Elaine Christy can't stop harping on what has been instrumental in her life. But that's because the harp is her instrument.

Christy came to K-State last semester as the harp instructor for elementary music methods. Yet she is more than a teacher. She is a performer.

This summer Christy was selected as one of 33 harpists to perform at the International Harp Competition in Israel. Although this was an honor for her, she attributes an even greater glory to winning the best performer title at the National Harp Competition in 1984.

"Winning the national was the biggest," Christy said. "But every competition is a whole new ball game. I don't necessarily believe in competing as an end in itself, but it was a vehicle for me to use to become known to other harpists and to make myself more visible."

Christy received a cash award for her national victory in addition to an orchestral solo performance with a professional symphony in Indiana.

But before the honors, comes the hard work, and Christy has certainly paid her dues in studying and practice. She received her bachelor's degree in music education from William Penn College in Oskaloosa, Iowa. From there she went to the University of Kansas to receive her master's degree in music in harp performance.

As a Topeka resident, Christy said she performs in area restaurants and dinner theaters and at receptions and weddings. However, she prefers concert music to clubs and with that, she enjoys solo performances more than ensemble work.

In fact, Christy seems to find plenty of opportunities to practice because audiences are willing to listen. And not just orchestra fans. The harp is becoming quite popular in the contemporary music industry as well.

"The popular side of the harp is really taking off big," Christy said. "Most harpists are finding they at least have to perform popular music rather than in the classical field to make it as a living. Of course, this is still easy-listening music.

"However, a man named Andreas Vollenweider is really making a big splash in this country. He has more of a rock group sound with a mixture of different rhythms. He has his harp amplified into more of an electronic sound. He's the first person who's really sort of made it like this, and I think it's great. It's another facet of the harp — another side of it that I think is super."

Christy attributes the harp's gain in popularity to the work of the American Harp Society, a 2,800 member organization less than 40 years old.

"The Harp Society's goal is to promote the harp as a solo instrument because it's always been known as an orchestral instrument. Through their efforts, people have become more aware of it. But it certainly has a long way to go. It's still not a common instrument."

As a child, Christy began tugging on harp strings while she was still tugging on apron strings.

"It was a dream I had in my head ever since I was 6 or 7 years old. I just kept talking about it to my mom, but it was an unheard of thing in our small, Midwestern town of Fremont, Iowa. My mom didn't take me seriously, but she just happened to mention it to a music teacher."

To hear Christy play now, one would think that music teacher was the storybook angel with the golden harp — the one who's had all of eternity to practice. That's close. It was a Catholic nun with a rather rickety, old instrument who taught at the Catholic college in a nearby city.

"She taught me the basics on it, and I stayed with her all through college," Christy said. "That was over 10 years ago, but I still send her cards at Christmas."

Although Christy has had piano training, learning to play the harp was a technically difficult task because the harpist uses the feet as well as the hands.

"The seven pedals provide the sharps and flats and are like the black keys on a piano. There's a lot of technique involved in it, and you have to get past that before you can even start to play it. Also, it's similar to other stringed instruments in that you have to keep tuning it, unlike the piano where it is set."

Yet Christy encourages parents to teach their children to play the harp regardless of its difficulty.

"It's a wonderful beginner's instrument because it sounds beautiful when you start out. It's never offensive to the ears while you're learning because it's a pleasing sound. And that's a plus to a child when they're beginning."

It's a leap of faith to say Christy decided her future when she was only 6 years old, but it is not unlikely that she is accomplished because she realized early on the value of her opportunity.

"I knew playing the harp was an expensive endeavor, and I couldn't even afford my own harp until high school. So to me, it was a serious thing. I never just considered it a passing thing, and I think that is why I still play today."

Parachutist falls to death in drug deal

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Andrew Carter Thornton II, a former narcotics officer and suspended lawyer who plunged to his death from a plane holding $14 million worth of cocaine, had a history of drug and arms involvement across the nation.

"I'm glad his parachute didn't open. I hope he got a hell of a high out of that (cocaine)," said Brian Leighton, an assistant U.S. attorney in Fresno, Calif. He once prosecuted Thornton on a marijuana trafficking charge.

The body of Thornton, 40, a native of Paris, Ky., was found Wednesday on a driveway in Knoxville, Tenn. He was heavily armed, carried 77 pounds of cocaine in an Army duffle bag, and was attached to a parachute that had failed to open.

A key that investigators found on his body bore an identification number matching that of a plane that crashed while on autopilot earlier that morning, 60 miles away, Knoxville Detective Allen Hale said Thursday.

Tennessee police believe he was supposed to meet someone on the ground to deliver the cocaine.

Knoxville Police Lt. Jerry Day described Thornton as "a kind of survivalist, an individual who was expecting trouble and ready for it."

He joined the Lexington police in 1968 and stayed for nine years. In 1981, The Lexington Herald quoted sources as saying Thornton had set up the department's intelligence squad.

The same year he was among 25 men accused at Fresno, Calif., in a theft of weapons from the China Lake Naval Weapons Center and of conspiring to smuggle 1,000 pounds of marijuana into the United States.

Numerous news reports in 1981 and 1982 linked the ring, which included several former Lexington policemen and other Kentuckians, to a larger group known as "The Company."

Students inform Senate of possible renovation

By the Collegian Staff

A group of students informed Student Senate at its weekly meeting Thursday of their intention to present a plan for the renovation of Ahearn Field House to the Board of Regents.

During senate's open period Steve Scott, fifth-year student in architectural engineering, said the group is going to present a 1977 feasibility study on the renovation to the regents at their Sept. 20 meeting in Topeka.

The feasibility study estimated the cost of renovating Ahearn at $3.7 million but costs are now estimated at $8 million. The current estimation was reached by rounding to the nearest million the 1977 figure and then doubling that figure, Scott said.

The renovation plans in the feasibility study include adding a second balcony above the existing balcony in Ahearn, improving the acoustics and making improvements to comply with current fire codes, he said.

Scott said the renovations will free space to allow seating for 12,600.

In legislative action, senate approved a bill calling for the revision of the Business Administration College Council constitution and heard first readings of a bill establishing the Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee and a resolution showing senate's support for the campus United Way fund-raising activities.

The Business Council constitution revision establishes five committees within the council, provides for proxy voting by deleting the one-vote-per-student clause and changes the council membership requirements.

The ad hoc committee legislation establishes a committee consisting of five student senators and three at-large students to allocate the $700,000 available through the refinancing of current student debt. The committee will present its recommendations to senate by Oct. 24.

Mark Jones, senior in management and student senate chairman, will serve as committee chairman. The bill also proposes that Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for educational and student services, be a non-voting member of the committee.

Both the ad hoc committee bill and the United Way resolution will be voted on at the next senate meeting.

Wildcats, Northern Iowa to search for first win of season

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Two teams looking to rebound from upset losses in their season openers will square off Saturday when K-State plays host to the University of Northern Iowa at 4 p.m in KSU Stadium.

The contest will be the first meeting between the two schools.

K-State is coming off a tough 16-10 loss to Wichita State University. Northern Iowa lost its season opener to Drake University 24-9. Both teams were haunted by turnovers in their season-opening defeats.

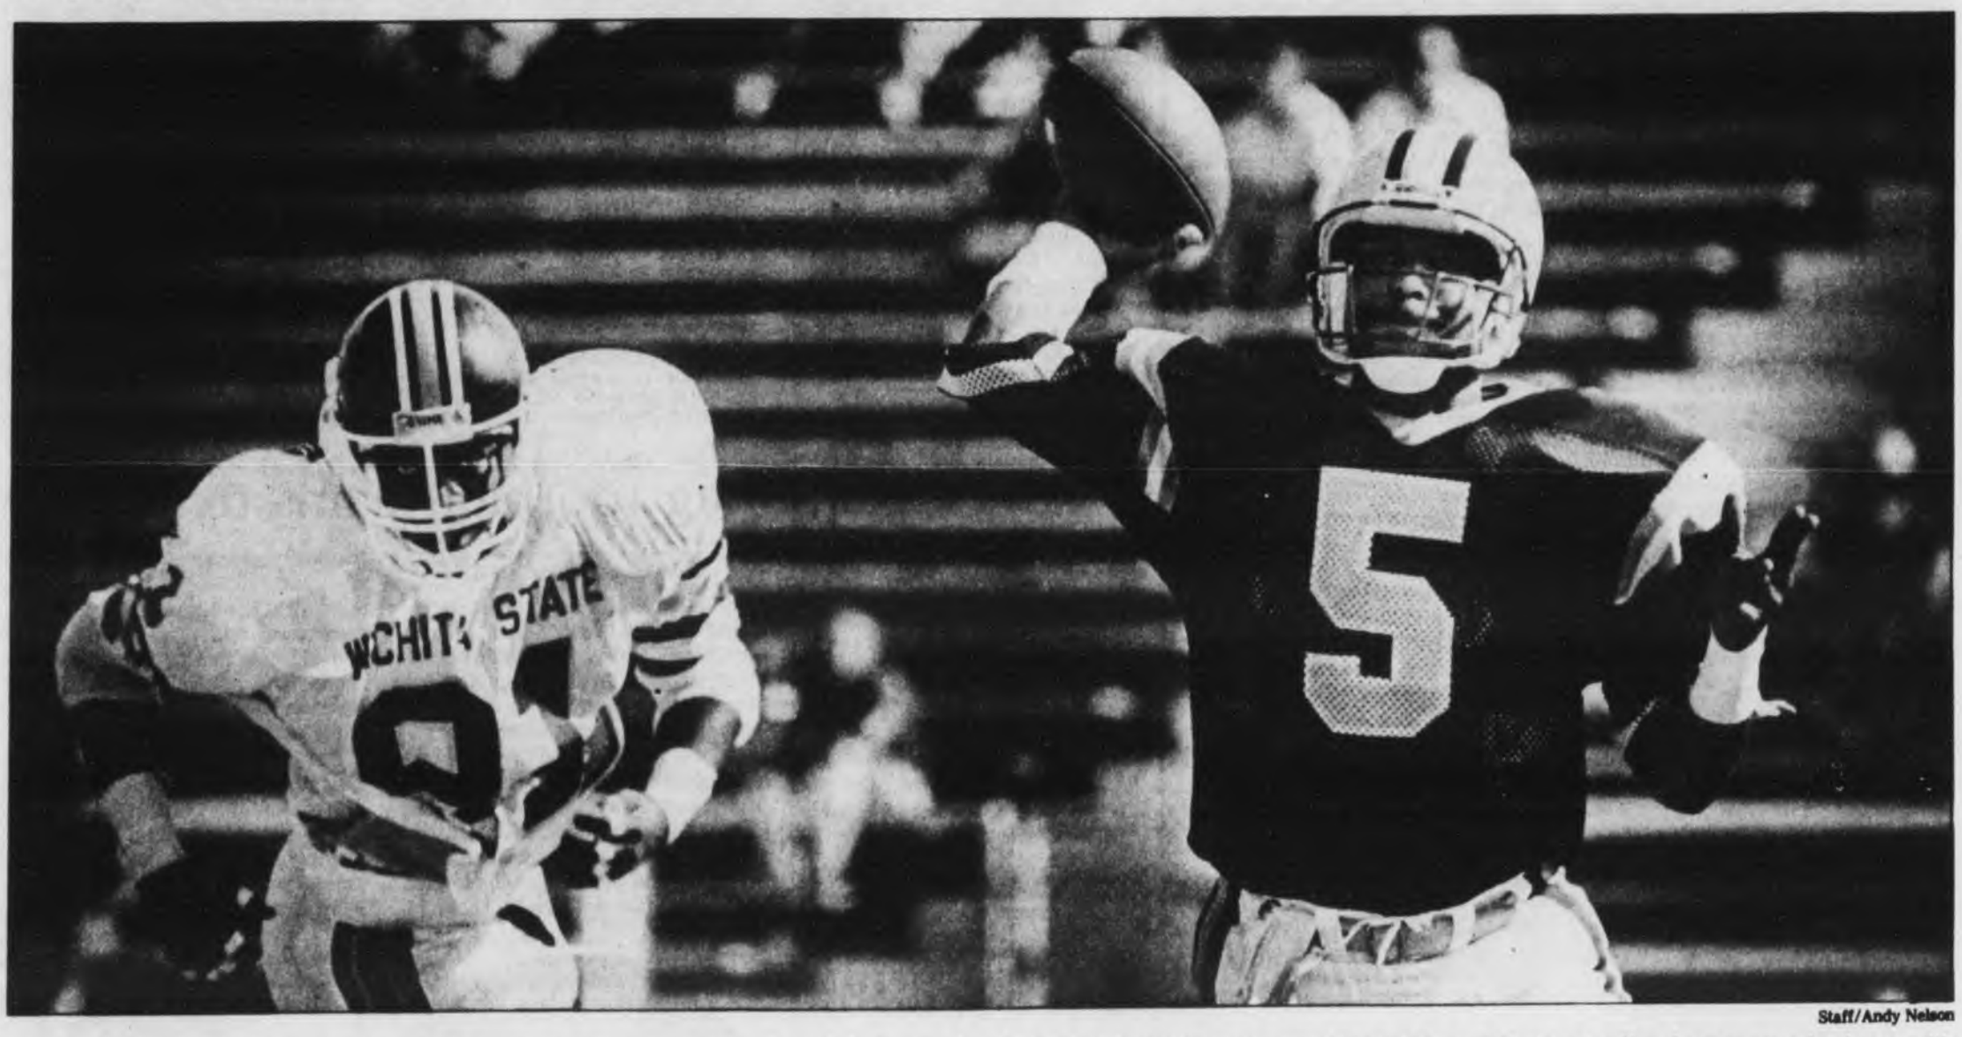
The Wildcats lost four fumbles and quarterback Randy Williams threw two interceptions against Wichita State. K-State turned the ball over on three successive possessions in the third quarter as Wichita State extended a 10-3 halftime lead to a 16-3 advantage at the end of the quarter.

Northern Iowa also lost the ball four times on fumbles and twice on interceptions. Two fourth-quarter turnovers were a key in the loss for the Panthers. Northern Iowa led 9-3 after three quarters, but the two turnovers led to two Drake touchdowns as the Bulldogs rolled to 21 fourth-quarter points.

Both coaches, Jim Dickey of K-State and Darrell Mudra of Northern Iowa, said eliminating mistakes would be important in the success of their clubs on Saturday.

"We missed a lot of blocking assignments at the key points of attack against Wichita State, and our defensive line missed some execution assignments," Dickey said. "We've got to cut down on those kind of mistakes in order to defeat Northern Iowa."

Mudra said his club was both outplayed and outcoached against Drake.



"I have to call a smarter game," the Panther coach said. "The biggest difference between our performance and Drake's was that we — both coaches and players — didn't perform.

"We have enough talent to play a good game against Kansas State, and if we get the breaks we could win it. But we need to eliminate the mistakes we made against Drake."

Both teams have freshman-redshirt placekickers who enjoyed successful debuts.

Northern Iowa's Mike Angell tied a school record with three field goals in the Drake contest. He connected

K-State quarterback Randy Williams hopes he spends less time scrambling from defenders and more time getting the Wildcat offense on track Saturday when he leads the team against the University of Northern Iowa in KSU Stadium. Both teams suffered season-opening losses with K-State losing to Wichita State 16-10 and the Panthers falling to Drake University 24-9.

Football team needs more than moral victories

TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

The moral victory — indeed, an essential term in the vocabulary of any K-State football enthusiast.

K-State hasn't won a lot of football games over the past 25 years. But most people know that. They just don't know how bad K-State truly has been.

In the last 25 years, K-State has had exactly two, count 'em — two, winning seasons and one bowl team.

With last week's embarrassing loss to Wichita State University, this losing trend does not appear ready to turn itself around.

With teams like Texas Christian University, the University of Oklahoma, the University of Nebraska and Oklahoma State University coming up on K-State's schedule, it might just be time to look at Wildcat football on a different set of terms — in terms of the moral victory.

While upsets do happen in the Big Eight (remember the University of Kansas' stunning victory over Oklahoma last year), they are rare, especially in games involving K-State.

K-State hasn't had a legitimate upset in the Big Eight since defeating Oklahoma in both 1969 and '70 when Vince Gibson was the Wildcats' head coach.

Every season in recent memory has begun with a sense of optimism surrounding the Wildcat football program. Every year, people begin to think that this year is going to be the year that the 'Cats are going to turn things around.

1982 seemed to be the turning point. K-State had a respectable season of six wins, five losses and a tie. One of those losses came in the Independence Bowl to the University of Wisconsin. It seemed that K-State had turned things around.

For Wildcat fans, though, it was nothing but a false alarm. The 1983 team finished 3-8. The 1984 team finished 3-7. Things had returned to normal at KSU Stadium.

Now back to the loss to Wichita State.

K-State didn't show a lot in that loss to the Shockers. The 'Cats offense never got on track. The new passing attack that was supposed to improve the offense fell victim to a lightly regarded Wichita State pass rush. Because the offense couldn't control the ball, K-State's defense spent much of the game on the field.

If K-State can't beat Wichita State, how can they win in the Big Eight? If the loss to the Shockers has set the tone for the year, maybe it's time to re-assess how fans should watch K-State football.

The next best thing to a win is a moral victory. If K-State can't actually win any Big Eight games, then a moral victory can serve as a substitute.

No, a moral victory isn't that much fun, but who cares? It's better than not winning at all.

Against teams like Oklahoma, Nebraska and Oklahoma State, even a moral victory for K-State will be next to impossible. But if K-State could hold any of these three teams to under 30 points, it should be declared a moral victory for the Wildcats.

KU will also present tough opposition as well, especially in Lawrence, where K-State hasn't won since 1969. K-State would have to play the Jayhawks to within 14 points to claim

Spikers open season in home tournament

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

The K-State volleyball team opens the season today at home in the Ninth Annual K-State Invitational. All matches during the weekend tournament will be played in Ahearn Field House.

Other teams in the competition are Wichita State University, Montana State University, Drake University and Oral Roberts University.

Action will begin at 9:30 a.m. with Oral Roberts and Wichita State squaring off, followed by Drake and Montana State at 1:30 p.m.

At 3:30 p.m., the Wildcats play their first match against cross-state rival Wichita State — a team which Head Coach Scott Nelson said K-State can't overlook.

"Wichita State is a young squad under the direction of third-year coach Phil Shoemaker," Nelson said. "They are a much improved team, but we should have more experience since they are so young."

A match between Oral Roberts and Drake will follow at 5:30 p.m.

The final game of the evening will take place at 7:30 p.m. with K-State taking on Montana State.

"The Montana State game has two important aspects to it," Nelson said. "They are the top team in the Mountain West Conference, and their coach was one of the assistants of the gold medal U.S. men's volleyball team at the 1984 Olympics.

"Montana has a very positive and disciplined program. They are big, strong, physical. It is a real important match for us."

The next opponent for the Wildcats will be the Drake Bulldogs at 1 p.m. Saturday.

"We are really looking forward to playing Drake in the tournament," Nelson said. "They have the tradition of having an excellent program. They are a large team and are very physical along the net."

The final contest on Saturday will be at 5 p.m. between K-State and Oral Roberts.

The teams participating in the tournament will offer K-State a variety of competition, Nelson said.

"The competition is going to be good. It is going to be a good measuring stick for us to see how we will do against other competition," Nelson said.

Nelson brings into the tournament a squad consisting of five returning starters from last year's team. In addition, a group of recruits are expected to see a great deal of action.

In 1984 Whitney was the fourth-leading attacker in the Big Eight Conference and was ranked 10th nationally. A 1985 All-American candidate, Whitney will direct the K-State offense, which was ranked in the top 20 last season.

Lee also earned a number of honors. She was ranked second in the Big Eight in both kills and defensive digs per game.

A kill refers to an attack that ends with either a point scored or a side-out. It can be either a tip over the net or a spike, Nelson said.

Both Lee and Whitney earned first-team All-Mid-American region honors during the spring United States Volleyball Association season. Whitney also was chosen as the Most Valuable Player at the regional championships.

Another returning player for Nelson is Mary Kinsey, a sophomore from Decatur, Ind.

"The most dynamic offensive player on the squad is Mary Kinsey. She finished fifth in the Big Eight in kills per game and was eighth in defensive saves per game," Nelson said.

One of the biggest surprises of this year's recruits is Shawnee Call, Nelson said.

"Shawnee is one of the top athletes in the state," Nelson said. "She is 5 feet 11 inches and has a vertical jump of 30 inches. She is aggressive both offensively and defensively, and she can hit and block. She is just exciting to watch."

Softball team to compete in NU tourney

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's softball team travels to Lincoln, Neb., today to compete in the Nebraska Invitational softball tournament.

The 'Cats will kick off the three-day tournament against the University of Nebraska at 5 p.m.

Saturday the Wildcats will play four games: Southwest Missouri State University at 9 a.m.; Iowa State University at 11 a.m.; University of Kansas at 1 p.m; and Kearney State College at 5 p.m.

The final game for K-State will be played at 9 a.m. Sunday against Illinois State University.

The Wildcats head into the tournament with a 2-0 record following 8-1 and 2-0 victories against Johnson County Community College.

In the first contest against Johnson County, K-State collected eight runs on 15 hits. Johnson County managed only one run on five hits.

In the second game, K-State pounded out eight hits to Johnson County's three.

Flag football teams to play in tournament

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's Phi Delta Theta fraternity will hold its Third Annual "Score for Charity" Flag Football Tournament today through Sunday at Memorial Stadium.

The double-elimination tournament will feature nine men's teams and eight women's teams. The field at Memorial Stadium and two additional fields located south of the stadium will be used by participants.

Play in the men's division begins tonight at 5:30 with Beta Theta Pi fraternity against Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Phi Wacka Jacka meeting Sigma Phi Epsilon. At 6:30, Tau Kappa Epsilon will play the Phi Delts and Sigma Chi will face Pi Kappa Alpha. Marlatt 3 will play the winner of the Beta-SAE game at 9 a.m. Saturday.

The women's division play will also get under way at 9 a.m. Saturday with Alpha Chi Omega meeting Kappa Alpha Theta and Pi Beta Phi playing Alpha Xi Delta. At 10 a.m. the games will feature Alpha Delta Pi vs. Sigma Sigma Sigma and Delta Delta Delta vs. Chi Omega.

Finals are scheduled for Sunday afternoon. The women's final will be played at 3 p.m. followed by the men's championship game at 4 p.m.

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis will present trophies following the championship games.

Proceeds from a $1 donation ticket for the general public and a $25 entry fee from each team will go to the National ALS Foundation (Lou Gehrig's disease). Gehrig was a member of the Phi Delt fraternity.

Moral

a moral victory.

The other three conference teams are lightly regarded, almost as lightly regarded as K-State, but not quite.

A 7-point margin of defeat at the hands of either the University of Missouri or the University of Colorado would be a moral victory. In some years, K-State would have a chance to defeat one or both of these schools. But since the 'Cats are playing both of these teams on the road, a moral victory (a defeat of seven points or less) will just have to do.

The Nov. 16 home date with Iowa State University presents the best chance for a legitimate conference victory for the 'Cats. But based on seeing the Wildcats last Saturday against Wichita State, this, too, could be deemed a moral victory opportunity with a 3-point or less defeat at the hands of the Cyclones.

Some might term this an unfair assessment of the K-State football team. It was meant to be.

But if this column lights a fire under the Wildcat football team, then it has served its purpose.

K-State has the capability to win football games this season. They just didn't happen to show that capability last week against Wichita State.

Saturday against the University of Northern Iowa would be a good place for the Wildcat football team to start showing K-State fans they can win.

'Cats

from 47, 29 and 27 yards to equal the Panther record for most field goals in a single game.

K-State's Mark Porter was successful on his first collegiate field goal attempt, a 47-yarder, to give the 'Cats an early 3-0 lead against Wichita State. He added an extra point following quarterback Randy Williams' touchdown run late in the contest.

UPI drops plan to withdrawl from news service contract

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — United Press International is dropping plans to ask a federal bankruptcy judge to cancel the news agency's contract with the Wire Service Guild, a company spokesman said Thursday.

UPI also has agreed to include the union in an informal process of evaluating potential buyers for the news service, which is reorganizing under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy law, UPI spokesman William Adler said.

The company's action followed the Guild's announcement Wednesday that it had retained an investment adviser to search for a buyer for UPI.

UPI management, which has sought wage and benefit concessions from the union, earlier this summer petitioned the bankruptcy court to void the Guild's contract with employees. The union responded by saying it would ask members for strike authorization if the court approved the request.

Judge George Bason Jr. referred the dispute to federal mediation, but talks collapsed last month. A UPI spokesman said last week the company would ask the judge again to void the contract.

But Adler quoted UPI Chairman Luis Nogales as saying Thursday, "I have no plans at this time to resubmit the petition" to terminate the contract.

Adler said a joint committee would be formed of representatives of UPI, the Guild and UPI's court-appointed investment advisor to evaluate prospective purchasers.

Messages left for a guild official in Washington, D.C., late Thursday were not returned, and telephone calls to Guild offices in New York were not answered.

Downtown

1977 should serve as an indication of his commitment to downtown Manhattan.

Morris said he took a "worn-out, dilapidated former grocery store" as a private enterprise at a high risk and improved the area with his own money.

"If I was getting a fair price I'd say to hell with it and take it to the bank," Morris said. "But we feel it's worth more than the offer given and have engaged an attorney.

"We'll go to court and take our chances."

Ruth Schrum, owner of the building housing Lady Foot Shoes, 221 Poyntz Ave., said the city's offer was "extremely low. I can't understand what they're doing."

"It's just very upsetting," Schrum said. "They want this (property). We didn't want them to buy...they should have to pay for this."

She also said a group of business and property owners not satisfied with the prices offered are planning a meeting for tonight to discuss the offers.

"The project is really involving me...more than I would like to be involved," Schrum said. "But somehow we will work through it."

Manhattan Mayor Suzanne Lindamood said the city has made offers "based on two separate appraisals and until we hear back from property owners" it's hard to say if the appraisals were fair or not.

"It's a forced sale," Lindamood said. "We don't have a normal market for offerings."

The mayor also noted that "everything is open to further discussion. Every property owner has the right to bring it (the offer) back."

The redevelopment project, which has been in the planning stages for 10 years, is to include the Manhattan Regional Shopping Mall, a Service-Commercial Plaza in the 300 block of Colorado Street, and the Colony Square office project in the 500 block of Poyntz Avenue.

Stith said demolition may begin this October, with an opening date for the shopping mall set for August 1987. The city is receiving $9 million from an Urban Development Action Grant to help finance site acquisition and land preparation for the downtown mall.

Dickey resigns after Wildcat losses

By TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

Jim Dickey's era as head football coach at K-State is over.

Speculation surrounding Dickey's possible departure from the position mushroomed with K-State's 16-10 loss to Wichita State University Sept. 7 and intensified after K-State's 10-6 loss to the University of Northern Iowa on Saturday. However, no official announcement had been made until Sunday in regard to Dickey's future as Wildcat coach.

Athletic Director Larry Travis ended the speculation in a 4 p.m. news conference Sunday in the Conference Room of the K-State Union. Travis announced that Dickey had voluntarily resigned as Wildcat head coach, effective immediately.

Travis said that he received no pressure from alumni or President Duane Acker to force Dickey's resignation. However, when questioned whether or not he would have asked for Dickey's resignation had Dickey not offered it himself, Travis replied, "Probably so."

Travis named Lee Moon, formerly K-State's assistant athletic director for operations, as the interim coach for the remainder of the football season. For the past three seasons, Moon served as an assistant football coach at Mississippi State University.

"I felt we needed someone from outside the (current coaching) staff to come in and give new direction from now to the end of the season," Travis said. "Lee will be able to do that."

Travis said the decision to accept Dickey's resignation was not easy and expressed respect for Dickey as a coach.

"Jim Dickey has done a great job bringing honesty and integrity to the program," Travis said.

Dickey gave his own statement Sunday afternoon at a news conference in the football office at KSU Stadium following Travis' news conference in the Union.

Dickey cited shortcomings in the funding for football as a problem during his tenure as coach.

"There's very little margin for error at Kansas State," Dickey said. "We operate on a very, very thin shoestring, and sometimes that shoestring has got some gaps in it."

Dickey indicated that it was time for him to resign if he thought he was holding back his team's progress.

"If I feel like our players were wading in mud, and I was that mud, then I was going to shed that from

Travis names Moon as temporary coach

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Lee Moon, K-State's assistant athletic director for operations, has been named interim head football coach effective immediately, Athletic Director Larry Travis announced at a press conference Sunday afternoon. Moon, who came to K-State in April from Mississippi State University, succeeds Jim Dickey who resigned Sunday morning.

Travis said the decision to name Moon interim coach was a result of his desire to bring in someone from outside the current coaching staff "to lead us in a new direction."

"Under some different leadership and a change in tempo, I feel we can go on and have a successful season," Travis said. "We can salvage something this year."

Moon was an assistant football coach and an administrative assistant while at Mississippi State. He has had previous coaching stints at Duke University, the University of Virginia and Staunton Military Academy in Virginia.

"He brings our program much expertise," Travis said. "Lee has tremendous energies, and he has a great rapport with our players.

"We need a change in direction and a little bit of hope right now, and we feel this gives Lee a chance to interject new energies into our program."

Moon said that increasing the level of enthusiasm would be one of Voluntary aid frees prisoner of conscience

By GREG PROSKE
Staff Writer

Gregorio Gonzalas, a student, disappeared near the Mexican city of Acupulco in 1983, after he had a difference of opinion with police about the rights of squatters.

"He supported the squatters, that was all, and he was arrested, tried and sentenced to prison," said Donna Schenck-Hamlin, iibrarian at Farrell Library and member of group 254 — the Manhattan chapter of Amnesty International.

Amnesty International is a nonpartisan, voluntary human rights organization based in England. The group works through non-violent means to free people imprisoned or persecuted because of their color, religion or beliefs, Schenck-Hamlin said.

In the case of Gonzalas "we wrote letters saying, politely, that the sentence was a violation of his rights," she said.

Gonzales was classified by Amnesty International as a prisoner of conscience: An individual imprisoned by police or government officials for taking an dissident stance on a political or social issue, but does not advocate violence as a means of achieving change.

After a year of letter writing and uncertainty, Gonzalas was released.

"We received a phone call Friday (Sept. 6) from the AI office in New York verifying his release," she said. "It was pretty exciting news.

Four of the nine who were apprehended are still in prison, but AI group 254 was not assigned the cases of the other four.

Other members of AI group 254 are Jan Flora, associate professor in anthropology and social work; Genie Hayes, senior in sociology; Tim Henderson, junior political science; Leon Rappoport, professor of psychology; and Curt Snyder, graduate student in political science.

Another amnesty case involving members of group 254 is the case of Artur Opolski. Schenck-Hamlin said Opolski's case illustrates how Amnesty operates.

Opolski, a miner and supporter of Solidarity — an independent labor union in Poland — refused to leave the mine where he worked when marshal law was declared in Poland by the country's government in 1980. For his refusal to leave, Opolski was arrested, tried and sentenced to prison. A year after his imprisonment, Opolski was released.

"Sometimes the reason why a prisoner is released may not be because of our efforts, though we would like to think so. We don't know

Train derails, spills acid; 300 evacuate San Antonio

By The Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO, Texas — A freight train derailed on a trestle, rupturing tanker cars and spilling as much as 200,000 gallons of sulfuric acid into a river, killing thousands of fish and forcing the evacuation of about 300 people, officials said Sunday.

There were no serious injuries and no danger to water supplies in the Saturday night accident, in which 29 cars of a 100-car Southern Pacific train derailed, authorities said. Railroad officials did not how many of the 21 acid-bearing tankers had ruptured.

Workers built an earthen dam to contain the spill and dumped about 100 tons of lime into the Medina River to neutralize the water, with an additional 800 tons scheduled for dumping overnight, said Art Henson, superintendent of the San Antonio division of

Latchkey children get safety tips

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

They are children who come home to an empty house. They watch TV, play video games or do homework. Most Manhattan latchkey children say when they are at home alone they are bored. And the parents of latchkey kids say they are worried.

A latchkey child is one whose parents are not home when the child comes home because of work, errands or various other reasons, said Donna Jackson, representative from the Kansas Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse. Jackson spoke to 13 children and 11 parents Thursday evening in the basement of First Christian Church, 115 Courthouse Plaza.

The seminar, sponsored by Southwestern Bell and University for Man, was designed to help latchkey children and their parents become better acquainted with methods to deal with emergencies, phone calls or strangers while the child is home alone.

Jackson said it would be great if there were no latchkey children. But because some parents cannot afford care for after-school hours, some children are home alone. These children need to be informed

Diplomatic relations suffer from alleged espionage actions

Soviets quickly adopt 'eye-for-an-eye policy' in dismissals

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — A diplomat or so here, a few trade representatives there, sometimes a journalist or two — in recent years that has been the record on expulsions between the Soviet Union and Western countries.

Expulsions of Soviet citizens from Western countries are usually fewer than a half dozen at a time. The Soviets typically retaliate, frequently in fewer numbers. Sometimes they take no action.

So why did the Soviet Union, despite the reported British warning of further expulsions if even one British citizen was ordered out of Moscow, go for an eye-for-an-eye and order out 18 embassy diplomats and staff members, five journalists and two businessmen?

Mikhail Gorbachev, the Soviet party leader who came to power in March, is taking a tough stand despite his soft talk toward the West in areas such as improved relations and disarmament.

The last biggest single expulsion of Soviets abroad, before last week's action by Britain against 25 Soviets which the Soviets matched number for number, was in April 1983.

France expelled 47 Soviets, saying it would not be a soft "underbelly" for espionage, especially in military matters and technology. Moscow

Britain calls for 'urgent and careful' talks over expulsions

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher summoned two of her senior Cabinet officials for urgent talks Sunday on whether to order out more Soviets in response to the Soviet Union's expulsion of 25 Britons.

Press Association, the British domestic news agency, said Thatcher, Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe and Home Secretary Douglas Hurd reached a decision, but were keeping it secret to avoid giving the Soviets advance notice.

The agency's unattributed report said the decision would be announced before Thatcher leaves today afternoon for a four-day visit to Egypt and Jordan.

A spokeswoman for Thatcher confirmed that the meeting took place, but refused to give details.

Howe had cut short a weekend break to begin what he said were "urgent and careful" talks with aides on how to respond to the Kremlin's move, announced Saturday. Thatcher returned to London from her country retreat, Chequers, for the late-night session with Howe and Hurd.

Press Association said the nature of the quickly arranged meeting and the inclusion of Hurd indicated the British were planning to retaliate. As

Grenades thrown in theater kill 35

PAGADIAN, Philippines — Three grenades hurled from a balcony into the lower floor of a crowded theater Sunday killed at least 35 people and wounded about 100 in a Mindanao Island town, a local radio station reported.

It blamed terrorists for the attack in the town of Lala, 500 miles south of Manila, but said it was not known if the killers were members of the communist New People's Army or Moslem extremists.

There was no answer to telephone calls to the constabulary office in Pagadian, 30 miles west of Lala.

Radio station DXDD in Ozamis City, across Panquil Bay from Lala, initially reported 25 deaths, but said 10 other victims died in hospitals in Ozamis where they had been taken by boats.

It said up to 100 people were wounded, many seriously.

Reports from the station, monitored in Pagadian, said that at 4:10 p.m. the terrorists simultaneously threw the grenades from the balcony.

The broadcast said Sunday is a market day in Lala, and hundreds of rural residents were in the town to shop and go to the movie.

Walesa calls for greater solidarity

CZESTOCHOWA, Poland — Lech Walesa joined more than 50,000 worshipers in calling for the restoration of Solidarity at an outdoor Mass for workers, the largest public display of support for the outlawed free trade union movement in nearly a year.

The Mass at the Jasna Gora monastery in this shrine city about 130 miles south of Warsaw capped a two-day workers' pilgrimage that drew Solidarity supporters from throughout Poland.

It was the biggest show of strength for Solidarity since November, when more than 250,000 people attended the Warsaw funeral of the Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko, a pro-Solidarity priest murdered by three secret police officers.

"I knew there were a lot of us, but I didn't know there were so many," Walesa said.

"It shows that we will never give back our August, that we will find methods and ways to defend August," he said, referring to the month in 1980 when the government signed the Gdansk agreements with striking workers that led to the formation of Solidarity, the Soviet bloc's first independent trade union federation.

Bombs set off in Copenhagen

COPENHAGEN, Denmark — Bombs exploded in downtown Copenhagen Sunday night at a kosher food store and a travel agency specializing in trips to Israel, wounding as many as 12 people, police reported.

They said that shortly after the explosions a bomb was found near the Israeli Embassy and another near the residence of the Israeli ambassador.

The first explosion occurred outside the food store and the second came less than five minutes later at the Israel Tours travel agency, according to the police.

They said about 12 people were treated at hospitals for cuts and shock, but none was injured badly enough to be admitted.

Suspect sought in Sunday stabbing

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A female suspect was being sought Sunday night in connection with the stabbing death earlier in the day of a 40-year-old Kansas City man.

Police said an argument between Hicks and a woman erupted about 3 p.m. Sgt. Don Hibdon said Hicks was stabbed at least once in the chest and then went to a relative's residence on the city's east side to summon an ambulance.

Hicks was taken to Truman Medical Center, where he died in surgery about 6:30 p.m., Hibdon said.

The woman suspect was was described by police as "an acquaintance."

Car sprints to top of mileage chart

WASHINGTON — A model of the Chevrolet Sprint won the government's top fuel mileage rating for 1986 cars and is the first auto to score 60 miles per gallon on the highway, the Environmental Protection Agency said Sunday.

The Sprint ER, a Japanese-built minicar that dethroned the Honda Civic Coupe HF from the top spot it held for the last two years, gets 55 mpg in city driving, according to annual test results released by the EPA.

The Civic HF last year was rated at 49 mpg in the city, 54 mpg on the highway. This year, the best Civic HF got ratings of 52 mpg and 57 mpg.

The Sprint's city rating of 55 mpg is the first time the 50 mpg mark has been passed since the EPA applied new deflation factors to the ratings for 1985 models.

Walker feels guilty about spying

VIRGINIA BEACH, Va. — Arthur J. Walker, convicted of seven espionage counts for turning over classified documents to his brother, who the FBI has accused of masterminding a spy ring, says he lived for years with a deep sense of guilt.

Walker believes the information he passed did not endanger anyone, but said he still feels guilty "just for what I did, not for what I gave him."

"I didn't want to do it, and I felt tremendously guilty," Walker, 50, of Virginia Beach, said in an interview published Sunday.

Walker, who admitted giving two classified documents to his younger brother, John A. Walker Jr. of Norfolk, said that after the second time he knew he could not do such a thing again.

But stopping "really didn't make the guilt go away," he told the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot and The Ledger-Star in an interview conducted Friday.

"I can't think of myself as a traitor. I can't think of myself as a spy, although I must be one, right? I mean, I've been convicted."

Walker, who is being held in the Virginia Beach jail, will be sentenced Nov. 12 in Norfolk. He faces a maximum sentence of three life terms plus 40 years in prison and $40,000 in fines.

Prince Harry celebrates birthday

The photographs, taken last month aboard the royal yacht Britannia, show Harry — third in line to the throne behind his father Prince Charles, 36, and 3-year-old brother Prince William — clutching a plastic bucket and spade and seated in a baby swing.

Andrew, 25, is Harry's godfather, a Royal Navy helicopter pilot and an avid photographer. He is due to publish an album of his pictures later this month.

Couple talks of working in space

WINTER PARK, Fla. — Astronauts Bill and Anna Fisher have been traveling in different orbits of late, but they're hoping with a little luck to see the heavens together.

Fisher recently returned from his first space shuttle ion, in which he helped jump-start a disabled 7×-ton satellite. His wife operated the shuttle's robot arm in November to help spacewalkers retrieve two satellites lost in a useless orbit.

The Fishers were the guests of honor Friday at the opening of an exhibit of space shuttle paintings and photographs at the Rollins College Cornell Fine Arts Center.

The couple said they have more to share now that each has peered down on Earth from above, and the two have talked about the possibility of working together in orbit.

So far, NASA hasn't assigned any of its three astronaut couples to a joint ion. Fisher will fly next in June and, a month later, her husband will go up again.

Supremacist gives testimony to obtain reduced sentence

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — A charter member of The Order is expected to continue his tale of assassination plots, robberies and Aryan revolution when he resumes testimony today in the trial of 10 alleged members of the white supremacist group.

Denver Daw Parmenter II is among 11 people to have pleaded guilty out of the 23 named in a federal racketeering indictment that says members of The Order participated in two murders, armored car and bank robberies, counterfeiting and arson.

Parmenter, 33, testified Friday in exchange for a 20-year sentence in a medium-security prison and his testimony against 10 others who have pleaded innocent.

Parmenter said Friday that Order members were to help rid the country of Jewish influence. The targets included Henry Kissinger, David Rockefeller and the heads of the three television networks. The networks were targeted, he said, because "it was felt that the news media was one of the (vehicles) responsible for indoctrinating our race, poisoning the people."

Parmenter was accused of taking part in the April 1984, robbery of an armored car in which $536,000 was taken and a July 1984, robbery of a Brinks armored truck near Ukiah, Calif., in which $3.6 million was taken.

Reagan to present proposal regarding U.S. trade policy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan plans to present a new, somewhat tougher trade policy next week that administration strategists hope will help head off stronger protectionist legislation now before Congress.

A senior administration official, speaking on condition he not be identified, said Reagan would call for new legislation and administrative action to "give us more discretionary clout" in dealing with unfair trade practices.

But the source said the legislation was unlikely to be ready for submission to Congress when Reagan announces his plan, now scheduled for Sept. 23.

White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan said at week's end he hopes to have a bill "as quickly as possible."

The House Ways and Means Committee is scheduled to vote Thursday on a bill limiting textile imports, despite strong administration opposition.

"We don't want to see quotas," Regan said. "We don't want to see any 25 percent tariff coming."

Beryl Sprinkel, chairman of Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters Friday the protectionist measures now before Congress "would substantially raise costs to the American consumer..., reduce the availability of quality goods to the American consumer (and) deter economic growth in a very significant way.

"The basic thrust" of administration policy "will remain unchanged," Sprinkel said. "It will remain a market-opening strategy, not a market-closing strategy."

Elements of the administration plan, according to administration and congressional sources, include:

— Legislation to strengthen the hand of the U.S. trade representative in cases involving unfair trading practices by foreign nations.

— A $300 million "war chest" for the Export-Import Bank to help subsidize loan rates to selected U.S. manufacturers having difficulty selling their products abroad. The subsidy would amount to the difference between the going U.S. rates and lower rates that some foreign countries can get to help them market exports.

— Legislation to enable the United States to retaliate against companies, not just the countries in which they are located.

them," Dickey said.

After making his statement to the press, Dickey declined to answer questions from the media and left the room.

Travis said he and Dickey met at 8 a.m. Sunday. They assessed the state of the football team and decided that a change in coaching would serve the best interest of the team.

Travis said not until the Sunday morning meeting with Dickey was a final decision made in regard to Dickey's status as coach.

The Manhattan Mercury reported Sunday that Travis "asked for head football coach Jim Dickey's resignation, effective immediately" on Saturday.

Moon met for the first time with the K-State football players at a 3 p.m. meeting Sunday.

Moon said that the players "seemed very positive" about his appointment.

"We've got to look to tomorrow," Moon said. "We have got to play TCU (Texas Christian University) on television Saturday, and I think they'll (K-State players) be ready."

While not ruling out the possibility that Moon might be named head coach on a permanent basis at the end of the season, Travis said the search for a permanent successor would begin soon.

"We'd like to move along as fast as we can because of the (new 1986) recruiting class," Travis said. "We would like to get someone in place so we don't lose the recruiting class."

Travis said he hopes to name a new coach at the end of the season or shortly thereafter.

"We're looking for someone with head coaching experience, who has seen the trials and tribulations of putting together a football team and going with it," Travis said.

Dickey, 51, was beginning his eighth season as K-State coach. He compiled a K-State record of 25 wins, 53 losses and two ties. Dickey led the Wildcats to their only career postseason bowl game appearance, a 14-3 loss to the University of Wisconsin in the 1982 Independence Bowl in Shreveport, La.

Watch out what you say around Dave Krug, freshman in computer science. It may end up in a syndicated comic strip.

Krug and Steve Cooper, junior in art at Wichita State University, are collaborating on "Chasing Reality," a comic strip that will start running in the Collegian Tuesday.

Cooper sent the Chicago Tribune syndicate samples of his cartoons in March, he said. They were impressed with his art but said his writing needed work. That's when he approached Krug about writing the strip.

"(Steve) was having trouble when he was doing the strip by himself because he couldn't get the ideas," Krug said.

If the syndicate likes the strip, Cooper said they may have a 10-to 15-year contract. Otherwise they will keep running "Chasing Reality" in the Collegian.

The two college students decided what kind of strip they wanted and set up four basic college characters, Krug said.

"I get the ideas and write them down and dialogue them out," he said.

He draws the cartoon using stick figures and bubble captions. Cooper makes a rough draft before they discuss the final draft.

"In the summer it was easy (to discuss the cartoon) because we lived close together," Krug said.

Now Krug goes home to Wichita every two to three weeks to discuss the cartoons with Cooper and make a final draft.

They have 20 strips made, Krug said, but he has two pages of ideas he needs to dialogue.

"Usually it's things that happen in my life or I see someone else do. At my job, if someone laughs at something I say or do, I write it down and put it in my wallet and save it for later," he said.

When the cartoonists started working together in July, the comic strip characters were seniors preparing for high school graduation, Krug said.

Now the strip will be about college students and the problems and experiences they have, he said. One student will be working in a "real sleazy fast-food joint."

To give the strip a modern feel, Cooper will add popular items like a Madonna poster or a Phil Collins album in the panels.

Although they won't make specific references to the University, the team will use University artwork such as the fork statue in front of King Hall to which students can identify.

"When people read the strip, (Cooper's) artwork's good enough where they can identify (the statue), and that'll be neat for them," Krug said. "Yet when we send it to the Tribune, it's not going to make any difference. It'll just be a statue."

Police look for clues to bus crash

By The Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Investigators combed a ravine Sunday for clues to the cause of a church bus wreck that killed five people, while the shaken congregation at the chapel of the victims' Bible college prayed.

"In the providence of God and his wise care, he took them to be with him," the Rev. Wallace Joice told about 300 people at Bible Holiness Assembly of God in Neosho, Mo.

The church operates Ozark Bible Institute, an independent Pentecostalist school where four of the dead were members of the 120-person student body. The fifth victim was the bus driver.

It was uncertain whether the second full week of classes would resume on schedule today, said Clifford Hurst, assistant supervisor of the men's dormitory.

A National Transportation Safety Board team and state investigators scoured a rugged ravine about two miles north of Eureka Springs, tracking the course of the out-of-control, 20-year-old bus owned by the college.

The students were en route to "The Great Passion Play," an outdoor biblical drama at Eureka Springs.

"They're going back over the direction of travel and looking at where the bus first left the road, damage that was done to road signs when the bus hit them, where it dropped off, and possibly the speed involved," said Sgt. Keith Ferguson of the Arkansas State Police.

"It's a matter of reconstructing the whole scene," he said.

Ahearn offers alternative

There need be no more controversy about the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum. The whole project has reached the realm of the absurd. The future of the project is, for the moment, in the hands of the Board of Regents.

The regents have two basic options. They can vote to procede with the project as is, which is sure to lead to a great deal of upset on the part of most sane people, or they can vote to take the money and do what probably should have been done in the first place: renovate Ahearn Field House.

The regents can, should, and probably will vote to scrap the whole mess. Why? Because there is no way the project, in its present form, could ever become a reality.

The original sticking point was the lack of pro forma studies that would have indicated whether or not the proposed coliseum was feasible. What must now be done are pro forma studies to see if the money pledged will be sufficient to renovate Ahearn, and if that is the way to go. As it stands, to procede with the project is to invite disaster.

If the regents fail to see reason, there is still an option left to the students. The first, and the one most likely to have the greatest effect, is to pass a student referendum calling not for pro forma studies but the withdrawal of all $7 million in student support from the project.

Though the referendum might be vetoed by the administration, it could be passed again and again, and eventually the pressure of overwhelming public opinion would probably cause the measure to pass. When that happens, not only will there not be enough money to build the coliseum, there won't be enough to renovate Ahearn. Which is to say, the project would be blown out of the water in every possible way.

If the proposed project is scrapped, the money collected by the students that is already on hand (some $1.9 million) can be used for any debt retirement the Student Senate feels is appropriate. We have several opportunities to spend that money several times over.

The proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum is dead for all practical purposes. The question now is what to do with the money. Th first option considered must be renovation of Ahearn.

Contest needs improving

The University sponsored a beauty contest last week.

As a part of "Wellness Week '85" sponsored by Lafene Student Health Center, a team of students chose the "healthiest" body on campus.

The "Healthy Body Contest" consisted of photographs taken of 25 male and 20 female contestants posing in swimsuits and shorts with faces blacked out.

To be chosen the healthiest body is an honor — if the judges are knowledgeable and objective. The first question is, how can a panel judge the fitness and health of a body from a photograph?

Of the six members on the panel, two were members of the "Wellness Week" committee representing staff at Lafene. The others represented Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic Council, Student Senate and campus. The second question is, what were the credentials of the latter four?

The fact is the panel could only judge the appearance of the individuals in the contest — their physical beauty.

Health includes aspects of internal medicine such as cardiovascular and respiratory soundness, good eyesight and hearing, good reflexes, good bone structure, and physical fitness as well as visible elements of health such as proper weight and muscle tone.

Doctors are the only people qualified to make such judgments.

The contest was more than likely held to inspire interest in the week's activities and draw students to the presentations. With gimmicks, attention is turned away from the functions for which "Wellness Week" was originally intended.

As a whole, "Wellness Week" carried an important message to students and should be continued in future years. The professionals who spoke on campus provided insight to health problems unfamiliar to many students.

The "Wellness Week" committee should be congratulated for its efforts, but in planning future events it should be aware of the credibility of its programs. If the "Healthy Body Contest" is continued, it should be revised to avoid superficiality and find the true "healthy body."

'National security' hinders free expression

DANIEL GRUBB
Collegian Columnist

The concept of national security has been used in regard to some of the most subversive activities of the United States government. It has been the justification for persecutions, censorship and ostracism. It has made it illegal for people to hold certain beliefs, whether they act on them or not. In short, it is often an un-American concept.

In the early years of our nation, the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1789 were enacted, making it illegal to be disrespectful of the president or Congress. This was used to silence those who happened to think John Adams was perhaps not the best possible president. One person who alluded to the possibility that Adams was a tyrant was thrown in jail for two years. Fortunately, Thomas Jefferson pardoned all those convicted under these laws in 1801.

In the era before the Civil War, several southern states had laws restricting the rights of the populace to say anything against slavery. Most of these laws were designed to keep the slaves from staging an uprising and were therefore concerned with security. In Louisiana, the punishment for such dangerous speech was death or 21 years of hard labor.

During World War I, those believing the Conscription Act to be illegal and spreading this terrible opinion were arrested, without warrants in some cases, and imprisoned.

The list of offenses continues, but you get the general idea. In some cases, such treasonous actions as reading the Declaration of Independence were punished. There are the infamous examples of the McCarthy hearings which capitalized on the fear the Cold War brought on to eliminate certain types of dissent.

There is the more recent case of the Progressive's battle to publish officially censored but freely available information. The list was recently lengthened when the Department of Defense declared that certain uncensored scientific papers could not be presented in open forum because citizens of other countries were at the meetings.

In all of these cases, the government of the United States has acted against its own citizens by removing their right to speak on ideas the majority disagreed with or, even worse, that the government didn't want disclosed. In the case of the Pentagon Papers, the damaged national security was caused by embarrassment more than actual compromise of dangerous information.

In all of this, we must ask ourselves whether the government was actually working within the Constitution and whether it was working in our best interest. If the answer to either of these questions is no, we must stand up and defend the freedoms for which our ancestors fought.

To ignore the encroachment upon our right to freely criticize our government is to ask for the adoption of the type of totalitarian state we are supposedly against.

What is most frightening to me is the fact that our liberties are most in danger when people are most afraid. Yet this is exactly when we need them most. It is during times of crisis and fear that we absolutely need a diversity of opinion to ensure correct action.

This is the fatal flaw of the anti-Communists, both yesterday and today. While the views presented may be wrong, it is even more wrong to go against the rights of free speech and deny the American people the right to choose as they see fit.

Our country appears to be returning to Cold War tactics. This brings with it the potential destruction of our liberties. If we are not cautious, we may have a state-sponsored laryngitis with little hope of recovery.

Recovery shot the cure for life's slices

RICH HARRIS
Collegian Columnist

Sometimes my golf game leaves a little bit to be desired. On a good day, I'll shoot bogey golf, but anyone can tell you my good days are few and far between. Generally I'll card 45 to 50 for nine, 90 to 100 for 18.

Still and all, I love the game, and every chance I get, I head out to the golf course to put myself through another 18 holes of humiliation and degredation. It's practice, I tell myself, and I sure need it.

On those rare occasions when I make a good drive or fairway wood shot, there's no other feeling like it in the world. I even birdied a hole once (at the Wichita Country Club, no less). But for the most part, I play an average game — which is to say, I have a killer slice.

In my game, my slice can destroy my drives, and if I am not careful, I'll wind up in the trees or the tall rough off on the right, scrabbling around in the underbrush for my ball, holding up everyone behind me and generally feeling extremely stupid because I can't seem to manage such a simple thing as hitting a little ball with a stick. However, I have a secret weapon.

My recovery shots are right on target. They have to be. I might have to take a nine iron over the trees, a five iron out of the rough, or a two iron under the branches to get back on the fairway, always adding strokes to my score but not adding any real distance. It's wasted effort. I probably have the best recovery shot going, though, because I get more practice than anyone else I know.

There are many types of recovery shots. Some golfers play to bull the ball through, thrashing away until they have the ball back where they want it. However, this often costs six or seven strokes. Others play the shot with all the concentration and deliberation of the pros, and blow it anyway.

Still another method is to look around guiltily, pick up your ball when no one is looking, and nonchalantly drop it on the other side. But the best way to play is to know your game, and shoot shots you know you can make.

There isn't a lot of gratification in having a good recovery shot, because it means you need one. If I could get rid of the slice and keep to the fairways I would cut my score by about five strokes.

Ask a golfer what the bane of his existence is, and he'll tell you one of the following: trees, water or sand traps. Why? Because they interfere with the normal progress of his game, and they mean extra strokes if he fails to negotiate them in good form. They are placed on a golf course deliberately, as hazards.

Of course, golf courses aren't designed to be easy. Between the trees and the sand and the water hazards and the distances you must drive, golf courses present a formidable challenge. But then that is one of the pleasures of the game. Beating the challenge is what it's all about.

Average golfers like myself even gloat when we beat the system. I may have shot a 127 and triple bogied the easiest hole on the course, but if I managed to sink one 35-foot putt, I'll be back. It's a feeling of accomplishment, a sense of sweet victory.

You can think of life as a series of golf shots. Each time we face a crisis, we are teeing off. If we slice, we had better have our recovery shots down to perfection.

The same principles that we apply to recovery shots we can apply to our lives. Often we fall back on a shell of cynicism when we fail, or blame fate, or the other guy, or just give up. These are all types of life recovery shots, and none of them work well. The only way is to play it as it comes, and take the shot we know we can make.

Then too, consider this: sometimes we set ourselves up to fail. Without realizing it, we aim for the woods, If we expect our drives to slice, and we figure trying to correct for our slicing is a waste of time, we'll wind up in the rough for sure. It's a case of planned impotence. We may even be afraid to succeed. So we don't.

It's that way in life, too. Set yourself up to fail and you probably will. It happens in personal relationships, in professional situations, in almost any situation you can imagine.

I used to do it in personal relationships all the time. I'd get a picture of the way a person ought to be, based in part on my first impression of that person and in part on an ideal that no one could ever achieve. The minute the person failed to be exactly the way I thought they would or should, it was heartbreak city for me. In retrospect, it's no wonder I had a rotten lovelife — no one, including me, knew what I wanted.

I had set my lovelife up to fail, and sure enough it did — in a big way.

Life is not going to be a primrose path through ceaseless luxury. For the most part, life is the veritable pits. The only way I know of to get through life with something like success is to keep on slogging through, working to keep to the fairways.

If you slice, and eventually even the great golfers get off a rotten tee shot, play your recovery shot and keep on going. But you're not getting anywhere if all you play are recovery shots. You have to have some good drives and some good fairway shots to have a good score. You can't take "mulligans" off every tee.

There are times when I want to throw my clubs, jump up and down on the greens, shout, wail and gnash my teeth. I have been known to lose so many balls in one day I can't finish the course because I don't have any left. On the other hand, I've played on days when I could do no wrong. And life will be like that too, friends and neighbors. Surely you've had analogous experiences.

Staying on the fairway sounds like a little more work, but it really isn't. It is not as much work as all the recovery shots you have to play if you don't keep to the fairway. As you keep to the fairway, your score will decrease, and the pleasure you take in the game will increase.

And the pleasure you take in the game is what life is all about, ladies and gentlemen.

Great golfers are made, not born. Great lives are made, too, not born. And the only way to make either one is to keep practicing. Don't let the days when every shot you make costs you stroke and distance change your basic goal: to shoot par or better. It can be done, believe me.

Pardon me. Mind if I play through?

Paper fails in reporting rape

Editor,

On Aug. 30, a woman entered her car after an evening in Aggieville. There's nothing unusual about a woman driving herself home, but in this case, the woman thought she was alone. There was a man hiding in her back seat and he had a gun.

According to reports, the man forced the woman to drive to the western part of Manhattan and raped her. He told her to drive him to Junction City, forcing her to stop along K-18 to rape her again. He got out of the car in downtown Junction City and she drove back to Manhattan to the St. Mary Hospital emergency room.

As always, the victim's name has been kept confidential but she has been identified as a student at K-State. There was an article in the Manhattan Mercury on Sept. 1 and in the Junction City Daily Union on Sept. 5, both detailing the incident about as much as I have, but there was no mention of the crime in the Collegian.

I have to wonder about the editorial responsibility of this newspaper when a violent crime against a student is committed and ignored. Rape is not something that happens to "certain types" of people, nor is it "asked for" or "really enjoyed."

It can happen to anyone at any time and to severely restrict public knowledge on the frequency of its occurence is worse than closing one's own eyes to the problem. It's forcing everyone to keep their eyes closed as well.

I believe that one of the most effective preventative measures against rape that can be taken is the periodic reminder of its existence. There was a rape. There is a rapist. Don't panic, but don't take chances.

Group 'wages' world peace

Editor,

Members of the Baha'i faith in over 7,600 localities in the United States will prayerfully observe International Day of Peace, Sept. 17, 1985.

We originally observed World Peace Day as a Baha'i celebration, which was initiated in 1959, but have decided to forgo that event to support the United Nations observance instead.

In 1981, the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed the third Tuesday of September, the opening day of the regular assembly, as International Day of Peace, dedicated to strengthening the ideals of peace.

We believe the time is long overdue for nations to bind together to make a commitment toward a universal and lasting peace. Baha'is' strive to motivate individuals and groups to eliminate all forms of prejudice and foster a high standard of justice and tolerance for all people. We call this "waging peace."

The Baha'i Club of K-State urges all students to join us in our efforts, through prayer and action, in every aspect of our lives, to promote these ideals.

Policies lack global fairness

Editor,

In the Sept. 9 Landon Lecture, Vice President George Bush stated that it was the duty of the United States to aid the Russian Jews in their struggle against Soviet persecution. He said we should restore the "basic human principle" that these people were missing.

Could it be that the real motive here is simply to put another thorn in the side of the Kremlin? I mean, President Ronald Reagan doesn't seem nearly so concerned with restoring the "basic human principle" which is so sorely lacking in South Africa. Of course, this would mean leveling trade sanctions on the South African government and that wouldn't be nearly as rewarding, financially or otherwise, as putting another bug up Gorbachev's behind.

If Reagan concerned himself more with the welfare of all mankind — as the president of the wealthiest country in the world should — and less about irritating the Soviets or getting a high return on his dollar, the Kremlin might just catch on.

Class on Vietnam should offer both views

Editor,

On June 26, 1985, PBS aired a program titled "Vietnam: an Inside Story Special." This critique proved that the original "Vietnam Television History" left out many important points of the war and distorted some facts to help make Americans believe that the Vietnamese Communists were the hometown heroes, and the Americans were the villians.

These fast histories are just as confusing, if not more confusing, than the war itself. I first arrived in South Vietnam on March 3, 1968. I was a 17-year-old infantry recondo scout who saw 22½ months of combat with the 1st Infantry Division and an adviser from the Vietnamese Special Forces.

I believed in what I did and today I am even more convinced in what I was doing. The North Vietnamese have invaded and enslaved the South Vietnamese, the Cambodians and the Laotions, and now are threatening the sovereignty of Thailand.

I would like to ask the history department and anyone who studies the Vietnam War to look at the PBS series as only one view of the war and not as the gospel.

Since the Vietnam 13-part series is a credit course at K-State, I think the critique should be a required part of that study. This would give students the needed balance to think between the frames.

Campus lacks spiritual help

Editor,

Everyone has something to say about the K-State retention of students issue — me too. The first question I ask: Is K-State part of what's real in the world? Is it a "should think and should act" institution? Or is it reality-based, "as is?"

Is K-State curriculum strictly academic and scientific, or is it also a social and emotional experience and training ground? Is it a place for spiritual growth and celebration? Do students get the idea there is pleasure and excitement in higher education?

I have to admit I see lots of young people walking around, doing what they're supposed to, but not really aware of where they came from, where they are going, what they've got and what to do with it. Is most of what goes on at K-State directed at helping young students answer the question, "How do I fit into nature's system?"

I see women reaching out, attempting in their ways, to appeal to men with heads buried in books or involved irretrievably in the social-sports-industrial complex. Women are not finding what they want on campus or in town: responsive and understanding men.

As it was in the 1860s when K-State began, men worry about the material world, women the spiritual world. Will K-State address men's and women's spirituality? That might be the answer to the question: "What is K-State here for?"

John La Shelle

Social factors aid retention

Editor,

With regard to the recent emphasis on retention of students, I was curious whether social aspects of K-State and Manhattan are adequate to attract and retain students.

Would there be any value in a bus to the large concerts at Sandstone Amphitheatre, Kemper Arena and Starlight Theater? Would being able to buy tickets on campus to such concerts be important to students?

Would there be enough support for several small concerts each year not at a private club, but where younger students could attend? (At Lawrence, there is the Opera House.)

I'm really asking the students whether there are some aspects of student life that the administration might be overlooking in its drive to retain students.

Volunteer clowns teach, perform tricks

Duo attempts fire transfer at workshop

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Giving the gift of music, magic, juggling and storytelling was the message of Saturday's clowning workshop sponsored by University for Man.

"The best thing about clowning is that people are taken by surprise," workshop minstrel Ron Clingenpeel, Episcopalian chaplain, said. "When people are taken off guard, you might be able to really touch a place that might not otherwise come out if planned."

Besides the clowning workshop, Clingenpeel and Easom Bond, senior in architectural engineering, work together with their Minstrel Show.

"We want to come into your life and give you sunshine," Bond said. "We laugh and feel foolish."

Bond and Clingenpeel laughed and fooled — illustrating magic tricks, painting on clown faces and telling stories. After each session they gave advice, ideas and tricks of the trade.

There was no laughing and fooling with the grand finale — fire-eating. Although no workshop participants "ate" the fire, two found nerve to try the fire transfer.

Youngest volunteer Julie Lutackas, 10-year-old daughter of Judy Lutackas, said it was sort of scary seeing the fire hovering over her head. Michele Jonas, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, also passed the fire from a stick to her tongue to a second unlit stick.

Both Bond and Clingenpeel told the workshop participants several times to "respect the fire, don't be afraid of it."

The two have been clowning around for two years with the Minstrel Show. Texas, Louisiana and other Midwestern states have been key locations for their travels.

"We usually break even or make enough money to get to the next show," Clingenpeel said. In addition to touring, the minstrels have participated in events at the Union and performed for Meadowlark Hills Health Care Center, 2121 Meadowlark Road.

Michele Jonas, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, learns the art of fire eating during a clowning workshop Saturday at the University for Man, 1221 Thurston St.

"That (Meadowlark Hills) was one of our best experiences," Clingenpeel said. "So many people are forgotten there. I never saw so many people laugh so hard." He said it was one of those nights where nothing went wrong.

Clingenpeel said showing up unexpectedly and clowning around can make someone happy or lighten his or her day.

"There's a part of everyone that needs to be softened, cuddled and held or they become hardened," Clingenpeel said.

South African unrest pressures universities to sell most holdings

By The Associated Press

A spring of campus protests and a summer of South African violence have swelled the ranks of colleges that are selling all or part of their investments in companies with dealings in South Africa.

Since April, when scores of U.S. campuses erupted in anti-apartheid protests, about 20 colleges and universities from Maine to Arizona have adopted policies of total or partial divestiture of South Africa-related holdings.

Sixty-one schools have sold nearly $300 million in such portfolio holdings since tiny Hampshire College in Amherst, Mass., became the nation's first college in 1977 to adopt a South Africa-free investment policy, according to the American Committee on Africa, a New York-based anti-apartheid lobbying group.

A spot check by The Associated Press found many other colleges actively considering tougher policies as well.

In recent weeks:

— Columbia University, the scene last spring of some of the most bitter student demonstrations, announced it is likely to agree next month to divest itself of its $39 million in stocks of companies with South African operations. The plan has the support of Columbia President Michael Sovern.

Columbia, in New York, would be the first Ivy League college to adopt a policy of total divestiture of South African investments.

— Rutgers University in New Jersey, another hotbed of student protest last spring, was considered all but certain to accept an investment committee recommendation made on Aug. 30 to sell its remaining $7.5 million in South African holdings.

— The University of Iowa divested itself of more than 90 percent, or about $2.3 million worth, of its South African-related holdings. Some students were angered because the school insisted it acted for economic, not moral, reasons.

By contrast, a committee set up to study divestiture at Iowa State University is expected to recommend shortly that the school sell its $550,000 in such holdings, for moral reasons.

— Bitterly divided trustees of the University of Vermont opted last week for limited divestment of the school's $7.3 million in South Africa-related investments. Vermont Gov. Madeleine Kunin argued in vain for full divestiture at the emotion-charged hearing.

— The University of Massachusetts divested all of its $370,000 in South Africa-related stocks after years of student and faculty pressure.

— As a result of tightened investment policies adopted this summer, Oberlin College announced this past week it had sold U.S. Steel stock valued at $620,000 and IMS International shares worth $142,000 because neither company had signed the "Sullivan Principles," a voluntary code of conduct in which firms agree to work against apartheid.

Among the schools that say they are reviewing their South African investment policies are Harvard University, Yale University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, University of Southern California, University of Notre Dame, Indiana University, Northwestern University, University of Kansas, Johns Hopkins University, Brown University, the University of Rhode Island, and Wesleyan University.

Urban board to debate code, zoning requests

By The Collegian Staff

With eight public hearings on the agenda, and the first meeting for September cancelled due to Labor Day, the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board faces a lengthy session tonight.

Among the public hearings scheduled is a request by the Riley County Planning Board to change code requirements that would require mobile homes in zones A-3 and A-4 to be placed on permanent foundations.

Other requests from the county include an amendment that would require review by the county's planning board of all conditional uses for properties, changing the minimum lot area for uses other than agricultural from one to 20 acres and to consider rezoning a tract of land west of Stagg Hill Road across from Juniper Drive from general agriculture to single-family residential.

For the city, public hearings include the rezoning of a tract of land at 601 South 5th St. from Heavy Industrial to Service Commercial. The request, which would violate the Manhattan land-use plan, is from Sonny Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, 1218 Moro St., who uses the property as a warehouse.

The meeting begins at 7 p.m. at the City Administration Building, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue. All planning board meetings are open to the public.

South African police fire into crowd

Officials report renewed violence

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Police in an armored vehicle besieged by a crowd of blacks opened fire and wounded three of the blacks, officials said Sunday in reporting renewed anti-apartheid violence in seven districts.

On the political front, the white-minority government shrugged off criticism from white opposition newspapers that modest reforms of apartheid announced last week had come too late to head off limited U.S. sanctions.

And South African business executives, under fire from President P.W. Botha for meeting exiled black guerrilla chiefs, were lauded by English-language newspapers for what one called "doing this country a service."

Botha said last week the government would restore South African citizenship to blacks considered citizens of independent tribal homelands, and a presidential commission recommended scrapping "influx control" laws aimed at keeping blacks out of white areas.

Chris Heunis, who as minister of constitutional development is responsible for drawing up constitutional changes, said on Sunday the moves were not an attempt to ease international pressure for reform.

"It was not directed at reaction internationally," he said, underlining the official stance that South Africa will not bow to dictates from a hostile world.

The changes make no dent in domination of 24 million voteless blacks by 5 million whites, or in an array of discriminatory laws covering housing, education and most public transport.

In new anti-apartheid unrest, a crowd of blacks besieged a police armored personnel vehicle Saturday night in East London's black Duncan Village township, bringing it to a standstill as they tried to steal gasoline, a police communique said.

Seven blacks were arrested in outbreaks of stoning or arson overnight in black districts in the Eastern Cape, and around Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, Durban and the capital, Pretoria, police said Sunday.

Smoke billowed over part of Johannesburg's black Soweto township Sunday as a 12-foot-high store of telephone poles went up in flames, witnesses said.

Police ordered off more than 1,000 people milling about as firefighters battled the blaze for an hour. It was unclear if arson was involved, police said.

In Washington, D.C., Herbert Beukes, South Africa's ambassador to the United States, suggested the Botha government has plans "to dismantle apartheid," but declined to discuss specific measures.

Botha on Saturday accused the businessmen of "showing weakness to the enemies."

Caller notifies news service

American may be released

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — U.S. officials in Beirut and Washington said Sunday they could not confirm the claim by an anonymous telephone caller that the Rev. Benjamin Weir, one of seven Americans kidnapped in Beirut, had been freed.

The caller told the Reuters news agency in Beirut on Sunday that Weir was released Saturday night. The caller, who claimed to be speaking on behalf of Islamic Jihad, or Islamic Holy War, a group which claimed in previous calls to be holding the seven Americans, spoke in Arabic and hung up when asked for details.

In Washington, D.C., Edward Djerejian, White House spokesman for foreign affairs, said the White House would have "absolutely no comment" on the report of Weir's release.

Weir, 61, a Presbyterian minister originally from Salt Lake City, was kidnapped in Moslem west Beirut on May 8, 1984.

The other kidnapped Americans are: William Buckley, 57, a political officer at the embassy in Beirut; Peter Kilburn, 60, a librarian at the American University in Beirut; the Rev. Martin Lawrence Jenco, 50, a Roman Catholic priest; Terry A. Anderson, 37, chief Middle East correspondent for the AP; Thomas Sutherland, 54, acting dean of agriculture at the American University; and David Jacobsen, 54, administrator at the American University Hospital.

Government policies affect women

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

The health picture of women and children below the poverty line is bleak and getting worse, said Cherri Bozich, assistant professor of social work, during the Friday Focus on Women series.

Bozich spoke to more than 20 women Friday about "Reagan's Impact on Women's Health Issues." She said the impact on women's health is a direct result of availability to get money for health-related and other services.

"The availability of money to get health and other services is a big issue," Bozich said. "Some 80 percent of those touched by poverty are women and children."

The government does not have correct low-income program priorities, Bozich said.

"The low income programs represent one-tenth of the total budget," she said. "These programs received one-third of all the budget cuts."

Bozich said the problem is that governmental leaders making budget-cut decisions are men.

"Women are powerless and not represented," Bozich said. "Women should be in control of the programs that affect mainly them."

The policies being made now are detrimental to the health of women, Bozich said, citing the example of a woman who froze to death last winter in her cardboard-box home.

"This shouldn't happen. The government is passing blanket policies that have detrimental effects on women," she said.

Bozich said there are three ways women can prevent program cuts that affect them.

"Women need to be more active in legislature (through lobbying), support candidates who campaign in support of women's issues, and be the legislators," she said.

Several people who complained of skin irritation from the acid's fumes were treated by emergency medical workers, said Bexar County sheriff's Sgt. Ray Gerlach.

The evacuations were ordered within one mile of the accident south of San Antonio, said Carl Mixon, Bexar County fire marshal. A nearby school was opened for evacuees who had no place to go.

Henson said the evacuation would continue until at least 8 a.m. today, forcing the closing of another school, Southwest High School, which is about a quarter of a mile from the spill.

The sulfuric acid, which is toxic and highly corrosive, produced a "major fish kill," with 10,000 to 100,000 fish dead, said Pat Hammack, an official with the Environmental Protection Agency.

He said some of the fish "disintegrated" from the acid, which sheared small trees as it ran into the river.

Theater fills city's entertainment 'void'

By LISA BOOTHE
Staff Writer

The Kansas Actors Theatre performed the Neil Simon comedy, "Barefoot in the Park" last weekend at Gregov's Restaurant Dinner Theatre, 2605 Stagg Hill Road.

The dinner theater opened Sept. 6 and is the first of its kind since 1979, when the Manhattan Civic Theatre ceased to operate at Fifth and Houston Streets.

The play is running on Friday and Saturday evenings in September, with one matinee performance on Sunday, Sept. 22. Along with the entertainment, Gregov's is featuring a three-entree buffet, tax and tip included in the $12.50 price ($10 for students).

"We had a very strong response," said Slavko Gregov, the restaurant owner. "People were very happy, and I think having dinner and a glass of wine with a show is a nice thing people can enjoy. Many, many people have called and asked about it, and reservations are already coming in for next weekend, so we have a strong feeling this will be something good."

The Kansas Actors Theatre is a recent partnership of three theater enthusiasts who are probably quite familiar to Manhattan audiences.

Pat Foltz, director of "Barefoot in the Park," and Sheldon K. Edelman, actor in the play, met two years ago and decided Manhattan was void of entertainment of this kind and would applaud a dinner theater. Dave Atchison, former K-State student and actor then intervened as a broker between Foltz and Edelman.

The new theater company will produce two more plays before the end of the semester. "Greater Tuna," an award-winning off-Broadway play will run throughout October, and "I Do. I Do," a two-player musical, will run in November.

"We're all very excited about this," Atchison said. "This wasn't available when I was a student, and I couldn't understand it. I know the interest was there then and now. Just look at the theaters now competing. If there wasn't an interest for more entertainment, the theaters wouldn't be putting up all of the up-front capital to build."

Foltz, who recently directed "The Music Man" with Manhattan's Arts in the Park series, said the dinner theater will be ideal for older Manhattan residents who do not wish to drive to the nearest theater in Topeka and for living groups who wish to reserve the restaurant.

"It's a dream come true for all of us," Foltz said. "It gives us a place to act consistently. And I'm excited for Manhattan, too. I think for the older crowd in Manhattan, there's not much to do. Down the road, we'd really like to get fraternities and sororities here, so we can offer a group of 40 or more a show on Thursday or Sunday when we aren't doing a general (audience) show."

Edelman, clinical psychologist and former assistant professor of sociology at K-State, stressed the importance of keeping the drama lighthearted and fun without heavy moral implications or stressful issues.

"Dinner theater is a modality of its own," Edelman said. "We will stick to comedy, music and mystery. After all, we don't want to turn people's stomachs while they're trying to eat."

Edelman has performed in 40 to 50 productions in the last 15 years. He said the theater is benefitting not only audiences, but actors as well by providing an opportunity for practicing their talent and getting paid to do so.

"This is not a profit-making organization," Edelman said. "You can't get rich this way, and we're not trying to. But interestingly enough, every actor reaches the point where he gets tired of putting out all that effort for very little in return. If you can pay him a little, it's worth it to him."

Edelman said he needed only 15 audience members a night in order to "break even" because Gregov's is providing the facility and accommodations.

On Friday night, 75 people came to the show, and on Saturday night, 66 people came. Of 90 seats, this is considered a full house to an actor, Edelman said.

"One unique thing about this is we're going to do what we do best, and Gregov is going to do what he does best," Foltz said. "The reason it has taken us years to get this going is because we thought we'd have to do this all by ourselves, but now it's perfect. We do theater, and Gregov does food."

A few select others will also "do" theater with the Kansas Actors when they appear in cameo performances. Last weekend, David Hacker, editor of the Manhattan Mercury, made his debut doing nothing more than gasping and panting, but according to Edelman, the audience thought he was a natural. Other prominent Manhattan residents will appear in subsequent shows.

"I know this thing can work," Edelman said. "I know theater people enjoy it, and it pleases the hell out of me. In fact, I'm pleased as punch to be a part of this. I don't have to do this, but god it's fun."

Ag career fair draws recruiters to campus

By The Collegian Staff

Thirty-three companies from the agribusiness field are expected to participate in the sixth annual Agri-Business Careers Fair to be held Tuesday in the Union Ballroom.

The fair, sponsored by the National Agri-Marketing Association, the College of Agriculture and the Career Planning and Placement Center, will be from 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

"Shake Hands With the Future" is the theme of the fair, which allows campus recruiters from all agribusiness fields to spend the day visiting with potential employees, said Geoff Andersen, senior in agricultural economics and chairman of the fair.

Companies such as Cargill, Inc., Ceiba Geigy Corp., Ralston Purina Co. and many others will set up booths with one or two representatives to talk with students.

"You're meeting the people who someday might hire you," Andersen said. "Even if you're not a senior, many companies will take your name and file it for future reference. The fair is for all who are interested in finding a job in agriculture.

Latchkey

of what to do while home alone.

She encouraged parents to sit down with children and discuss rules about TV use, phone calls and homework.

"Children feel more secure when they have something to do when they get home," she said.

Parents should discuss rules about allowing friends in the house, using the stove and leaving the yard to visit friends, she said.

Parents can also help latchkey children by posting important phone numbers by the phone, Jackson said.

The latchkey situation can be made better by the parent doing three things, she said.

"The latchkey situation can be more safe if parents will prepare children to meet challenges they may encounter, adjust arrangements as the child's needs change and support after-school programs for children," she said.

A new after-school program is now in the working at University for Man, said Tybel Miller, staff member of the "Be Busy After School" program for latchkey children at UFM.

Miller said the "Be Busy" program has about 12 children currently enrolled. In addition to Miller, two other staff members and a volunteer run the program.

"We started the program at the beginning of school this year because we thought this was a problem in the community," Miller said. "We pick the kids up after school in an RSVP (Retired Senior's Volunteer Program) van and bring them here, give them snacks and keep them busy until their parents come get them."

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis watches the final quarter of the Northern Iowa victory from the entrance to the Wildcat lockeroom.

Northern Iowa's 10-6 victory makes K-State

UPSET

Staff/John Sleezer

K-State head football coach Jim Dickey, who resigned his position Sunday, signals to the offensive line during the second half of the Wildcats' 10-6 loss to the University of Northern Iowa.

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Jim Dickey's seven-plus years as head football coach at K-State came to an end Saturday in much the same way they began — with a defeat.

Dickey's reign at K-State opened in 1978 with a road loss to Arizona, 31-0. The final loss in Dickey's tenure as Wildcat coach was a 10-6 defeat at the hands of the University of Northern Iowa.

Northern Iowa rolled to 214 yards rushing and 165 yards passing in defeating K-State in front of 17,550 fans at KSU Stadium on Saturday. In doing so the Panthers handed the Wildcats what free safety Barton Hundley referred to as the team's "most embarrassing" defeat in his five years as a member of the squad.

After Northern Iowa kicked off to open the contest, neither team could move the ball in their first possession. Northern Iowa, however, found the end zone on their second possession.

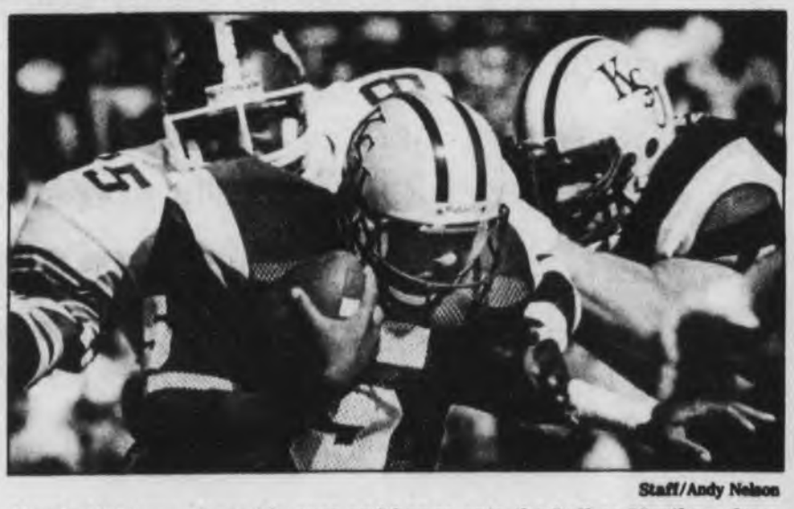
The 11-play, 85-yard Panther drive was keyed by a 28-yard pass completion from Northern Iowa quarterback Mike Smith to halfback Carl Boyd late in the drive.

After his reception, Boyd, a sophomore, gained three tough yards on a carry up the middle to set up his 3-yard touchdown plunge on the next play. Freshman-redshirt placekicker Mike Angell tacked on the extra point, and Northern Iowa had an early 7-0 advantage.

It was a lead the visitors would not relinquish.

Boyd, who gained 111 yards on 27 carries, also helped key Northern Iowa's second-quarter scoring drive that resulted in a field goal.

Boyd's 22-yard gain on a draw play early in the drive, and Smith's 22-yard throw on the run to junior split end Scott Francke four plays later, set up Angell's 33-yard field goal with 2:19 remaining in the first half.



The 10 first-half points scored by Northern Iowa were enough to hold off a K-State squad that failed to score for the first 41 minutes of the contest.

K-State got on the board with 3:52 remaining in the third quarter on a one-yard run by senior fullback Greg Strahm. Strahm's burst around the right end capped an eight-play, 71-yard drive.

Mark Porter's extra point attempt missed wide right after a low snap from center led to a poor hold, and K-State was only able to pull to within four, 10-6. This 10-6 score held to be the final score.

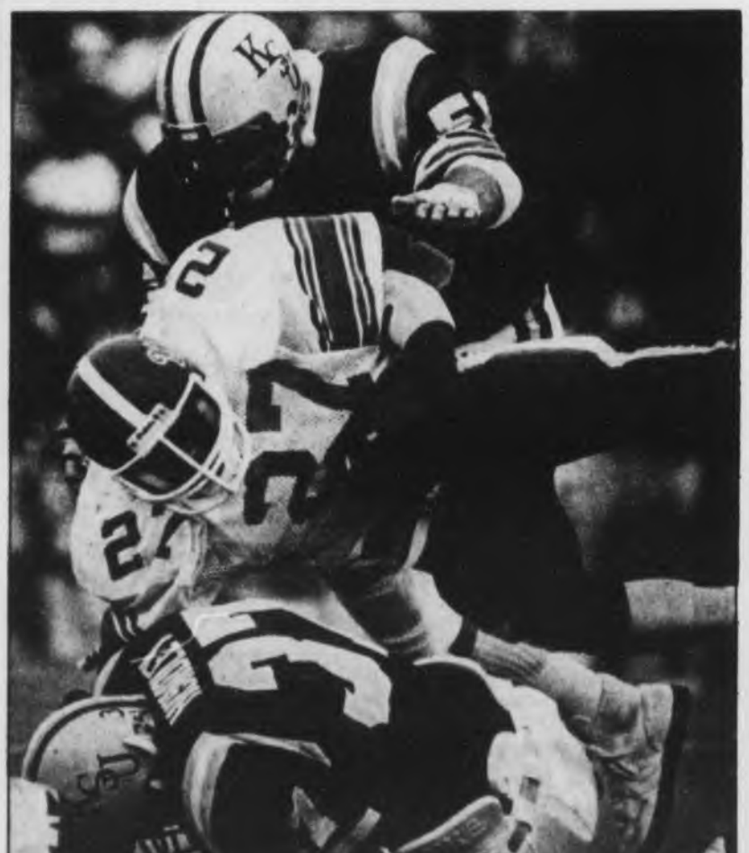
A 52-yard run by senior tailback John Kendrick, who gained 142 yards on 14 carries, was the key play in the drive for K-State. Kendrick was one of the few bright spots of the day for the 'Cats, Dickey said.

"We couldn't get any consistency on the running plays, but I thought John ran hard when we gave him some room," Dickey said.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Randy Williams closes his eyes and hangs onto the ball as Northern Iowa right end Ed Grimes gets around Tim Stone to get a quarterback sack.

Kendrick was pleased with his performance but admitted that the loss overshadowed his individual efforts.



"I thought I ran well, but I was just doing the best I could for the team. I need to improve on my blocking, and, like so many things, it's just a matter of thinking you can do it," he said. "But there were a lot of things we didn't get done today that we should have."

Hundley echoed Kendrick's sentiments.

"I wish I had some answers (as to why K-State played poorly), but I just don't. We just didn't get the job done all day," Hundley said. "If I knew why we weren't winning, I'd probably be thought of as one of the best coaches in America.

"Every week we look great in practice, but we just can't seem to come out on Saturdays and get the job done. We just have to try to do what Mr. Travis (Larry, the K-State athletic director) told us to do after the game — try to salvage the season."

The job of salvaging the rest of the schedule won't be an easy one for interim head coach Lee Moon's squad. Three of the remaining nine opponents are currently ranked in the top 20.

Staff/Jeff Tuttle

Northern Iowa running back Carl Boyd (37) dives as he is hit by linebacker Tim MacDonald (58) and free safety Barton Hundley (37).

Resignation shocks alumnus

By WAYNE PRICE
Managing Editor

Bryon Winans of Dodge City summed up alumni reaction to K-State's 10-6 loss against the University of Northern Iowa.

"I think they were shocked, stunned and embarrassed," said Winans, a 1963 K-State graduate and one of two alumni representatives to the nine-member University Intercollegiate Athletic Council. "When you can't even compete with a (Division I-AA) Northern Iowa, there's definitely something devastating going on."

It was that "devestation" on Saturday, compounded by a 16-10 upset loss to Wichita State University a week earlier, which prompted Head Coach Jim Dickey's forced resignation on Sunday.

K-State is a Division I-A university.

"Obviously this is upsetting for me to talk about," Winans said, "I'm talking about a guy who's a good friend of mine when we talk about Jim Dickey. But basically what's happened in the last two weeks is an embarrassment to the students, all the alumni and the players.

"Maybe it's a move that was needed to shake some people up."

Many alumni called for Dickey's resignation last year after the team posted a 3-7-1 season and a tie for fifth place in the Big Eight. Former Athletic Director Dick Towers, who was fired by President Duane Acker in December 1984, said his failure to fire Dickey last year, under alumni pressure to do so, was the reason for his dismissal.

Dr. Ray Thompson of Phillipsburg and member of the Alumni Athletic Council, an advisory board to the athletic director consisting of various alumni from across the state, said replacing Dickey has been a topic of discussion in previous meetings. But after the Wichita State game, Thompson said, "I came home and told my wife it's the worst it has ever been."

"This isn't any reflection upon Jim's personality," Thompson said. "We just can't afford to have all those empty seats in the stadium, which is what is going to happen."

Dr. Bob Domer, of Topeka and also a member of the Alumni Advisory Board, said Dickey's removal, "was unfortunate but not unexpected."

Domer said the team lacked spirit in the Northern Iowa game which couldn't be allowed to persist.

"There was a lack of enthusiasm and inspiration down on the field," Domer said. "They didn't act like they wanted to win."

Hundley backs Travis' decision

By TODD NIGHSWONGER

K-State's football players knew something had to be done.

After consecutive losses to Wichita State University and the University of Northern Iowa to open the season, the players knew the team was going nowhere fast. Yet, they didn't want to think about the possibility that Head Coach Jim Dickey's job might be in jeopardy.

The players, however, were forced to think about it as the 0-2 start led to Dickey's resignation and the hiring of Lee Moon as interim head coach. Moon is K-State's assistant athletic director of operations.

Athletic Director Larry Travis decided that the only way to change the atmosphere and the direction of the football team would be to replace Dickey. It was a move that wasn't popular with the players, but they understood.

Senior free safety Barton Hundley, one of the two team captains, said that although he didn't think Dickey was totally at fault, he still agreed with Travis' decision to make a coaching change.

"He (Travis) told us we're not going in the right direction," Hundley said of Travis. "I'd hate to be in his shoes. He's doing what he thinks is right and I have a lot of respect for him. Whatever is his decision, I'm behind him all the way."

Still, the move shocked Hundley, who wasn't expecting a coaching change so soon.

"I was surprised," he said. "I thought if coach Dickey was going to be released or if he was going to resign, it would be after the season. I didn't think it would be two games into the season."

But while some of the players agreed a change was needed, they weren't sure Dickey should have been the one to go.

"We know coach Dickey's a good coach. We hate to lose him," senior tailback John Kendrick said. "He just coaches, but we still have to go out and play the game."

Hundley said it was the player's lack of enthusiasm that provided a big boost in the 0-2 start.

"It seems like we're always ready to play until it comes to Saturday. And then," he said, "it just seems like we don't play with any enthusiasm.

"Somebody would make a big play and the rest of the team wouldn't respond. TCU (Texas Christian University) is coming in this weekend and if somebody makes the big play, I think everybody is going to come up and congratulate him."

Hundley, though, knew the reason for the team's bad start was more than a lack of enthusiasm, yet he couldn't pinpoint a main reason.

"If I knew that (reason), I'd be the coach," he said.

Even though Moon has been in an administrative position at K-State less than a year, Hundley said that will not hurt the football program.

"Coach Moon's always been around, helping us after practice," he said. "Everybody's looking forward to playing for him."

Volleyball team wins four times to capture title in home tourney

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

In athletic events it is always said that the homecourt plays an advantage. This was true this weekend as the K-State Wildcats took first place in the Ninth Annual K-State Volleyball Invitational.

This was the first time since 1977 that K-State has won the tournament. Other teams competing in the invitational were Montana State, Drake University, Wichita State and Oral Roberts University.

Montana State placed second behind the Wildcats, Montana State was followed by Oral Roberts, third; Wichita State, fourth; and Drake, the defending champions, fifth.

Match play began Friday afternoon with K-State facing Wichita State. The Wildcats won the match in three games, 15-3, 15-12 and 15-9.

In the match K-State had a total of 39 kills, scoring hits, against Wichita State. Senior co-captain Donna Lee was the leading attacker for K-State with 16 kills for an attacking percentage of 61 percent.

"We controlled the tempo quite well. In the first game we played we had relatively few errors and controlled the momentum of the match," Nelson said.

The second contest of the tournament for K-State pitted them against the Bobcats of Montana State. The match went to five games, with K-State coming out on top 15-8, 5-15, 11-15, 15-11 and 15-3.

"In the first game we played exceptionally well and won. In the second, Montana State turned on their burners and beat us rather handily," Nelson said.

K-State got behind in the fourth game but came back and won the fourth game.

"That was a pivotal game for us. Once we won we had the mental advantage. Montana didn't seem to recover. We kept a lot of pressure on them. We won the match in the fourth game, and the crowd really kept us going in the fifth," Nelson said.

The first match Saturday for K-State was Drake University. The Wildcats defeated the Bulldogs in three games: 15-6, 15-10 and 15-3.

As a team K-State had 30 kills, 17 ace serves and 14 blocks. Helen Bundy had six kills and five blocks, Lee had five kills and seven aces, and Mary Kinsey had six kills and two aces.

The final match of the tournament for K-State was against Oral Roberts University. Again K-State was forced to go five games to win the match. The Wildcats won 15-8, 5-15, 1-15, 15-12 and 15-9.

K-State had three members on the tournament team: Renee Whitney, quarterback of the Wildcat offense, Bundy and Kinsey.

An outstanding player of the tournament award was also given. Kinsey of K-State was selected as the recipient of the award.

Harriers place 1st, 2nd in tourney

The cross country season started off on the right foot with both the K-State men's and women's teams placing at or near the top of the Nebraska Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

The men's team earned first place and filled the top two individual spots. The women's team placed four runners in the top 10 and finished second overall behind the University of Nebraska.

The performance of both teams pleased Head Coach Steve Miller. He said the men's team could have performed better on the individual scale if injuries and sickness wouldn't have burdened some members. Bryan Carroll placed seventh despite a a foot injury, and Mike Rogers placed sixth while recovering from the flu.

The men's team was led by Ron Stahl placing first with a time of 32:14. Jim Knudsen helped by handling second place with a time of 32:29. Team member Bryon Lopez also finished in the top 10 with fifth place at 33:04. Two other runners for the 'Cats — Dave Pulford with a time of 34:01 and Rob Hayes at 34:12 — placed 13th and 17th, respectively.

Of the seven-team field, the men's team took first with a score of 21 points. Finishing second, and far behind the 'Cats, was South Dakota State University with 42 points.

The K-State women's team placed second in an eight-team field with a total of 34 points. The Nebraska team took first with only 28 points. Miller was not disappointed, however, with the 'Cats' second-place finish.

"I feel very confident with the way we performed today, considering the number of freshmen (Angie Barry and Lisa Wakem) we ran. I know how much further we're going to come along, and I feel confident we're the team to beat in the Big Eight," Miller said.

In the women's competition, Alysun Deckert placed fourth in a time of 18:05.02 to be the 'Cats' top finisher. Also taking top 10 spots were returning All-American Jacque Struckhoff, fifth, 18:05.8; Anne Stadler, sixth, 18:09.2; and Wakem, ninth, 18:28.6.

The 'Cats also had runners Nancy Hoffman taking 15th place in a time of 19:03.4, Barry placing 20th in a time of 19:25 and Cathy Rochford in at 20:12.4 to place 36th.

Dance provides Aggie alternative

By J. SCOTT HOLT
Collegian Reporter

Students mingled, glasses jingled and couples danced to the sounds of Ultimate Entertainment.

The lights were low and the crowd was large, but this wasn't Aggieville. There was no cover charge and no alcohol in the drinks.

Approximately 200 students showed up for the first All University Dance sponsored by Union Program Council. The Catskeller was transformed into a dance hall overnight, as students crowded in to dance to the sounds of disc jockey Dave Turner's Ultimate Entertainment. The admission and popcorn were free. Non-alcoholic drinks and nachos were available for 75 cents.

Janice Kiser, Union program adviser, said the sponsoring UPC Special Events Committee tried to create a pub atmosphere to give the students an attractive alternative to Aggieville. Kiser said the University of Kansas had tried a similar approach for underage students and had been successful.

Kiser and Julie Stephens, senior in sociology and chairperson of the UPC Special Events Committee, have worked together on the idea of an alternative to Aggieville since the summer. The Union was considered an excellent location for a dance because of its proximity to the residence halls, Kiser said.

"We distributed flyers, talked to RAs (residents' assistants) and worked in conjunction with Wellness Week to promote this dance," said Kiser.

"I'm really pleased with the crowd and I hope we can get a band here soon," said Stephens.

Union catering provided a bar serving a variety of non-alcoholic drinks for 75 cents a drink.

"Pineapple coolers (a mixture of pineapple juice and 7-Up®) were the most popular drink," said bartender Dan Costello, junior with a dual major in accounting and pre-law. Costello said mock champagne was also a popular drink.

A major contributor to the ambiance of the evening was disc jockey Dave Turner, junior in marketing. The dance floor was crowded as couples danced to the wide variety of songs Turner played in his Ultimate Entertainment music show. A remote request line was used frequently.

"I had fun. I played a little rock, a little soul and pretty much followed requests," said Turner. Turner donated his time Friday night.

The crowd reaction was generally enthusiastic. Jamie Berends, freshman in secondary education, said, "It's fun and I think it's great for the freshmen because we can't go bar hopping."

An alternative to bar hopping wasn't the only reason students attended the dance.

"I think the dance is a good idea for a lot of the freshmen to meet people without being in a fraternity or sorority," said Kevin Bochantin, freshman in architecture.

Soviet troops detain truck; Weinberger says 'deliberate'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, denouncing the Soviets for failing to "control their troops," said Sunday that a U.S. military observer in East Germany was detained at gunpoint for nine hours after his truck was deliberately bumped.

Weinberger said the incident, which happened "a few days ago" but was not previously announced, involved a soldier in the same unit as Maj. Arthur Nicholson, a U.S. Army officer killed by a Soviet bloc soldier earlier this year.

"The Soviets bumped his truck deliberately where we were supposed to be, and doing what we were permitted to do under a treaty that is some 40 years old," Weinberger said on CBS' "Face The Nation."

"It is the third or fourth incident of this kind," Weinberger said. "When he attempted to get out and fix the truck they pushed him back into the truck and held him at gunpoint and detained him for roughly nine hours and generally behaved in the same way in which they did when Maj. Nicholson was killed and murdered."

Weinberger's statement, which included no identification of the soldier or the location of the incident, was made in response to a reporter's question and appeared to take the White House, the State Department — and even Pentagon officials — by surprise.

Public affairs duty officers at all three branches said they had no information on the incident beyond what Weinberger had said. Revelations of previous incidents involving U.S. observers were made immediately after they occurred.

An administration official, providing a few additional details, said Weinberger may have "overdramatized what happened."

"The Soviet commander apologized profusely," the official said.

Under a U.S.-Soviet pact, a limited number of American soldiers are permitted to travel in East Germany in return for similar rights by Soviet soldiers in West Germany.

Asked why the incident had not been announced by the United States at the time it happened, Weinberger said: "We're trying our best to get the conditions corrected. We're not interested in publicity."

Amnesty

if it was because of us or because of a trade embargo (President Ronald) Reagan implemented," she said.

Some months after the beginning of Opolski's confinement, the prison's warden began receiving letters from residents of the United States, England and Japan encouraging the Polish officials to release him.

"This was our first case. Opolski was a POC, a prisoner of conscience, she said.

"Sometimes (as in this case) we are asked by the research department of the AI to accept a case on an investigation basis. When we do this we tailor our letters to finding out where a prisoner is and why this person has been imprisoned.

The cases are randomly assigned to the groups by the AI Secretariat in London.

"In the case of Opolski we wrote to the Catholic Church and to the churches near where he lived to find out what prison he was in, and his condition," she said. "We wrote to government officials also.

"As sometimes happens we found out nothing. But in the end, the research department found out what prison he was in and the circumstances of his imprisonment. And it then became a regular adoption case."

An "adoption case" refers to a situation in which the individual or individuals have been verified as being authentic prisoners of conscience.

"At this time we began writing for the release of Opolski, utilizing the influence of the Catholic Church and mentioning the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights," she said.

The United Nations Declaration of Human Rights is a doctrine of human rights agreed upon by those nations in the U.N. and which is not a legal document unless it is incorporated in the legislation of a country.

She said members of Amnesty write letters because it makes government officials realize that people in the outside world are concerned for the safety of a prisoner and that if detention continues it may create negative publicity.

Sometimes a prisoner is released or stops being tortured because the prison or government officials become unnerved by Amnesty investigations.

She said Amnesty members write letters to prisoners and family.

Experts say farmers must face reality

By GISELE MCMINIMY
Collegian Reporter

Farmers must face reality and deal with the problems at hand, said Jim Henry, Chairman of the Kansas Ecumenical Farm Issues Coalition.

Henry, along with Dave Woolfolk, president of the Federal Land Bank Association of Manhattan-Abilene; and Clinton McDiffett, a Wabaunsee county farmer, offered various viewpoints on the farm crisis situation at the Ecumenical Christian Ministries Center, 1021 Denison Ave., Sunday night.

"We're dealing with 'what is' not 'what if'," Henry said.

Farming becoming bimodal system

McDiffett finds the "'what is' a little depressing." He remembers when his brother bought a combine, tractor, plow and disk for almost $5,000. McDiffett spent over $100,000 this year for a combine and two heads. Because of these expenses, McDiffett has had to adjust to many of the same problems other farmers are going through today.

"A lot of banks are turning their backs on us," McDiffett said. "You don't want to tell them you're in agriculture because they don't like it."

Bankers McDiffett has talked to have suggested finding money from private individuals.

The government is going through a policy change which indicates leaders want to move agriculture into a self-sustaining position, Woolfolk said. A move which may cause a change in the distribution of farms.

"I think we're moving to a bimodal agriculture," Woolfolk said.

Bimodal agriculture means there will be a lot of small family farms and a lot of large corporation farms, but very few middle-sized farms. The bulk of production will come from the large corporations, he said.

The small operations may have to rely on more than just the farm income to survive. Either husband or wife, or both, will have to hold down outside jobs, Woolfolk said.

Farmers are learning to be efficient through these hard times, he said.

"We have to live with what we have," Henry said. "That's the reality."

10 join in wellness run despite rainy weather

By The Collegian Staff

About 10 people braved the cool, damp and dark Friday morning to participate in the West Hall Wellness Week Run.

Scott Searls, hall director and graduate student in business administration, organized the event.

"The intent of the run was to get people to get out and do something that was good for them," Searls said. "By the time they go to class, they can look back and see they've accomplished something."

The run was not timed, and there was no official sign-up or entry fee.

The athletes were invited to jog, run, walk or ride a bike to complete the 2-to 3-mile course.

Participants met at 7 a.m. on the front steps of West Hall. The course traveled south on North Manhattan Avenue to Anderson Avenue. It then turned north on Denison Avenue to Claflin Street and ended at West Hall.

Finishers gathered in the lobby of West Hall to drink orange juice following the run.

"All I've lived on in the past is that enthusiasm is caught, not taught," the 38-year-old Moon said. "That's what I'm going to get across to the kids."

One of those "kids," senior captain Barton Hundley, said the decision to name Moon coach was a popular one with the players.

"Coach Moon has always been around after practices to help us out in any way he could, and I think everyone is looking forward to playing for him," Hundley said.

Moon said he took the job because "at this time, this is the best thing I can do to help the program.

"I'm taking this position because I believe Kansas State has a future. I believe in Larry and what he is trying to accomplish," Moon said.

Hundley echoed Moon's sentiments.

"Mr. Travis is doing what he thinks is right, and I think the other players and I support him in what he's trying to do," Hundley said. "Something had to be done. And though I'm surprised it was done now, it was important for us to reevaluate.

"We need to go out there, work hard and have some fun. We've still got nine more chances to win games."

Although Moon has been given the title "interim coach," Travis would not rule out the possibility that he could become the head coach on a full-time basis following the season. At the same time, however, Travis said he did not want to put any pressure on Moon to be successful immediately.

"I don't want to put any pressure on Lee. I don't want him to feel that he has to win every game to continue to be the coach," Travis said. "I'm asking him to do this to help us move things along.

"He's doing this as a favor to this institution, and I'm sure the board or screening committee would want to talk to him if he is successful the remainder of the year."

Travis said a search committee for a head football coach would be formed in the next two weeks. However, the interview process would not begin until the end of the season because "we would hope that the men we interview would still be coaching until then."

Moon said retaining the head coaching job on a full-time basis was the furthest thing from his mind at this point.

"I'm assistant athletic director for operations, and part of operations at this point is being head football coach," he said. "We'll see what happens at the end of the year."

Moon said the decision to take the job was one of the two hardest decisions he has ever made.

"I've had to make two really hard decisions within the course of the year — one to get out of coaching, and the other to get back into it," Moon said.

Moon said his initial reaction upon being offered the job was not what one would expect from a man who until this season had worked hard to gain a head coaching position.

"To be truthful, I was sick to my stomach after Larry offered me the job," Moon said.

Travis, however, never waivered in his choice.

"Lee was the guy I thought we needed, and thank God he said he'd do it," Travis said.

home secretary, Hurd has some responsibility for security matters involving diplomats and non-diplomatic foreigners in Britain.

The Sunday Telegraph, a strong backer of the prime minister, reported that Britain "was ready to hit back...and send home more Russians."

In background briefings for reporters, British officials said a list of further possible expulsions had been drafted to be acted on if the Soviets made more than a token response.

British newspapers said meanwhile that Oleg Gordievski, reputed KGB spymaster in London whose defection set off the expulsions, was instrumental in the conviction of a Briton for spying last year and may have forced other Britons working for Moscow to flee the country.

Britain announced the defection of Gordievski, a counselor at the Soviet Embassy, on Thursday. It said on the basis of information he furnished, Britain was giving 25 Soviet diplomats, officials and journalists three weeks to leave the country.

The Soviets ordered an equal number of Britons to leave Moscow for activities "incompatible with their status," diplomatic parlance for espionage. The list included 18 diplomats, two businessmen and five journalists.

The Sunday Times, quoting unidentified intelligence sources, reported that Gordievski, who allegedly was the Soviet secret service's No. 2 man in London at the time, betrayed British double agent Michael Bettaney to British authorities.

According to The Sunday Telegraph, a number of Britons named as spies by Gordievski have fled the country since he disappeared from the Soviet Embassy several weeks ago.

The Soviet order Saturday for 25 Britons to leave came two days after London announced it was expelling 25 Soviets on spy charges.

Britain's Foreign Office said the Soviets it ordered out were tabbed as spies by Oleg Gordievski.

By unofficial records, it appears to be the largest single group of Western correspondents ordered out at once and leaves Britain with nine permanently accredited correspondents in Moscow.

Reagan consults Nixon on foreign relations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Ronald Reagan said Monday he has spoken frequently to former President Richard Nixon in preparing for his November summit meeting with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

Reagan said he agreed with Nixon's assessment that "we want peace; the Soviet Union needs peace."

During a question-and-answer session with regional editors and broadcasters invited to the White House for briefings by top officials, Reagan also said U.S. ally Honduras "behaved nobly and was well within its rights" in launching an air strike Friday against a Nicaraguan artillery battery.

Honduras said Nicaraguan forces were firing mortars across the border and had killed one Honduran and wounded eight in the latest of numerous border incidents between the two countries. Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega called it an unprovoked attack by Honduran war planes.

Reagan was asked whether, in getting ready for the summit in Geneva on Nov. 19-20, he has taken or sought the advice of Nixon, a Republican predecessor, who resigned in disgrace more than a decade ago.

"I have frequently talked to President Nixon," Reagan replied. "He had great experience and is most knowledgeable on international affairs."

Reagan noted that Nixon "had a number of meetings both in this country and there" with his Soviet counterpart, the late Leonid Brezhnev.

"My problem for the first few years was they kept dying on me," Reagan said, referring to the deaths of three Soviet leaders in four years.

Speaking of the summit, at which he will meet Gorbachev for the first time, Reagan said, "There are great differences between our two systems, and they're not going to like ours, and we don't like theirs. But we have to live in the world together."

In quoting Nixon as contrasting the United States' desire for peace and the Soviet Union's need for it, Reagan added, "They do. With this great, massive build-up — the greatest the world has ever seen — in military might, we have augmented our forces and I think have given them reason to believe we are not going to allow them to get such a superiority in weapons that they can someday lay down an ultimatum."

But at the summit, Reagan said, he hopes to "make them recognize that we both have to live in the world together.

It doesn't mean that we have to love each other or that we have to change each other's system."

On Aug. 9, 1974, Nixon became the first U.S. president to resign his office.

Britain expels Soviet 'spies'; tensions rise

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Britain ordered six more Soviets out of the country Monday in an escalating series of expulsions of purported spies which has plunged Anglo-Soviet relations to one of the lowest points since World War II.

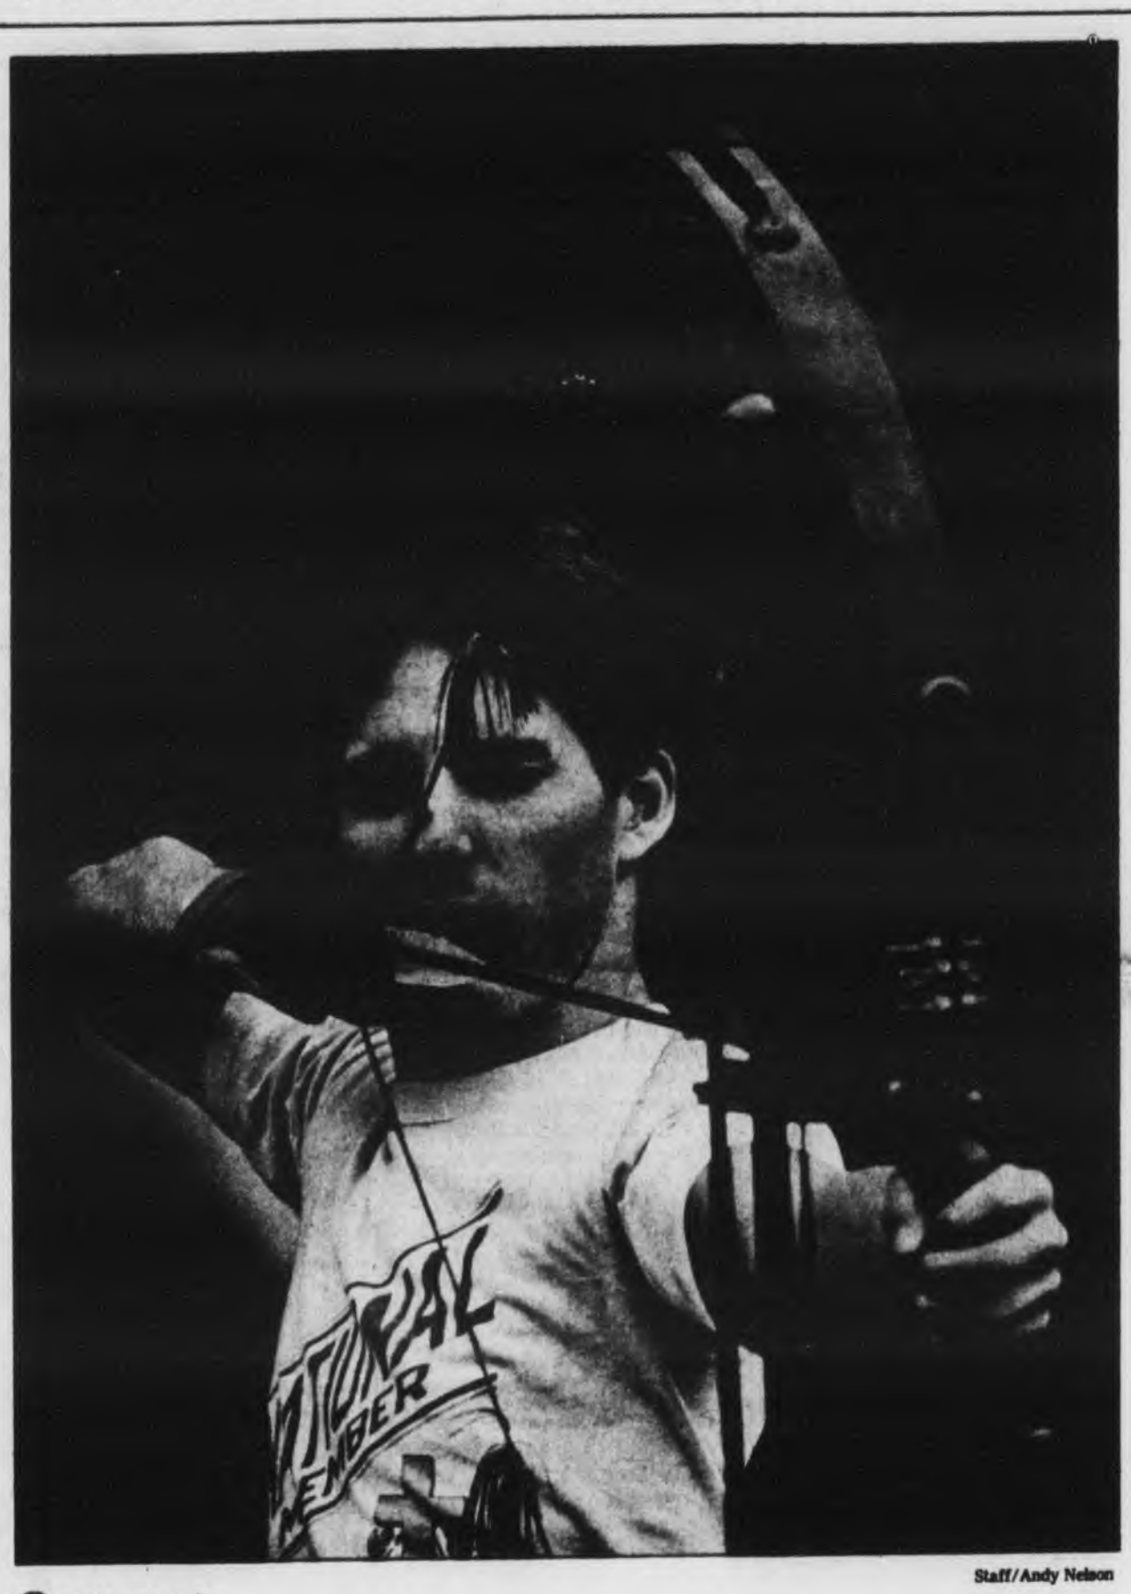
The government accused two Soviet diplomats, two embassy clerks, a trade representive and a journalist of spying and ordered them to leave Britain by Oct. 7. Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe said the move was designed "to uphold Britain's national security."

The government also cut the permitted level of Soviet official personnel in Britain from 211 to 205.

The Soviet Embassy in London quickly accused Britain in a statement of a "provocative and vindictive action of an unfriendly nature" and said it was "totally unjustified on any grounds whatsoever."

It added that "the entire responsibility for the consequences of this action rests with the British side."

Britain last Thursday ordered 25 Russians to leave Britain by Oct. 3, saying they were named as spies by Oleg A. Gordievski, head of the KGB spy network for Britain who defected and was granted asylum.



Britain warned against retaliation, but on Saturday the Russians expelled 25 Britons, accusing them of spying.

In throwing out six more Soviets Monday, the Foreign Office called the Soviet reprisal "an unwarranted victimization of innocent people, which the British government was not prepared to accept."

The statements by both sides carried ominous overtones of relations getting worse on a broader scale. The Foreign Office said Moscow's action "could not but set back (the) process" of improving ties. The Soviet Embassy replied that "it is hard to discern the professed desire of the British side for a better relationship."

University will honor remainder of contract in spite of resignation

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Sports Editor

Speculation has arisen as to whether former K-State head football coach Jim Dickey will continue to be paid his salary through the end of his contract.

Dickey, who resigned from his head coaching position Sunday, after the Wildcat football team began the season with two upset losses, was in the last year of his contract, which runs through Dec. 31.

The contracts of all of the assistant football coaches will also end Dec. 31 unless renewed.

Athletic Director Larry Travis appointed Lee Moon, assistant athletic director of operations, to replace Dickey as interim head football coach. A decision will be made at the end of the season whether to keep Moon as permanent head coach.

When contacted Monday night, Athletic Director Larry Travis said that Dickey's contract would be honored even though Dickey officially resigned from his position.

"He is going to be paid. His contract will be honored," Travis said.

The decision was made to continue paying Dickey's salary, Travis said, because of Dickey's commitment to building a winning football program.

"It's only right (to pay Dickey). The man has given much of his time and effort here," Travis said. "We should honor his contract.

"His (Dickey's) actions were for the better of the program."

Dickey was unavailable for comment Monday night.

Travis said he didn't know Dickey's actual salary amount. According to K-State's 1985-86 annual budget report, Dickey's current yearly salary is $63,360 — up from $61,500 the year before.

Con Colbert, assistant athletic director and business manager, said Monday night that Dickey didn't resign from his contract but just stepped down from his position as head coach.

"I do know that he will continue to be paid through the end of his contract. As business manager, I know that," said Colbert, who will be leaving K-State to take the athletic director's job at Pan American University in Edinburg, Texas, beginning Oct. 1.

Architecture student dies from fire injuries

By The Collegian Staff

A K-State student has died from injuries suffered in an Aug. 30 fire at an apartment southeast of campus.

Paul Schanzmeyer, 23, senior in landscape architecture, died Monday morning at the University of Kansas Medical Center Burn Unit in Kansas City, Kan.

Manhattan Assistant Fire Chief, Glen Wilkinson, who also serves as the city fire marshall, said the cause of the fire at 1010 Fremont St. was due to "the careless use of gasoline." Schanzmeyer reportedly was using the gasoline to strip paint from an apartment wall.

Schanzmeyer, a native of Jefferson City, Mo., was a graduate of Helias High School, Jefferson City.

Earl Nolting, dean of students, said rosary will be recited at the Buescher Funeral Home, Jefferson City, at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday. Services are to be held at 10 a.m. Thursday at St. Joseph's Cathedral, Jefferson City.

The family requests memorials be made to either the Helias Foundation, Schanzmeyer's high school or the University of Kansas Medical Center Burn Unit.

Student affairs council OKs University alcohol proposal

By RICH HARRIS
Collegian Reporter

Student leaders are pleased with the University Alcohol and Cereal Malt Beverage Policy passed unanimously by the Council on Student Affairs Friday, because it provides a unified policy for student organizations sponsoring events where alcohol is served.

The policy now will go before President Duane Acker for approval, said William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services and chairman of the Council on Student Affairs. The policy will take effect immediately upon Acker's approval.

"We are now drafting a letter to President Acker, which states that the Council has passed the policy. I have no reason to believe that he will not approve the policy," Sutton said.

Any time liquor or 3.2 percent beer is served, 12 policy guidelines must be followed.

The policy includes general information about having alcohol on campus, guidelines governing the consumption and possession of alcoholic beverages by student organizations, procedures for handling violations of the policy and matters relating to athletic facilities and athletic events.

Other guidelines include precautionary measures to ensure that alcoholic beverages are neither accessible nor served to people under the legal drinking age or to people who appear to be intoxicated.

These guidelines include requiring implementation of "carding" procedures to ensure that minors are not allowed access to alcohol. Also, non-alcoholic beverages must be made available to those who do not or cannot drink, and posters noting the availability of non-alcoholic beverages must be displayed. Direct access to alcoholic beverages is now limited to servers and "drinking games" are eliminated.

Student organizations such as the Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils, the Union Activities Board and the KSU Association of Residence Halls will be affected by the policy because 3.2 beer is often served at events the groups sponsor.

Attorney testifies

Board to rule on negligence case

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Former state Sen. Paul Hess Monday told a hearing panel of the Board for Discipline of Attorneys that the strain of political, financial and marital setbacks in 1984 caused him not to pay as much attention to legal cases entrusted to him as he might have.

However, the former chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee defended his over-all handling of three lawsuits, and said he doesn't think his actions warrant severe punishment.

After listening to the former senator's defense, and the accusations of a Johnson County couple who brought one of two complaints against Hess, 37, the three-member panel took the case under advisement.

There was no indication from Chairman Charles Buehler of Claflin when the board might make a decision. He asked Hess to present to the panel copies of documents in his files on the three cases, so it can review them during its deliberations.

The hearing panel could decide the complaints have no merit and dismiss them, find there was misconduct on Hess' part but recommend that no disciplinary action be taken, or recommend to the state Supreme Court that Hess be disbarred, suspended from practicing law or publicly censured.

If the panel recommends discipline, the Supreme Court sets the case for hearing. It makes the ultimate decision on whether Hess violated legal ethics and what discipline to impose.

The Johnson Countian, Frank Filley of Stilwell, told the disciplinary panel Hess apparently lost interest in his cases and would not pursue them after accepting retainer fees as their attorney.

One was a personal injury suit involving an August 1982 automobile accident in which Filley's wife sustained a back injury. The Filleys also wanted Hess to sue a neighbor over alleged telephone harrassment. The third suit, an unrelated worker's compensation case, was brought by a woman named Thelma Waymire who did not appear before the panel and who cannot now be located.

Hess, once one of the most powerful figures in the Kansas Legislature as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, told the hearing panel a combination of adversities placed him under "immense pressure" last year and contributed to any negligence involved in handling the cases.

He listed those pressures as his legislative duties during the first four months of 1984, losing an attempt to win a new Senate term in a different district, an uninsured fire in one of his businesses which he said sent him to the brink of bankruptcy, and "a difficult year in my marriage."

Hess was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee until he moved his residency from Wichita to Johnson County and tried unsuccessfully to win Republican nomination to the Senate from his new district last year.

Switzerland approves emission law

BERN, Switzerland — Switzerland announced Monday it will impose Europe's strictest automobile emission standards beginning Oct. 1, 1987 to reduce air pollution that is killing forests.

New cars will have to meet standards as stringent as those in effect in the United States since 1983, ruled the Federal Council, Switzerland's chief executive body.

About one-third of Switzerland's trees are dying because of pollution, most of it believed caused by auto exhaust, a 1984 government survey indicated.

The council rejected a proposal to cut highway speed limits to further reduce pollution.

The new emission standards will lead to a 67 percent to 91 percent reduction in exhaust pollution, said council member Elizabeth Kopp.

Vehicles not passenger cars will have until Oct. 1, 1988, to fulfill the requirements, she said.

Communists overrun Vietnam base

BANGKOK, Thailand — The communist Khmer Rouge said Monday its guerrillas overran a Vietnamese military base in Cambodia last week, killing 40 soldiers and wounding two.

There was no independent confirmation of the claim, which was broadcast by Khmer Rouge radio and monitored in Bangkok.

It said the guerrillas destroyed powerboats and arms in the 20-minute strike Sept. 11 at Kabaltol, a village on the west bank of Tonle Sap river, which runs through the heart of Cambodia.

The Khmer Rouge and the two non-communist Cambodian resistance groups recntly claimed successful attacks on Vietnamese positions in Cambodia's interior.

Communist Vietnamese troops invaded Cambodia in December 1978, overthrew Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge government and installed the current government led by Heng Samrin the following month. They have occupied Cambodia since.

Kidnappers demand rebels' release

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — A group claiming to hold President Jose Napoleon Duarte's daughter demands the release of nine jailed guerrillas in return for her freedom, a high official source said Monday.

Six gunmen kidnapped Ines Guadalupe Duarte Duran, 35, and a woman friend last Tuesday, killing one of her bodyguards and wounding another.

The source said government officials flew to Mexico on Sunday to make contact with the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, the coalition of five leftist guerrilla organizations fighting the U.S.-backed Salvadoran government.

Attendance declines at state fair

HUTCHINSON — Preliminary attendance totals released Monday show that far fewer people took in the Kansas State Fair this year, and fair officials blame rainy weather and the depressed agricultural economy for the decline.

The fair ended a nine-day run Sunday.

Fair Director Bob Gottschalk said that a weighing of the tickets showed an attendance of 276,598, compared with last year's weighing of tickets that showed 318,000 people attended.

This year's tickets will be hand counted later. In 1984, the official count showed that 343,205 people attended the fair.

Gottschalk said it would take 30 days to determine if the fair lost or made money.

Gottschalk said he felt the fair was a success despite the attendance drop. He said all exhibit space was filled, a new fair information center opened and there was a record number of entries in the livestock shows.

Slattery calls for credit guarantees

TOPEKA — Rep. Jim Slattery said Monday that the federal government should guarantee interest payments on bonds issued by the Farm Credit System to avert a catastrophe for the nation's economy.

Slattery, D-Kan., told a Statehouse news conference, that the crisis within the Farm Credit System poses a potentially more serious threat to the economy than the combined troubles of the Chrysler Corp., the Continental Illinois bank, the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. and the Penn Central Railroad.

The Farm Credit System is an independent agency established by the federal government which includes federal land banks and the Production Credit Association as well as a number of federal intermediate and co-op banks. Slattery said the FCS currently holds $74 billion of the nation's total $212 billion farm debt.

However, Slattery said the system currently has about $9.4 billion in non-performing loans and about $11.8 billion in capital, of which only about $3.4 billion can be easily converted to cash. The amount of bad loans is bound to increase as they become due later this year, he said.

AIDS victim expects defeat in case

KOKOMO, Ind. — Officials will meet Thursday to decide whether a 13-year-old AIDS victim who has been monitoring seventh-grade classes via a telephone link can return to school. His lawyer expects to be turned down.

"We're going to have a case conference and they're going to find against us," said Charles Vaughan, an attorney for Ryan White.

Vaughan said he would rather go directly to federal court with his claim that the boy should not barred from classes in suburban Western School Corp., but a judge has said administrative remedies must be exhausted first.

Ryan, a hemophiliac, contracted acquired immune deficiency syndrome from a blood transfusion. The disease, which destroys the body's immune system, is transmitted by transfusions, sexual contact and contaminated hypodermic needles, but not by casual contact, experts say.

$84 million satellite dies in orbit

LOS ANGELES — An $84 million satellite put into orbit by the crew of the space shuttle Discovery last month apparently is dead, Hughes Communications Inc. said late Monday.

Engineers at Hughes, a division of El Segundo-based Hughes Aircraft Co., have been working to revive the satellite, known as Syncom 4, since the problem cropped up a few days after it was launched Aug. 29.

Hughes didn't disclose the problem until last week.

"It is doubtful that continuing efforts to revive the communications payload will be successful," the company said Monday.

Hughes said it considers the satellite a total loss and will file a claim with its insurers for the full $84 million value of its insurance policy.

Initial results of Hughes' investigation indicates the problem may have been the failure of a cable linking the UHF multiplexer and the transmission antenna, the company said.

Fonda lashes out at pornography

NEW YORK — Actress Jane Fonda argues that pornography should be censored because it panders to an obsession with sex that is harming the nation.

"A top priority in this country must be tracking down the moneymakers and prosecuting them from here to kingdom come. Otherwise, we'll see the collapse of this nation," Fonda said in an interview with Ladies Home Journal.

Asked about civil libertarians' objections to censorship, she said: "the Ten Commandments are a form of censorship. The laws of our land — all the things that encourage us to behave like human beings — are forms of censorship.

"There has to be a concerted effort by everyone who's involved in forming our culture — filmmakers, lawmakers and magazine publishers — to lower the temperature and stop this obsession with sex."

Vietnamese teacher receives award

SALT LAKE CITY — Six years after leaving Vietnam, Luc Pham has been named Teacher of the Year for the Salt Lake City School District, where he has taught English to hundreds of students at Washington Elementary School.

Most of his first-through sixth-grade students are Asian, but with a minority enrollment of 40 percent the school draws students from many backgrounds. Luckily, Pham, 38, is fluent in five languages — Vietnamese, French, English, Chinese and Spanish.

Pham worked as a teacher, then as a translator and intelligence officer in the U.S. Embassy during the Vietnam War. He was captured in 1975 and held in a communist labor camp until escaping in 1977. He came to Utah after spending six months in a refugee camp with his family of seven.

Hurt says he was moved by 'Kiss'

LOS ANGELES — Actor William Hurt, who has a reputation for being intense and introspective during media interviews, says he was moved when he watched his latest film, "Kiss of the Spider Woman."

But Hurt, 35, refused during a recent interview to give an opinion of his performance in the movie about a Marxist political prisoner and an effeminate window dresser who are cell mates in a South American jail.

Hurt won a best actor award at the Cannes Film Festival last May for his performance as the window dresser.

He also starred in such movies as "Body Heat," "The Big Chill," and "Gorky Park" and is preparing for the film version of "Children of a Lesser God."

largest number of alleged Soviet agents — 105 — but the Russians replied by ousting only 18 Britons, and 10 of them had already left Moscow. The retaliation then was considered by Britain as largely symbolic.

In a series of five expulsions and counter-expulsions since then, 12 Soviets in London had to go, but only eight Britons were expelled from Moscow.

When the Russians on Saturday ordered 25 Britons to leave Moscow in a one-for-one expulsion, British officials were highly annoyed.

One British official, who would not permit use of his name, pointed out that while before the present series of expulsions there were only about 98 British embassy staff, businessmen and journalists accredited in Moscow, the level of Soviet personnel permitted in Britain was 234.

"Percentage-wise, the Soviet expulsions Saturday were well against us," the official said.

Britain's new expulsion order Monday followed crisis meetings over the weekend and earlier Monday between Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and two of her top ministers, Howe and Home Secretary Douglas Hurd.

Requests face further study

Planning board slows action

By TOM SCHULTES
Manhattan Editor

The subjects of permanent foundations for mobile homes in the county, a change in minimum lot acreage for residences in agricultural districts and a rezoning request in southeast Manhattan all face further study as a result of action by the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board Monday night.

Riley County Planner Monty Wedel, in making the request for permanent mobile home foundations, said the move was basically "to clean up the regulations" and require tiedowns be permanently anchored. He also noted the requirement would classify a mobile home as real estate for taxation purposes, as opposed to personal property.

Board members tabled the request until Oct. 7 to allow a more precise definition of permanent foundation to be presented by Wedel.

A move to require a minimum of 20 acres for residential properties in General Agriculture Districts was also tabled, despite Wedel telling board members the requirement dated back to a 1980 Kansas statue.

Board member Vern Osborne said he felt the move was just to receive extra tax revenues for the county and "actually reduce the value of the property to nil."

The request is to be heard by the board again at their Oct. 21 meeting.

The third tabled item, a request to rezone a tract of land at 601 South 5th St. from Heavy Industrial to Service Commercial District was returned to the city staff.

The request by Ross Ballard, of Ballard's Sporting Goods, 121 Moro St., would have allowed a section of a warehouse to be remodeled and used as rental property for special occasions, such as parties and wedding receptions.

Board member Eleanor Brent said a study of the entire area would be wise to prepare for future requests stemming from increased interest in the neighborhood for commercial use brought by the proposed Southern Arterial trafficway.

In other action, the board denied a rezoning request by Calvin Beck, Route 1, for property along Stagg Hill Road in southwest Manhattan.

The initial request was for rezoning from General Agriculture District to Single-Family Residential District. John DeVore, 2617 Sumac Drive, said he was opposed due to the precedent the rezoning would present in view of current work to annex the property and bordering property into city limits. Neighborhood residents, as well as board members, have expressed concerns about an increase in traffic flow from more curb cuts and driveways opening up along Stagg Hill Road.

After denying the rezoning request, which had already passed its first reading to the Manhattan City Commission, the board passed an affirmative recommendation to the commission for "R" zoning, which requires larger lot frontages in an effort to reduce the number of driveways entering Stagg Hill Road.

In other action, the planning board allowed a rezoning from R-3, Multi-Family District to R-1, for single-family housing.

The request by Diversified Realty Services, Ltd., is for property in the Little Kitten Creek Subdivision in the northwest section of the city.

City Planner Eric Cattell said the move would actually help by reducing traffic flow and the density of housing in the neighborhood. He said the reduced market for multi-family dwellings in Manhattan was a reason for the request.

Chinese chairman reforms party to aid economic, political change

By The Associated Press

PEKING — Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping swept 131 senior Communist Party officials from power Monday to make way for younger men and ensure the success of his economic and political reforms.

He also ended the life-tenure system that prompted power struggles between stubborn, elderly leaders which have plagued China since the communists took power in 1949. Deng himself was a victim when Chairman Mao Tse-tung dismissed him as a "capitalist roader" during the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution.

Official announcements said all 131 officials submitted voluntary resignations, including 64 full and alternate members of the powerful 344-delegate Central Committee. Among those were 10 of the 24 Politburo members.

The resignations came at the fourth full session of the 12th Central Committee in Peking. Deng and his proteges, party chief Hu Yaobang and Premier Zhao Ziyang, had said earlier that major personnel changes would be made at a series of party meetings this month.

Six Politburo seats were vacated by military men, including Marshal Ye Jianying, an ailing 88-year-old member of the Standing Committee who fought beside the late Chairman Mao in the communist revolution.

Diplomats called it one of the boldest moves by Deng, who has reversed the radical policies of his predecessors and created unprecedented stability since emerging as top leader in 1978.

"This is a historic point in Communist Party history," said one Western analyst, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "If Deng succeeds, it will be a transition that does not involve a coffin or a bullet or a palace coup."

Musicians bring back 16th century melodies

By ERIN EICHER
Collegian Reporter

On Thursday evenings, even a music major might not recognize the sounds coming from the practice rooms in McCain Auditorium.

The instruments being played include shawms, krummhorns, sackbuts, zinks and others more familiar to 16th century audiences than to today's listeners.

Collegium Musicum is practicing for its ninth year of performance under the direction of Sara Funkhouser, assistant professor of music.

Collegium, an ensemble averaging 35 to 40 vocalists and instrumentalists, is dedicated to the historically authentic performance of Medieval, Renaissance and Baroque music.

"It starts by people being interested in this music," Funkhouser said. The Renaissance especially was a "very prolific time period for music" which is largely neglected today.

To ensure authenticity, the instruments played are historical reproductions of early instruments. Some are owned by Funkhouser and some belong to the University. The music used is transcribed directly from the original manuscripts.

Collegium is a "town and gown organization" meaning it is open to students, faculty and townsfolk. From year to year, the ensemble keeps a stable core of faculty and Manhattan residents and adds a new group of students. The class isn't limited to music majors. This year's Collegium includes students in areas as varied as biochemistry, biology and philosophy.

"It's a kind of nice group of students from all different areas and townspeople. We all have the common interest in early music, and there's no pressure," Farrell librarian Carolyn Smith said. Smith has been singing with the group since its beginning in 1976.

"It's a great deal of fun, and it's work. The music takes a lot of concentration," Smith said.

Donna Moore, graduate student in music education, has played in Collegium for five years. Moore's instruments are the soprano recorder, krummhorn and shawm — forerunner of the oboe.

"The instruments are so unusual. I'd never be able to play instruments like this anywhere else," Moore said.

Outside of the large group, many smaller ensembles give performances at local events like the the St. Mary Hospital Benefit, the Olde English Fair at St. Paul's Church, Strecker Gallery openings and art department auctions.

The large group will perform in costume Sept. 28 at the Renaissance Fair in Bonner Springs. The group will also give an end-of-the-semester concert Dec. 8 at 8 p.m. in the third floor reading room of Farrell Library.

U.S. should aid South African revolution

DANIEL GRUBB
Collegian Columnist

One of the criticisms leveled against the revolutionaries in South Africa is that if they do succeed in overthrowing the government, communism will spread to a strategically important area.

This argument is somehow used to justify the continued oppression of the majority in this grief-stricken country. But before we jump to conclusions about the inevitability of communist takeover, we should look at our actions and ask whether we are in fact forcing the oppressed blacks into an anti-American position.

First, we need a little bit of history.

Perhaps the paradigm of communist takeover of a country is that given in Cuba. Former Cuban President Fulgencio Batista, while not exactly a friend of the United States, was nevertheless responsible for the continued prosperity of American businesses in Cuba at the expense of the natives in that land. Understandably, this caused quite a bit of resentment, not just toward Batista, but also toward our own fine country.

In 1959, Fidel Castro overthrew the Cuban regime with the blessings of the United States. Castro called his government "humanistic," not yet communist. He tried to improve the conditions of his citizens by a variety of means, one of which was nationalizing the sugar industry and much American-controlled land.

This last was intolerable to the United States. After some understandable anti-American rhetoric on Castro's part, we broke off relations with our former friend. This led to Castro's adoption of communist ideas as the only method of assuring his country's growth.

We know the consequences. Today Cuba is a repressive regime — although there are many good things to say about it, such as its high literacy rate. Cuba now maintains a rather vicious campain against the United States.

Something we should all ask is whether, by understanding the reasons for nationalization, we could have made a permanent friend of Castro and thus avoided much of the fear our leadership now expresses over Cuba. By looking at other examples, such as Nicaragua, where the same pattern of response to nationalization occurred, I believe the answer is yes.

My purpose now is not to bewail past mistakes, but to prevent future ones. In particular, the blacks in South Africa are beginning to get the message that the United States is not going to help them in their struggle to remove an oppressive government.

This cannot lead to an overabundance of loyalty to U.S. interests. Recently, some South African businessmen spoke to the revolutionary forces in their country and came away quite pleased with themselves.

One thing that was brought up, though, was that some of the more powerful businesses would be nationalized. This set off a warning light when I read it. History is repeating itself. All of the criteria for an American loss were there.

The upshot of all of this is that we should immediately break ties with the current government of South Africa and begin supplying as many arms to the blacks as possible. Then we should not be surprised when some businesses are taken over by the revolutionaries.

If we remain supportive at that stage, we may very well have a just and dependable ally in the South African people. If we don't, another important country will fall to the Soviet side. We make the decision. To blindly serve the interests of the almighty dollar will, in the end, hurt all of us.

End apartheid with action

South Africa's repressive apartheid government has begun to hint that it may be ready for reform.

After years of stubborn resistance to any type of meaningful alteration in a disgustingly unfair system of rule, recent statements by South African government officials have signified that some meaningful change could be on the way.

On Sept. 12, a committee appointed by South African President Pieter Botha took a dramatic step toward reforming the apartheid system by proposing that "pass laws" for blacks be abolished.

"Pass laws" bar blacks from white areas of cities, except for temporary workers who live in separate townships or residential areas outside the cities.

Although the proposal has not taken effect yet, it will very likely draw Botha's support.

Also on Sept. 12, the government announced plans to restore South African citizenship to 10 million blacks who lost it because they live in so-called tribal homelands.

The government attempted to pass off the tribal homelands as sovereign states. In reality, the tribal homelands are nothing of the sort, and are controlled by the government.

On Sept. 16, South African Ambassador Herbert Beukes said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the government has plans to hear proposals related to citizenship for blacks and would negotiate with black leaders for further political reforms.

Included in these proposals is a possiblity of granting voting rights to black South Africans.

Beukes said the government has plans to "move away from apartheid, to dismantle apartheid."

While the steps taken by the government would not eliminate the apartheid system, they would represent a significant improvement in conditions for blacks.

However, all that has come from South African government officials so far has been in the form of rhetoric.

It is the responsibility of the United States to see to it that the rhetoric turns into action.

Record ratings censorship

A group of concerned parents in Washington, D.C., has begun a campaign to force record companies to rate rock albums in much the same manner the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) rates films, in order to give parents a guide in buying albums for their children.

The Parents Music Resource Center (PMRC) — spearheaded by the wives of Treasury Secretary James Baker and Congressman Albert Gore, D-Tenn. — wants record companies to institute a set of ratings that would indicate the content of a song's lyrics. The proposed ratings include an "X" rating for profane or sexually explicit lyrics; an "0" rating for lyrics of an occult nature; a "V" rating for violent lyrics; and a "D/A" rating for lyrics dealing with drugs and/or alcohol.

The group has also recommended a number of other provisions to aid parents in determining what popular music their children should be allowed to purchase. These include making printed copies of lyrics available for parents to peruse prior to purchasing an album.

While these parents obviously feel a desire to protect their children from sex and violence, the means they propose are inadequate. The PMRC guidelines ignore several facets of the record industry, making such guidelines almost impossible.

Record company executives have agreed to place warning labels on albums which contain objectionable material — but PMRC says this is not enough. Recording industry officials have said that going beyond that would be impractical because publishing companies own the rights to lyrics, not the record companies. They also argue that rating records would be a nightmare.

The record company officials are correct in fighting against PMRC. Implementing a system of record ratings similar to those practiced by the MPAA is ridiculous.

With films, the MPPA has a tangible set of criteria that determines a film's rating. While graphic sex or violence in film cannot be seen any other way, lyrics are often subject to interpretation by the listener.

The issue is scheduled to come before a U.S. Senate committee for discussion Thursday. The Legislature should realize the problems with the proposal and encourage parents to listen to the radio if they wish to practice censorship.

Student section to suffer in coliseum plan

STEVE MILLIGAN
Guest Columnist

If you think the 16,000-seat Fred Bramlage Coliseum proposal was planned poorly, take a look at the 13,000-seat version.

Please note the "13,000 seats," not 13,500 as the University administration is claiming. The 500-seat difference is to be made up by portable seats, which until a few days ago, they had planned to place on the floor of the coliseum.

Those portable seats have little to do with the construction plans that are being revised. The seats are an option which the University decided would go along with the 16,000-seat plan long ago. If they had counted those seats back then, that would have made it a 16,500-seat plan.

But at the time, people were saying the planned coliseum was too big, so the University administration made it sound as reasonable as possible by using the lower figure, 16,000.

Now the University has been forced to eliminate 3,000 seats, so they are counting the 500 portable seats to make it sound like they've been shrewd enough to eliminate only 2,500.

As best as I have been able to discern from conversations with student leaders and University employees, the 3,000 seats are to be eliminated by lopping off everything above the concourse level. This also would eliminate several offices and allow for a smaller roof.

Pending Board of Regents' approval, the 13,000-seat bowl below the concourse level is to be pretty much the same as in the earlier plan. There should be about 15 feet between the first row of permanent bleachers and the basketball court. It is in this space that they plan to place the 500 portable seats for students. . .or students.

On the student side of the coliseum, I understand the permanent bleachers are to come all the way down to floor level. Two rows of portable seats are to be placed in front of them.

On the ends, behind the baskets, the permanent bleachers are to stop at 2½ feet above floor level. Ten rows of portable seats are to be placed between there and the baseline.

After hearing this, I realized that the view from those 10 rows might not be too good. If the seats are to be on the same level as the court, the people behind the second row wouldn't be able to see much.

So I phoned University architect Jim Shepard, who is on the Program Committee for the Coliseum, and told him about this problem.

He acknowledged that "we hadn't considered that aspect," and he ventured a guess that the sight lines might not be too good. So he offered to get in touch with the architects from Gossen and Livingston who are working on the design, and find out what could be done.

A couple of days later, I called back. Shepard informed me that risers were to be used in that area. Each riser is to have a height difference of "3 to 4 inches."

Being somewhat of a skeptic, I take that to mean "3 inches." After all, there is only a 30-inch height available, and 10 rows of portable seats are planned.

Three inches doesn't seem like much to me. The height difference between each row of court-side bleachers in Ahearn is 8 inches. That is a big difference.

Since I'm not an architect, evaluating the view from those portable seats is hard. But I can say that during the haphazard coliseum planning process, the University did not consider the view from those student seats.

Of course, that should come as no surprise to the students. The present University administration rarely has considered the students' point of view.

Coach Dickey not responsible for football losses

Editor,

I think it is incredible that Head Coach Jim Dickey resigned after our recent loss to Northern Iowa. Dickey didn't play against Northern Iowa, the guys on our football team did. How is it that Dickey can blame himself for us losing?

Football is supposed to help develop leadership in students, not in the head coach. Where are the leaders of our football team?

Somebody has to call the play, somebody has to assess the weak and strong points of the opposition, somebody has to determine the training regimen. In other words, somebody has to be in charge. That somebody should be a quarterback, not a coach.

The coaches must relegate themselves to an advisory role. The ability of a coach has absolutely nothing to do with our team winning games. If people would realize this, everybody would be more relaxed and we might win some games.

The children's faces lit up as the old Indian chief made his way to the center ring. Curious, they continued watching as an Indian chief began to walk a tightrope to the ceiling. As he neared the end of the rope he paused, readjusted his footing and began to slide backward down the rope. With a bang of the cannon, the show began.

"Ladies and gentlemen, good afternoon and welcome to one of the greatest shows on earth, the Tarzan Zerbini Circus," cried the ringmaster.

Zerbini dazzled the audience as she performed with six tigers, guiding them through various poses and dangerous leaps through circles of fire.

The excitement continued to build as "The Fearless Bauers" started their pole-climbing act. Daring to climb to the height of the ceiling, the Bauers caused the poles to sway. As the poles swung toward each other, as quick as the blink of an eye, the Bauers changed poles in midair.

The audience was continuously entertained by all sorts of performers. From the opening tightrope balancing act to the Zerbini jugglers and the dancing Arabian horses, everyone waited with anticipation for the next event.

The Zerbini circus is one of the five largest circuses in the world and is owned and promoted by Tarzan Zerbini.The circus is in its ninth generation of the Zerbini family. They travel the United States doing the Shrine circus 10 months of the year.

The Tarzan Zerbini Circus, which preformed Sunday at Weber Arena, was sponsored by the K-State Block and Bridle club and the ISIS Shrine Temple.

"This is the fifth year Block and Bridle has helped with the circus," said Mark Wulfkuhle, senior in animal sciences and industry and Block and Bridle circus coordinator. "We run the concession stands and get to keep the profits."

The Manhattan ISIS Shrine, headquartered out of Salina, is one of five temples in Kansas. The others are located in Kansas City, Topeka, Wichita and Pittsburg. There are 188 temples in the United States, said Doug Jolley, recorder and business manager of ISIS Shrine.

ISIS has a membership of approximately 4,500 in 43 counties in Kansas covering Manhattan to the Colorado border, and from Great Bend to the Nebraska line, Jolley said.

The Shrine, often referred to as "The Worlds Greatest Philanthropy," supports 19 orthopedic hospitals for crippled children and three burn institutes.

Proceeds of the Tarzan Zerbini Circus are used for the care and transportation of the children. The hospitals are open to any child regardless of race or religion and are of no cost to the child or the parents.

"Since we opened our first hospital in 1922, we have helped over 280,000 children," Jolley said.

"We from ISIS Temple are sending approximately 150 children to and from the hospital right now. The local Manhattan Shrine club is sending 10 children from this area to the hospitals."

As the audience filed from Weber Arena it was evident they had all enjoyed the show. But perhaps they didn't realize that by spending an afternoon at the circus they had helped thousands of children all over the world.

Firm alerts traders to cultural factors

By MARGARET MAY
Collegian Reporter

A Manhattan firm is lending a helping hand to trade corporations around the world.

The International Trade Institute, 1627 Anderson Ave., helps companies discover cultural differences between countries. These differences could be important knowledge for business meetings, said Kevin Langston, graduate in business administration. Langston works at the trade institute as an information specialist.

In 1976, the institute was started as a service to people and firms involved in international trade and for the education of those interested in developing the tools used in international trade.

The institute is involved in researching and gathering information about international trade capabilities of the mid-America region for companies interested in international trade, said Ray Coleman, professer of marketing and director of the International Trade Institute. The institute works with any kind of company involved in international trade, Langston said.

The information center was started last year when the Dane G. Hansen Foundation, Logan, donated $15,000, enabling the institute to buy directories and reference books. Some of the books cost about $500 and are too expensive for individual firms to buy themselves, Langston said.

The directories provide information about different worldwide firms including the size of the firm, number of employees, economic, political and financial situations, trade restrictions and licensing regulations, Coleman said.

"We feel it is important to have an information network of firms and individuals whom we can contact world-wide for information. We use various resources, and we are continually building and trying to improve (contacts) and work on that," Coleman said.

As an information specialist, Langston receives telephone calls from businesses which deal in international trade or are interested in international trade. He gathers the information requested by the company using the information center directories and other sources such as the Department of Commerce in Washington, D.C., or the Kansas Department of Economic Development in Topeka.

Teresa Lewis, senior in electrical engineering, also works at the institute as an information specialist. Lewis uses a data base called Dialogue which can obtain information for companies faster than using directories. Using the Dialogue system is expensive, and the price varies depending on the information obtained and the length of time the system is used, Lewis said.

The institute is not equipped to handle in-depth studies, but it can give a company the information it needs to get started in international trade, Lewis said.

The International Trade Institute is also working on an international trade policy research information network for the the Midwest.

"We are actually trying to involve other universities in other states to work with us on this," Coleman said, "so that what we are trying to develop is a multi-state, multi-disciplinary approach to this (international trade policy)."

The 11 other states the institute is trying to involve are Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

"We thought if we could work with the 12 states, we could have an impact that we cannot have if we are just operating on the small base here in Kansas," Coleman said.

Council offers skills to aid foreign trade

By MARGARET MAY
Collegian reporter

The International Trade Council of Mid-America Inc., a Manhattan-based corporation, helps in the growth of international trade skills in the business community by aiding companies interested in international trade.

The council produces Export Mid-America, an advertising brochure written in six languages, and distributes it overseas as a service for companies interested in international trade.

Kevin Langston, graduate in business administration, and Teresa Lewis, senior in electrical engineering, work part-time for the trade council, 1627 Anderson Ave., and for the International Trade Institute, 1627 Anderson Ave.

"What they (Langston and Lewis) are doing for the council right now is selling advertisements in the Export Mid-America brochure," said Chuck Holle, executive secretary of the trade council.

"The brochure does a lot of things for us: No. 1, it provides the opportunity for companies to promote their products overseas and identify prospects for sales or for people to distribute their products, license and build their products. So that, to me, is primary. Nothing in this trade business works unless we can make

Students to discuss options for $700,000

By The Collegian Staff

An open forum to discuss possible uses of $700,000 in funds from the Fred Bramlage Coliseum has been scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in Union 213.

The forum, sponsored by Students for Educational Awareness, will allow students and faculty to discuss ideas regarding use of the funds, which are being returned to students through bond refinancing. The money was originally slated for use toward the Coliseum.

Scheduled speakers for the forum include: Brice Hobrock, Dean of Farrell Library; Earl Nolting, director for the Center for Student Development; Gretchen Holden, adviser for Students for Handicapped Concerns; Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications; Steve Scott, fifth-year student in architectural engineering; Charles Beckom, University Police Chief; Ed Schiappa, assistant professor of speech and director of debate; Gordon Derr, instructor in civil engineering; and possibly Nancy Twiss, academic adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Hobrock will discuss using the money to establish a rare books and study room in the library. Holden said she plans to ask for $150,000 to make Anderson Hall accessible for handicapped students and Nolting will discuss using the $700,000 to renovate Holton Hall in one phase. Buller said he would petition for funds for KSDB-FM. Schiappa will solicit funding for the debate squad.

There will be an open discussion period at the end of the forum for general presentation of ideas for use of funds.

Shelling forces civilians underground

Rival factions paralyze civilian Tripoli

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Rival Moslem militias fighting for control of Tripoli shelled residential districts of the northern port Monday, paralyzing the city and sending civilians underground.

Police reported 28 people killed, nearly half of them civilians, and 68 wounded in the intense artillery battle that began Sunday.

Casualties included 10 Lebanese army soldiers killed and 40 wounded by two mortar rounds that crashed into the 2nd Brigade's Bahjat Ghanem barracks during the night. State-run Beirut radio said a major and three officer cadets were among those killed.

In Beirut, Christian and Moslem militiamen traded sniper fire across the strip of devastation that divides the capital on sectarian lines. Predominantly Christian units of the army fought Druse Moslem militiamen around the army's stronghold at Souk el-Gharb in hills overlooking Beirut.

No casualty reports were available in the Beirut and hill fighting.

The fundamentalist Sunni Moslem Islamic Unification movement, supported by the PLO, and the Syrian-backed Arabian Knights have fought a war of supremacy for two years in Tripoli, which with 500,000 residents is Lebanon's second-largest city.

Four more mortar shells and at least one rocket hit the damaged Bahjat Ghanem barracks later, but caused no casualties, police said.

An army officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said casualties might have been greater had many soldiers not been on weekend leave.

Tripoli's army garrison has stayed on the sidelines, unable to stop the fighting. The shells that hit the barracks apparently were strays.

The Syrian army controls much of north Lebanon and maintains positions on hills overlooking Tripoli, but has made no move to curb the fighting.

Police said the other dead in Tripoli were 13 civilians and five militiamen, three from Islamic Unication and two Arabian Knights.

Both sides used artillery, mortars and multiple rocket launchers in the battle. Cease-fire efforts began Monday and firing abated in the afternoon.

Each accused the other of shooting first. An Arabian Knights statement said Islamic Unification started random shelling of residential areas and the army barracks. The fundamentalists said Israel instigated the battle along with unidentified "local, regional and international powers."

Hardest hit were the densely populated residential districts of Baal Mohsen, Bab el-Tabbaneh, Shaarani, and Kubbeh.

All government offices, banks, schools, cafes and shops closed their doors, police reported, and the oil refinery at the harbor also halted operations.

They described the fighting as the worst in Tripoli since December 1983, when Syrian-backed PLO dissidents drove Palestine Liberation Organization chief Yasser Arafat and his loyalists out of the city.

Farm Credit System may need federal help

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The nation's Farm Credit System appears to have a sufficient surplus and reserves to handle its current level of problem loans, but "the real problem lies in what the future holds," an official of the system said Monday.

Alton Cook, president of Farm Credit Corp. of America, the lending system's central decision-making and service organization, said he is "very concerned with the impact of the farm economy on farm income and land values over the next 12 to 24 months and the impact this may have on the Farm Credit Banks."

He made the comments as directors of the system gathered in Jackson, Wyo., for a three-day meeting to discuss the system's options for what a regulator has called its "most severe crisis...since the Depression days."

Cook said the system, the nation's largest farm lender with more than $74 billion in loans outstanding, has "significant" surplus and reserves.

"But when you look at those reserves, you have to ask how much more stress those reserves can support without having to raise interest rates to intolerable levels or getting some kind of outside assistance," he said.

"The likely source, perhaps the only source, for outside assistance is the federal government," Cook said.

Donald Wilkinson, governor of the Farm Credit Administration and the system's top regulatory official, said earlier this month that the Farm Credit System could be forced to begin liquidating within two years unless the federal government came to the rescue.

Cook and Peter Carney, president of the Federal Farm Credit Banks Funding Corp., the arm of the system that manages the sale of its securities, stopped short of endorsing a call for federal assistance as the meeting of the directors began.

Carney said it had been projected that the 37 Farm Credit Banks might post a loss of $350 million to $400 million this year.

He said a recent special review of the 12 Federal Land Banks, which are part of the Farm Credit Bank group, found that about $6 billion of their $50 billion in loans outstanding are undercollateralized, which means the loan amounts exceed the current market value of the real estate.

Carney said the undercollateralization amounts to about $930 million.

While that does not mean that theundercollateralized portion of the loans would be uncollectible, Carney said, some of the loans are expected to generate "significant losses in the future."

As a result, he said generally accepted accounting principles would require that the Federal Land Banks set aside $780 million to cover possible loan losses, resulting in a charge to current year earnings.

He said the banks began the year with about $547 million in allowances for possible loan losses and should end the year with about $850 million in such allowances.

Irrigation money to be spent on bowling alley

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The small, isolated town of Duchesne, Utah, is about to get a new $450,000 six-lane bowling alley financed by water users and federal taxpayers through the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation.

Municipal and federal officials say the facility is a strike that will bring much-needed recreation to the town's 1,730 residents, but a congressional critic says the bureau has rolled a gutter ball.

"You ask them for a dam and they give you a bowling alley," complains Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Interior subcommittee on water and power resources.

The bureau is providing Duchesne $375,000 toward the facility, with the money coming from the Central Utah Project or CUP, an irrigation project begun 20 years ago with an estimated price tag of $332.5 million.

The CUP is more than 10 years behind schedule, its estimated cost has soared beyond $2 billion and pins will be falling in the Duchesne bowling alley long before the first drop of CUP water reaches Utah.

Alan Grindstaff, the Duchesne city manager, said in a recent interview that the seeds of the situation were sown in the early 1980s when municipal officials went to the bureau seeking cash, not a bowling alley.

He said officials felt they should be getting assistance because of the financial impact on Duchesne of some 200 bureau employees engaged in the irrigation project.

Grindstaff said the workers and their families comprise 30 percent to 40 percent of Duchesne's population and that most live in a federal trailer camp exempt from local property taxes.

He said the federal presence is a losing proposition for the town because although Duchesne receives no direct tax revenues, it must provide services such as police protection and animal control to the entire population.

No studies have been done to support this contention, according to Grindstaff, who is managing a $350,000 municipal budget this year in a town that has a closed-down movie theater, four bars and three churches.

Ed Fowler, acting regional director for the Bureau of Reclamation, said the agency sympathized with Duchesne but told officials that it would be illegal to make direct cash payments to the town in lieu of taxes.

Town and bureau officials say that while the bureau first spoke of a recreation facility, Duchesne mentioned the bowling alley that is slated to open Oct. 1 and be owned and operated by the town.

Little Apple Triathlon Makes a Big

Splash

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Sports Editor

The triathlon — an event consisting of swimming, bicycling and running by an individual or a team — is considered by many as the ultimate sport requiring extensive training and endurance.

But more important than the training is the transition between the three events. A slow transition can be the difference between winning the race and coming in second.

Perhaps nobody knows the importance of transitions in triathlons more than Topekan Chuck Kirmse.

Kirmse, a student at Washburn University in Topeka, entered Manhattan's Little Apple Triathlon last year and lost a chance to win the race when a slow transition between the bicycle and running portions caused him to lose valuable time. He ended up placing fourth last year.

"We got a little screwed up in the transition area," Kirmse recalled. "I came into the bicycle corral and I was looking all over the place for my (running) shoes. I couldn't find them.

"There were some friends who told me that she (Kirmse's girlfriend) had them up the road and I was supposed to keep biking up the road. So I ran up the road barefooted.

"It really hurt my chances for second, possibly first."

Kirmse entered the local triathlon again this year, making sure he knew where his shoes were this time.

It paid off as the Topekan won the overall men's title Saturday in the 1985 Little Apple Triathlon at the River Pond State Park below Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The triathlon consists of a one-third-mile swim, 11½-mile bicycle ride and a 3-mile run.

Kirmse's time of 58 minutes, 17.63 seconds outdistanced Russ Pugh, who finished the race in 1:01:22. Doug Sterbenz (1:01:27.47) and Jerome Nadel (1:01:59.51) were third and fourth. All four were entered in the age 20-24 category.

The overall winner for the women was Mary Ann Johnson, a 31-year-old from Topeka and a 1976 graduate of K-State. She finished in 1:08:37.97. Carol Kozlowski, in the 25-29 age group was second in 1:11:47.62, followed by Jeaney Dupras (1:12:02.57) in the 20-24 category and Barbara Heideman (1:12:47.62) in the 25-29 age group.

There were 200 entries for the triathlon, but the actual number of participating was less.

After graduating from Hayden High School in 1980, Kirmse went to Coffeyville Junior College and participated in the decathlon. He turned away from running events because he didn't like to run.

"I never did like running much," he said. "The farthest I ever did run in the decathlon was the 1,500, and I kind of dreaded that."

His feelings about running changed in the summer of 1983 when Kirmse decided to enter a triathlon, the Topeka Tinman. He spent two weeks training.

Kirmse ran in several triathlons last year but didn't do as well as he would have liked. So this year he decided to begin training in March instead of waiting until summer.

"I think it's really helped me out, getting an early start on the training," Kirmse said. "I think I've placed in the top 10 in every one (triathlon) I've competed in this year."

See results, Page 8

One of those top-10 places was a first-place finish in the Emporia Triathlon in late June. The Little Apple Triathlon was Kirmse's 12th triathlon this year.

Does Kirmse feel like a triathlon veteran at the age of 22?

"Not yet," he said. "Maybe after next weekend if I finish."

Next weekend is the Half Ironman in Smithville, Mo. that includes a 56-mile bicycle ride and a 13-mile run.

Unlike Kirmse, Johnson, the women's winner, had never entered a triathlon before this summer. But that didn't stop her from winning a triathlon in just her third try.

"I'm a runner by nature," said Johnson, who was surprised by the win. "I wasn't counting on this at all. I was shocked."

Johnson's first triathlon was the Cawker City Triathlon on Memorial Day. Her only other triathlon was the Topeka Tinman in June.

The Wamego native attributed part of Saturday's win to the training environment near her north Topeka home.

"It's so hilly there and you come here (River Pond area) and this really seems like flatland," she said.

Johnson expected to have trouble with the swimming portion of the event, but tried to make up for it in the other two parts of the race.

"I'm not a very good swimmer, but I did push on the bike," she said. "I can always rely on my running.

"I'm not afraid of the open water. And I'm also learning how to make fast transitions."

Big Eight head coaches 'disappointed' by news of Dickey's resignation

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Did Jim Dickey quit, get fired, or resign because he had no choice? Dickey says he had no choice. Kansas State Athletic Director Larry Travis says Dickey was not pressured into quitting after just two games of the 1985 season.

But whatever the case, the fact that he is no longer coaching at Kansas State left a bad taste in the mouths of every one of his Big Eight brethern.

There is not a more popular man in the Big Eight among coaches or media than Dickey, who battled the K-State problems for seven seasons and two games before turning in his resignation Sunday after the Wildcats lost 10-6 to Northern Iowa.

Several of his colleagues called him when they heard the news.

"I've known Jimmy for a long time, and he's a good man," said Oklahoma State's Pat Jones. "Any time something happens to one of your friends, you have an empty feeling. And I did when I heard about Jimmy."

One of Dickey's closest friends is Oklahoma's Barry Switzer.

"I called Jimmy and visited with him," said Switzer. "Jim knew he had to win six games this season to be there next year, or that this was going to happen. I think Jim knew that. That's why he was able to handle it. I was disappointed for him. I think Jimmy's been good for Kansas State and probably done as good a job as anybody they've ever had there."

Colorado Coach Bill McCartney said he was almost physically ill when he heard the news.

"I had a sick feeling in my stomach," McCartney said. "I recognize that there's a lot of pressure to fill stadiums. I recognize that your program needs to demonstrate that it's going places. But by the same token, I believe the kids he brought in and took into the season have more going on in their lives than just playing nine more football games.

"He has coordinated an effort to bring out the best in the classroom, too, and just to fire him in the middle of the season is unheard of in college football. I was shocked they would do it," McCartney said.

Kansas' Mike Gottfried said the news brought to mind someone he knew long ago.

"There was a guy named Merle Hudson in my community who was a coach when I was growing up," Gottfried said. "Every day when I was 8 or 9 years old he would teach me how to play. I look back and see that he was judged more for what he was doing teaching young people skills in how to play games and teaching them how to accept winning and losing. He wasn't being judged on how many victories he had. And that's how our profession has changed."

Missouri's Woody Widenhofer, the Big Eight's newest coach, also called Dickey. And Widenhofer, who's previous coaching experience was in the pros, came away from the conversation with some solid advice.

"He had nothing but good things to say about Kansas State University. He is a credit to the coaching profession. He told me, 'Woody, educate your fans on the 30-scholarship limit. It makes people pretty equal. You've got to go out and play your best every Saturday afternoon because these people who used to be easy victims now have good players.'"

"Jim's a good friend of mine. I was very disappointed to hear what happened," said Tom Osborne of Nebraska. "He's a person I respect a great deal because he's an honest, hard-working coach. I think he's done a good job in that situation. Hopefully, people will realize there is different potential for winning at different schools. I think Jim went as far as he could in that situation. I felt very bad about it."

"Jim Dickey is a class guy," said Iowa State's Jim Criner. "He always tried hard to be a credit to his institution and to his program. I was very disappointed to hear the news."

Pi Kappa Alpha team member Bill Conley, senior in agricultural mechanization, jumps for a pass over Doug Scheibe, senior in accounting and member of the Sigma Phi Epsilon team, in the Phi Delta Theta "Score for Charity" Saturday in Memorial Stadium. The Pikes beat the Sig Eps, 34-19.

Pikes, Pi Phi's win tournament championships

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Sports Editor

The Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity and Pi Beta Phi sorority each won all of its games last weekend to capture the men's and women's titles in the Third Annual Phi Delta Theta "Score for Charity" Flag Football Tournament in Memorial Stadium.

The Pikes defeated Phi Wacka Jacka 32-20 in the men's title game, while the Pi Phi's edged Alpha Xi Delta 8-6 in the women's championship game. Both games were played Sunday afternoon.

In the men's title game, Phi Wacka Jacka scored on the opening drive of the game when running back Steve Ballard took a pitch from quarterback David Keefer and took it into the end zone. The two-point conversion gave Phi Wacka Jacka an early 8-0 lead.

The Pikes came right back to tie the score with a touchdown on their first series. Craig Templin pitched the ball to Brian Schierling for the score.

Another pitchout by Keefer, this time to Paul Bruegger, gave Phi Wacka Jacka another score and the lead. The two-point conversion failed, making the score 14-8.

The Pikes scored their second touchdown after intercepting a Phi Wacka Jacka pass. Mike McCluskey scored the TD on a 15-yard run. The two-point conversion was good, giving the lead back to the Pikes at 16-14. Neither team scored the remainder of the half.

Another interception by the Pikes early in the second half set up their third touchdown, a 10-yard run by Kevin Knaus, to make the score 24-14 in favor of the Pikes.

Facing a possible route, Phi Wacka Jacka came back with a touchdown by Ballard on a pitch from Sam Weems. The two-point conversion failed, however, leaving the Pikes with a 24-20 lead.

Phi Wacka Jacka kept alive by stopping the Pikes on a fourth-and-five play from the Phi Wacka Jacka 25-yard line.

Phi Wacka Jacka had six plays left to score since the length of flag football games is determined by the number of plays. But with three plays left, the Pikes' John Crowl intercepted the ball and tossed it to Schierling, who took it in for the score.

The Pikes went through the winners' bracket undefeated by beating Sigma Chi 26-12, Sigma Phi Epsilon 34-19, Tau Kappa Epsilon 25-19 and Phi Wacka Jacka.

Phi Wacka Jacka lost its first game to the Sig Eps, 33-15, and had to come back through the losers' bracket. They did so by defeating Beta Theta Pi 24-13, Sigma Chi 44-12, Sigma Alpha Epsilon 24-14 and the TKE's 26-20.

The women's title featured the defenses of both teams.

The Pi Phi's scored their only touchdown on a 50-yard fake reverse by Carolyn Noller. Quarterback Jody Bachman threw a pass to Missy Heidebrecht for the crucial two-point conversion.

The Alpha Xi's countered with a touchdown of their own but couldn't come up with the conversion, giving the Pi Phi's a 8-6 victory.

The Pi Phi's went undefeated in the tourney, while the Alpha Xi's lost their first game but won the next four.

Auburn remains No. 1

By The Associated Press

Auburn and Oklahoma remained 1-2 Monday in The Associated Press college football poll, while Southern California moved up to third place and Michigan ousted Notre Dame from the Top Twenty.

Auburn celebrated its first week as the No. 1 team by defeating Southern Mississippi 29-18 Saturday. The Tigers received 23 of 60 first-place votes and 1,137 of a possible 1,200 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and sportscasters.

Oklahoma, which hasn't played yet, also received 23 first-place votes but only 1,125 points. The Sooners open Sept. 28 at Minnesota and will face Kansas State in their Big Eight Conference opener the following weekend.

Southern Cal did not play over the weekend, but the Trojans moved from fifth place to third with six first-place votes and 1,010 points. Florida, which had been third, slipped to 11th place after blowing a 28-7 lead and settling for a 28-28 tie with Rutgers.

Iowa, the favorite to capture the Big Ten Conference crown, opened its season by crushing previously unbeaten Drake 58-0 and jumped from fifth to fourth with five first-place votes and 998 points. Southern Methodist had the week off and climbed from sixth to fifth place. The Mustangs received the remaining three first-place votes and 913 points. SMU is ineligible to compete in post-season bowl games because the football program is currently on probation.

Florida State, also idle, rose from seventh to sixth with 850 points. Ohio State climbed from ninth to seventh with 748 points by shading Pitt 10-7. Oklahoma State struggled to beat North Texas State 10-9 but held onto eighth place with 697 points. The Cowboys lost starting quarterback Ronnie Williams with a broken jaw in their season-opening win over Washington.

Louisiana State defeated North Carolina 23-13 and shot from 12th place to ninth with 682 points, and Penn State rounded out the Top Ten, rising from 11th to 10th with 610 points after downing Temple 27-25. Penn State knocked off Maryland in their season opener.

The Second Ten consisted of Florida, UCLA, Brigham Young, Arkansas, South Carolina, Alabama, Maryland, Nebraska, Michigan and Illinois.

Last week, it was Penn State, LSU, Notre Dame, Arkansas, South Carolina, BYU, Maryland, Nebraska, Illinois and Alabama.

Michigan defeated Notre Dame 20-12 and cracked the Top Twenty for the first time since the sixth of last season's 16 polls.

Rifle club wins national title

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Rifle Club captured the national championship in the NRA Inter-Collegiate Rifle Championships held last spring, club members learned Monday.

K-State club members competed in February, but the results of the event, which was held at several locations nationwide, were not released until late last week.

To win the national title, K-State edged out the University of Pennsylvania by scoring 4,387 points of a possible 4,800 in the small bore rifle competition.

In the individual competition, K-State's Alan Arwine finished fifth in the nation with a score of 1,117 of a possible 1,200 points. Teammate Gordon Sandercox finished 10th with a score of 1,101.

Rounding out the scoring for the four-member team were Andy Bikman, who finished 18th with a score of 1,087, and Timothy Putnam, who placed 22nd with a score of 1,082.

Mariners down Royals, 5-1

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Mike Moore's five-hitter and a two-run homer by Danny Tartabull carried the Seattle Mariners to a 5-1 victory over the Kansas City Royals Monday night in the opening game of a three-game series.

The Royals have lost two of their last three games and saw their lead in the American League West shrink to two games over the idle California Angels. California will play a four-game series against the Royals in Kansas City later this month.

Moore, 15-8, struck out four batters and walked three.

The loss went to Royal left-hander Danny Jackson, 13-10, who left with two out in the third inning after yielding all five runs on four hits.

South African troops re-enter Angola

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Troops and warplanes swept into southern Angola on Monday to strike South-West African guerrillas the military said were planning attacks on towns and military bases in the territory.

Gen. Constand Viljoen, the armed forces commander, said Angola's Marxist government was informed of the strike against guerrillas of the South-West Africa People's Organization and warned "not to interfere." It was the second strike in 10 weeks inside Angola, where about 25,000 Cuban troops are based.

Viljoen gave no indication of the size of the force or its targets. Southern Angola is the base area of SWAPO guerrillas fighting for the independence of South-West Africa, a mineral-rich territory also known as Namibia that South Africa has controlled since World War I.

"One followup can lead to another. ...Hopefully it (the strike) will be over within a week," Lt. Gen. Ian Gleason the army chief of staff, said Monday night on the government-contolled television.

Racial unrest persisted in South Africa. Hundreds of high school students in Johannesburg's huge black township of Soweto went on a rampage because of rumors that black leader Nelson Mandela had died in jail. Mandela's wife said the rumors were false.

SWAPO has not been known to have long-range artillery in its battle for Namibia, which South Africa governs under a League of Nations mandate abrogated by the U.N. General Assemby in 1966.

Gleason said troops were pursuing the guerrillas' 8th Battalion, which he estimated at 400-800 men and said was "well-dispersed" in southern Angola. He said it was the unit that was to have made the attacks.

The white-minority government has ignored U.N. demands for a cease-fire and independence for the territory. About 1 million people live in Namibia, 90 percent of them black or of mixed race.

money. That is still the purpose of business," Holle said.

The council also makes contacts that can be used in the future to help other companies, Holle said. People and companies respond to the advertisements in the brochure and the information comes back to the council. The council then has the name of a company in another country who is interested in products from the United States and if they are interested in one product, they might be interested in another product, Holle said.

"It is just a matter of maintaining some communication to keep things going," Holle said, "so that sort of builds our contact base."

The council also does market feasibility studies for companies, develops information for them that they may need on a particular country or a market for a particular product, where the best markets might be. This research goes on in the service area, Holle said.

The council would like to serve as staff for companies who perhaps cannot afford a person to handle international business, he said.

"We can help them by providing the information they need so that they can go into this business and make some money," Holle said.

Policy

that members of age to drink 3.2 beer have their hands stamped or wear hospital bands at parties already during the semester.

Peer pressure being used in the residence halls to make certain that those under 19 years old do not drink, said Keith Petracek, president of KSU Association of Residence Halls and junior in electrical engineering.

The council consists of the Gary Arroyo, president of the Interfraternity Council and sophomore in veterinary medicine, Sherri Hager, president of Panhellenic Council and senior in journalism and mass communications, Steve Brown, student body president and junior in preveterinary medicine, Mark Jones, Student Senate chairman and senior in management, Petracek and eight at-large members.

Enforcement of the policy guidelines will be left up to individual student organizations, Sutton said.

"We think the policy is self-enforcing," he said.

According to the policy, if violations occur, appropriate action will be taken by the campus group sponsoring the event at which the offense occurred. Appropriate action will be determined by the group with jurisdiction in that area.

University action may be taken in addition to any prosecution by the city, county or state, according to the policy.

Hager said the policy would have a beneficial effect on sorority and fraternity houses by requiring compliance with state and local laws.

"Gary (Arroyo) and I are pleased with the policy because it combines all aspects of the campus into one workable policy," Hager said.

Petracek said he was pleased with the policy, but said that the ARH policies had been stricter on some guidelines.

"There's really no change for us (residence hall residents)," he said.

Petracek was also pleased that there was a unified policy for all student organizations.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is already in compliance with one part of the policy by refusing to allow alcoholic beverages into KSU Stadium.

Dickey

"I would expect that when you go into that kind of frying pan, you would certainly deserve something," Colbert said.

The decision to continue Dickey's salary was made between Travis and Dickey, Colbert said, adding that Dickey was worried about monetary protection.

"I'm sure he (Dickey) made his point (to Travis)," Colbert said.

Travis did not eliminate the possibility that Dickey might remain at the University for the remainder of his contract in a position yet to be determined.

"At the present time, we haven't decided anything," Travis said.

With Moon taking over as interim head coach, Travis said Moon will cease any duties as assitant athletic director for the rest of the football season.

"He'll be doing that (coaching) full time for the next nine weeks," Travis said.

Travis said he also didn't know Moon's salary, which was unavailable in the University's 1985-86 budget. The salaries of two of the other assistant athletic directors, Colbert and John Kadlec, were listed at $48,000.

Colbert's announced move to Pan American and Moon's change to head football coach have left a vacancy in the athletic department administration that Travis said will be taken care of.

"We're going to divide up some of the duties," Travis said. "We'll just try to pick up the slack."

Reforms cut retirement savings plan

Financial community raises protest

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — It may lack the ring of a classic rallying cry, but "401(k)" has become something of a cause celebre of late.

The subject of the clamor is a type of retirement savings plan, sometimes callled a salary reduction plan, that has become highly popular in the past few years. By some estimates, as many as 20 million American workers are participants.

Last May, when it put forward its tax-reform program, the administration of President Reagan proposed putting some limits on 401(k)s, which get their name from the section of the Internal Revenue Code that authorizes them.

Then, at the end of August, Treasury Secretary James Baker suggested they be eliminated altogether, as one means of trying to shape the tax-overhaul plan so that it would keep government revenues from falling significantly.

Repeal of Section 401(k) would save some $11.6 billion in tax revenues over the next several years, Baker said in a letter to Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., a key figure in the debate over tax reform in his position as chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

In short order after the Treasury Department made the letter public, there came a predictable storm of protest from people in many sectors of the financial world.

"The elimination of Section 401(k) would strike a severe blow to the retirement income security of millions of Americans," declared Buck Consultants, a New York pension and employee-benefits concern.

William Bouman, vice president of the Union Mutual Life Insurance Co., labeled it a "self-defeating proposition that, over the long term, will increase government expenditures for employees' retirement income."

What is all the fuss about? The 401(k) is a kind of cross between an individual retirement account and a standard pension plan.

As in an IRA, workers with 401(k)s put aside part of their earnings in an investment account of their own choosing, and can deduct the contributions they make from their current income taxes. The money is allowed to accumulate and grow free of taxes until withdrawals from the account begin, normally after retirement.

But 401(k)s differ significantly from IRAs in several ways. For one thing, contributions are made directly through employers via deductions from pay — hence the term "salary reduction plan." IRAs are established and maintained by employees on their own.

For another, limits on the size of 401(k)s are much more generous than IRAs. Working individuals can put no more than $2,000 a year into an IRA. The 401(k) maximum is 25 percent of earnings, up to a maximum of $30,000 a year.

In addition, the sketchy rules covering 401(k)s apparently have made it permissible for money to be withdrawn from them early without penalty in "hardship" circumstances. In some cases, "hardship" has been defined broadly enough to include such things as college tuition bills.

Many advocates of 401(k)s see it as strange that the Reagan administration would seek to curb or eliminate them, since they seem to be just the kind of individual-initiative, savings-promoting activity that the president has so often praised and supported.

Apparently, in their efforts to get some control over the federal budget, the powers that be have come to view 401(k)s as too much of a good thing. Even if they aren't eliminated by any tax-reform bill that eventually becomes law, they are apparently a prime target.

Congress sees Vietnam in Nicaraguan conflict

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan says some members of Congress who have opposed his support for Contra rebels fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua may be suffering from a "Vietnam syndrome" and fear U.S. military involvement in Central America.

But the opposition is lessening because the lawmakers now see the Sandinista government as a "totalitarian, communist" regime, the president said.

Reagan made the comments in an interview Friday with the Spanish Information Network. The transcript of the interview was released today by the White House.

The president was asked whether Congress — because of its earlier ban on aid to the rebels and its later approval of non-lethal aid — was "playing politics with the security of this hemisphere."

"I hestitate to say that," Reagan responded. "Some may, I don't know."

"I think maybe the rest were well-intentioned, and they are suffering from something I call the Vietnam syndrome," he added.

Reagan said too many members of Congress still remember the U.S. entanglement in Vietnam and think support for the Contras might lead to such U.S. military involvement.

Reagan pledged that his administration "has no intention of military involvement, nor do I think that it is needed."

He said he believed that more members of Congress have come to recognize "the real nature of the Sandinista government — that it is a totalitarian, communist government."

Reagan claimed that the Contra forces number around 20,000 and are getting stronger. "Deserters from the Nicaraguan army, the Sandinista army, are turning up and volunterring as Contras," he said.

The president said the Contras deserved help because they were striving for democratic goals, but that such aid "does not mean...military forces from the United States."

New College of Engineering course to teach amateur radio operations

By JAMIE MCPHETER
Collegian Reporter

Next spring, students will be able to learn to operate a ham radio in a new course devoted to the theory and practice of amateur radio.

Ham radio operations are difficult for people to learn, so the College of Engineering has decided to offer a course with emphasis on demonstration, said Doris Grosh, professor of industrial engineering. The class demonstrations will use ham radio equipment in Seaton Hall.

The equipment includes a high-frequency, 10-to-160-meter transceiver, a 2-meter local work transceiver and a 2-meter repeater booster station.

"We are offering this class to increase the ranks of amateur ham radio operators," Grosh said.

The class will be offered during the spring semester until the college determines whether there will be enough student and community interest to offer the class twice a year. The class will be offered at night to make it more accessible to the community.

Material covered will include all subjects necessary for passing the Federal Communications Commission Technical/General class radio theory test. Basic electronics, radio wave propagation, antennas, FCC regulations and Morse code also will be addressed.

"Ham radios are radios that are talked into, just like CBs (citizen band radios), yet they are different because a person can talk a farther distance away and hear more clearly on a ham radio," Grosh said. "I talk regularly to my daughter in South America with my radio."

Phil Fry, junior in electrical engineering, has been a ham radio operator since he was 13 years old. As a licensed operator, Fry is able to use the equipment at Seaton at any time.

"Ham radio operation can be a fun and worthwhile hobby as well as saving money on long§distance phone calls," Fry said.

Ham radios often are used in emergencies, Grosh said. During the fires in California this summer, ham radios were used to tell firefighters on the ground which way the fire was heading. In coastal areas, ham radios are used to keep residents informed about weather conditions when hurricanes are approaching.

Ham radios have played an important role politically in keeping communication going between military, government and the press, Grosh said.

U.S. prepares to co-sign loans

Saudi builds Lousiana plant

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Department of Energy is preparing to co-sign nearly $80 million in loans for an alcohol fuels plant being built in Louisiana by a billionaire Saudi Arabian arms dealer, officials said Monday.

"We're ironing out the last details and plan to close it within a matter of days," Dan Beckman, deputy director of the department's Office of Alcohol Fuels, said of the $79.9 million in federal loan guarantees for the project.

Seeking the loan guarantees for the plant, to be built at New Iberia, La., is Agrifuels Refining Corp., a company whose ownership traces back to Adnan Khashoggi, believed to be one of the wealthiest men in the world.

According to officials for the government and Triad America, the Khashoggi family's company for its U.S. holdings, the plant will produce 35 million gallons of ethanol a year from sugar-derived molasses.

Officials said the company plans to market the plant's output to petroleum refineries for making gasohol, a blend of 90 percent gasoline and 10 percent alcohol.

The son of Saudi King Ibn Faud's personal physician, Khashoggi, 50, earned much of his fortune as a middleman in arms deals between Western firms and Arab governments.

FarmAid planners to target profits

By The Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Some profit from the FarmAid concert in Champaign, Ill., will be used to lobby for a Farm Bill that will help farmers earn more money, the president of a national agricultural group said Monday

But in Champaign, concert spokeswoman Vicky Rose said Monday that no final decision had been made on how the money would be used.

Earlier Monday, DeVon Woodland, president of the National Farmers Organization, said he discussed the use of the proceeds with friends of concert organizer Willie Nelson.

"They're still looking for some ideas, but they have zeroed in on two or three key areas," Woodland said from Corning, Iowa, in a telephone interview. "I suppose the final decision will not really be reached until sometime after the concert is over."

Woodland said some of the estimated $50 million that will be raised by the 14-hour concert Sunday will go into a fund to pay farmers' legal costs.

Some of the proceeds also will go to about 40 farm organizations around the country "to further their programs," Woodland said.

About 77,000 tickets have been sold for the concert, which has been billed the largest in country-music history. More than 45 musicians, some of them superstars, have said they will perform.

Woodland said FarmAid organizers want federal farm legislation to be improved but haven't been specific.

"They certainly recognize the need for additional farm income, and they hope that through farm legislation this could be a source of additional income to agriculture," Woodland said.

Illinois Agriculture Director Larry Werries has said he would rather not have the FarmAid proceeds used for lobbying, although the final decision will be up to concert organizers.

"He's not really hot on the whole idea of using it to lobby," said Mia Jazo, a spokeswoman for the Illinois Agriculture Department.

Woodland said some of the concert proceeds will go to the Family Farm Defense Fund, which was set up by the National Farmers Organization this summer to defray legal costs for farmers who face foreclosure and have no legal representation.

"The purpose is to make sure that farmers are entitled to due process of law and that their rights are protected," Woodland said.

Woodland said he will propose to the concert organizers that money be set aside to buy network and satellite time to televise programs about the depressed farm economy.

The National Farmers Organization consists of farmers who negotiate contracts for producers.

Reagan rules out ban on 'Star Wars' testing

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Tuesday night he would rule out any summit agreement with the Soviet Union that would block testing and development of his controversial "Star Wars" space-based missile system.

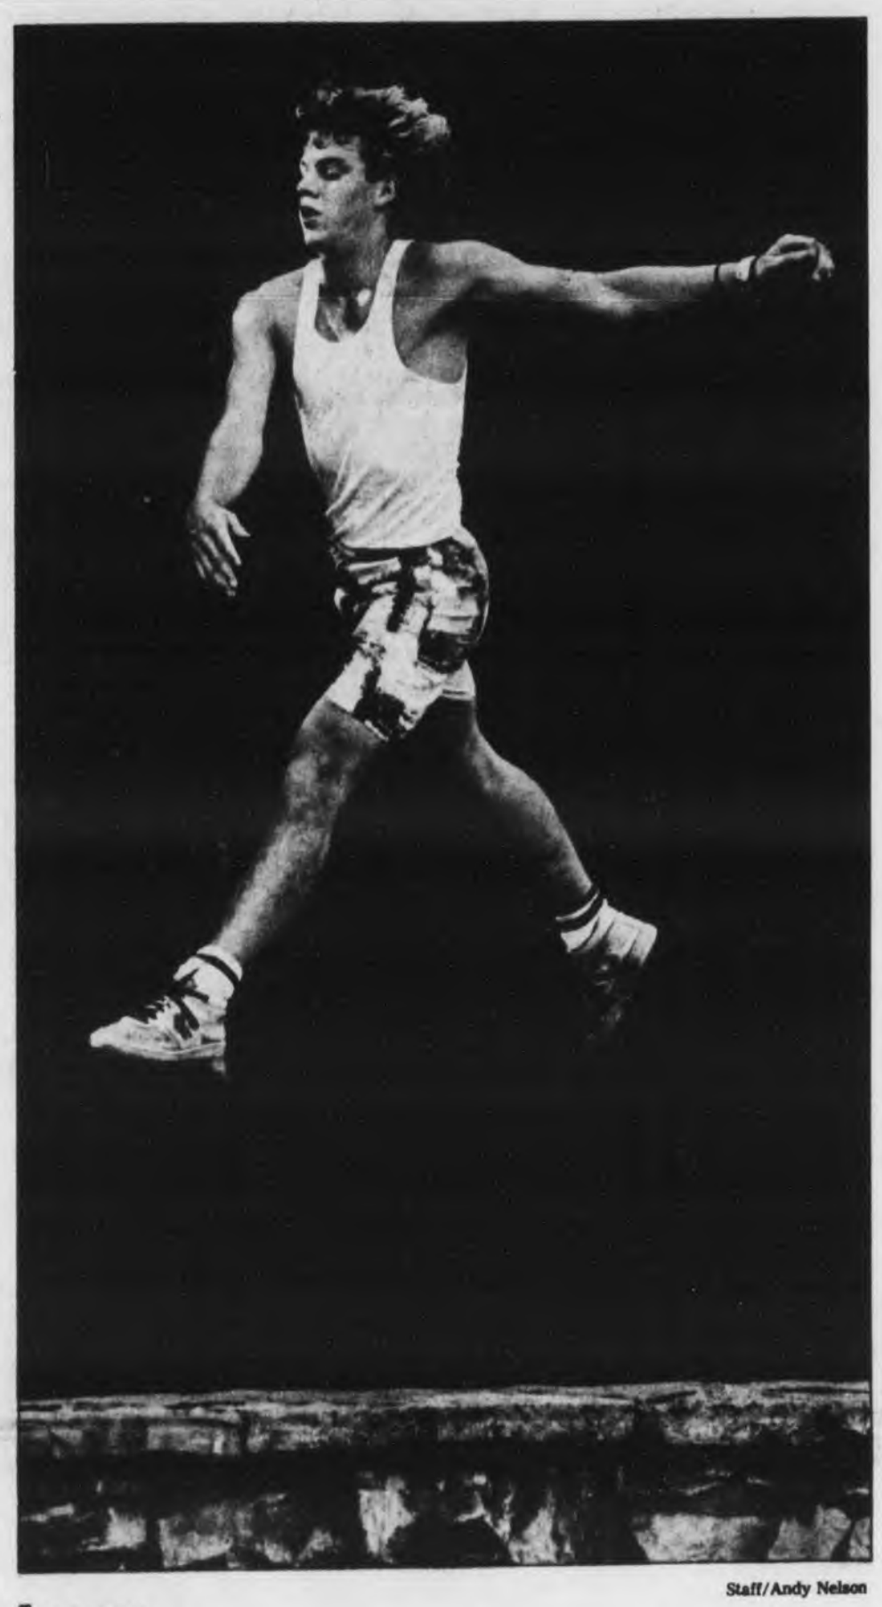
But the president, answering questions at his first formal news conference in three months, indicated he might be willing to negotiate with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev over the deployment of the controversial system.

With the Reagan-Gorbachev summit set for Nov. 19-20 in Geneva, the president also defended the recent test of an American anti-satellite weapon. He said the Soviets have tested such a system, and added, "We couldn't stand by and allow them to have a monopoly on the ability to shoot down satellites."

Reagan said he was taking his prospective summit meeting seriously, but added he doesn't plan on giving the Soviet leader "a friendship ring or anything."

"It isn't necessary that we love or even like each other," he said, but that it is important for the two superpowers to negotiate

Reagan opened his news conference with a call for "free and fair trade for all," and cautioned that a "mindless stampede toward protectionism will be a one-way trip toward economic disaster."



With numerous bills pending in Congress to slap restrictions on American trading partners, the president said free trade can lead to a "decade of growth" and creation of 10 million new jobs in this country.

The U.S. trade deficit is expected to be in the $150 billion range this year, prompting calls for protection for numerous American industries.

Reagan said imposing restrictions against this country's trading partners could produce countermeasures against American industry and agriculture.

The president never used the word veto — and never mentioned the word Congress — as he discussed trade. But his message was unmistakeable, coming a few hours after the Senate Finance Committee took a step

Coliseum size may receive regents' OK

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

President Duane Acker said Tuesday he believes the Kansas Board of Regents will accept and approve revisions for the 13,500-seat Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

"I would be very surprised (if they did not approve the revisions) and would not speculate on what the alternatives would be if they did not (approve the revisions)," Acker said during a news conference in the Union.

Revisions requested by Warren Corman, director of facilities for the regents, include cutting 2,500 seats from the original 16,000-seat figure. This move came after bids for the single-purpose structure were more than $3.4 million over projected construction costs.

Acker said he will take the revised amendments in the program for the coliseum to the regents' meeting in Topeka Thursday.

"I'm not aware of any negative feelings toward the new proposal from the regents," Acker said.

Discussion was limited about renovation of Ahearn Field House during the meetings about the coliseum, he said.

Concerning his role in the Sunday resignation of Wildcat Head Football Coach Jim Dickey, Acker said he was involved only as president.

"I acted in my role as president to support the decision of the director of athletics (Larry Travis). The judgment was made by the athletic director, and I support his decision," Acker said.

Acker had no comment on advice he had given Travis about Dickey's future and no comment about whether a decision should have been made earlier.

In the search for a new head football coach, Acker said the administration will continue to run a "clean program."

"Those same items used in hiring Jim Dickey will prevail in the search for a new coach," Acker said. "We want no pattern of illegalities.

"Winning in an illegal situation is a hollow victory. It brings consequences to the athletes, universities and coaching staff."

The lack of students at the Sept. 9 Landon Lecture featuring Vice President George Bush was not symbolic of a trend toward a non-interest attitude about public affairs.

"Those who may not have been there (at the lecture) may simply have had other commitments," he said.

Workers will replace pipe; repairs might cost $10,000

By RICH HARRIS
Collegian Reporter

Work began today on the break in a chilled water pipe which has left 14 campus buildings — including the K-State Union — without air conditioning since the leak was discovered Sunday.

Jack Watson, general superintendent of physical plant shops, said repairs could cost as much as $10,000, which will probably come from existing University Facilities' budget because there are no special allocations for major repairs.

"We will have to reshuffle some of our priorities," Watson said.

The other buildings affected are Marlatt Hall, Goodnow Hall, Kramer Food Center, Ackert Hall, Cardwell Hall, Farrell Library, Durland Hall, the western section of Seaton Hall, Kedzie Hall, Lafene Student Health Center, Holtz Hall and the third floor of Eisenhower Hall.

Watson said the system was shut down Sunday when it was determined the leakage exceeded the resupply capacity of the chilled water plant, indicating a loss of more than 10,000 gallons per hour.

The leak is in an underground pipe located north of the power plant, Vincent Cool, director of planning/architectural services for the Division of University Facilities, said. Cool said the leak is between the older chilling facilities in the power plant and the newer main chilling plant, which has been in use for two years.

The piping connection between the plants is made of older pipe, but the pipes leaving the new chilling plant are all new.

Cool said he does not believe age was a contributing factor to the pipe's failure.

The leak is between a tunnel and the foundation of the main power plant. The location of the pipe will cause some difficulty in repair, Watson said, because the excavation will be so close to the buildings. Another problem is the wet ground, which means the hole will have to be braced before anyone is allowed to go down and look at the leak, he said.

Song for 'Lady' begins career for duo

By CONRAD EASTERDAY
Staff Writer

Over lunch at Concordia High School, K-State graduates and Concordia teachers Tom Commerford and Rhondalyn Berroth put "Lady Liberty" down on paper. A few days later, they set the words to music with a piano and a drum machine.

The two said they thought a song about the nation's symbol of liberty, the Statue of Liberty, might be a good way to start songwriting careers.

Commerford and Berroth had "Lady Liberty" packaged, stamped and ready to mail — a long shot — to Lee Iacocca, the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation chairman, when a better idea was suggested.

The two learned that a friend's brother-in-law worked at the agency producing the Harbor Festival Foundation's annual Independence Day celebration. This celebration centers around New York Harbor and the Statue of Liberty.

Commerford and Berroth mailed the song to the contact at the New York agency and waited. Six weeks later, they heard the news that the Harbor Festival Foundation would use "Lady Liberty" as its official theme song.

However, when TWA's Athens-to-Rome flight was hijacked June 14 and American hostages held for 17 days, the Harbor Festival lost much of the media coverage expected for its celebration.

To compensate, "Lady Liberty" was used sooner than expected — as a tribute to the hostages.

The song was well-played on most radio stations in New York, said Bill Darnell, Commerford and Berroth's New York contact for "Lady Liberty."

It turned out that the Harbor Festival received more air time than in previous years, Darnell said. Darnell is director of communications for Hemming & Gilman Inc., the New York agency promoting Harbor Festival and other special events.

Staff/Laura Acevedo

Since the over-lunch writing session in March at Concordia, Berroth and Commerford have moved to Kansas City, Kan., and launched Tawnda Productions Inc. More prospects are opening for "Lady Liberty" and other songs the two have written, Commerford said.

"It (Tawnda Productions) is a jingle-writing and song-writing production company," Commerford said. "We do jingles and songs for foundations, stores, anything that has to do with music really. She (Berroth) primarily does the lyrics, and I do the music," he said.

Commerford graduated from K-State in 1984 with a bachelor's degree in music education. Berroth graduated in 1979 with a bachelor's degree in secondary education. The pair met while teaching in Concordia and started writing together last year.

"The first thing we wrote was the Thomas County Centennial theme song," Commerford said. "We decided then we really liked writing together."

The team has produced songs currently being considered as promotionals by the Kansas City Sizzlers basketball team and Kansas' 125th anniversary celebration, Berroth said.

"I'd say for just being here (in Kansas City) for one month things look pretty promising," he said. "We're getting more contacts all the time with ad agencies and advertisers."

Things also look promising for "Lady Liberty" being incorporated in Liberty Weekend, the statue's centennial celebration in 1986, Darnell said. The song is one of many being considered for use by David Wolper, Liberty Weekend's organizing chairman.

Commerford and Berroth hope to make Tawnda Productions a full-time enterprise in Kansas City "as soon as we've got enough (songs) under our belts," Commerford said. Until Tawnda becomes self-supporting, however, Commerford said he and Berroth are substitute teaching in the Kansas City area.

West German worker suspected of spying

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany — A secretary in Chancellor Helmut Kohl's office has fled to Communist East Germany in the first spy case to hit the nation's highest office since a 1974 scandal toppled Willy Brandt, officials said Tuesday.

The defection marked the latest in a drumfire of espionage incidents that began rocking Kohl's conservative coalition government last month. The scandal earlier touched the president's office and shook up Bonn's spy system.

West German radio, citing Bonn security sources, said the latest defector, Herta-Astrid Willner, may have had access to secret information about the U.S. "Star Wars" program and a French-led high-technology project.

Government officials said the 45-year-old secretary, who had worked in the chancellor's office nearly 12 years, had no access to material about the two projects.

Willner fled to East Germany with her husband, Herbert. Chief federal prosecutor Kurt Rebmann said both were under investigation on suspicion of Indian guru says aides set fire, tapped phones

By The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — State law enforcement officials Tuesday began studying allegations by Indian guru Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh that his ousted top lieutenants poisoned restaurant food, set fire to a government office, tapped phones and attempted to murder his doctor and dentist.

Rep. Jim Weaver, D-Ore., said in Washington, D.C., that the FBI planned to investigate the allegations. Rajneesh made the charges Monday night.

About a dozen of Rajneesh's leading disciples, including his personal secretary, Ma Anand Sheela, left the commune last weekend, most reportedly for Europe.

Rajneesh called them a "gang of fascists" and accused them of mismanaging the movement's finances and leaving it $55 million in debt.

Rajneesh accused the outcasts of attempting to poison his doctor, dentist and female companion, as

Authorities expell reputed terrorist

PARIS — Swiss Bruno Breguet, 35, a reputed member of an international terrorist network run by "Carlos," was freed from jail in France Tuesday and immediately expelled across the Swiss frontier, prison authorities announced.

Breguet was taken by car from Clairvaux prison in eastern France, escorted by police and counter-espionage officers.

Breguet and West German Magdalena Kopp were arrested in Paris in February 1982 and charged with illegal possession of arms and explosives found in a nearby car. He drew five years and she drew four.

With time off for good behavior, Kopp was released and expelled to West Germany in May.

Breguet, jailed in Israel from 1970 to 1977 for supplying explosives for a terrorist attack, was alleged in France to be a "carrier" for Carlos.

Sickness results in hospitalization

NEW DELHI, India — Nearly 200 high school girls were hospitalized for possible food poisoning after complaining of dizziness at Nedumangad, 18 miles from Trivandrum in southern India, the United News of India reported Tuesday.

The agency said in a dispatch from Trivandrum that more than 150 girls were taken to hospitals Monday from a government girls' high school and an additional 37 were admitted Tuesday.

The main medical college hospital said Tuesday 190 girls were hospitalized but all were out of danger. They were admitted with symptoms of food poisoning, including dizziness and watering eyes, UNI said.

Hospital and police officials could not be reached for comment because telephone lines between New Delhi and Trivandrum, 1,320 miles to the south, were out of order.

The cause of the apparent poisoning was unknown.

Board allocates money to program

TOPEKA — A state employee health care board has unanimously endorsed a so-called "wellness program," under which workers each could receive $50 yearly beginning in January for using the program to improve their health and fitness.

The State Employee Health Care Comion also agreed Monday to allocate $500,000 to get the program started. About half of the money would be used to pay for fitness assessments and health risk appraisals that each employee would have to undergo before entering the program.

The remainder of the money would go to pay administrative costs and the system of incentive awards, officials said. Secretary of Administration Mike Harder, who is chairman of the commission, said the money will come from "surplus" funds under control of the health care board.

Blue Cross-Blue Shield, the carrier for state employee health insurance policies, is required under the state law that created the commission to refund whatever excess remains from monthly premiums after all claims have been paid for a policy year.

The incentive payments are based on a system of points assigned for an employee's performance of various physical activities during the course of a week.

Kansas will become the second state to offer cash awards to state employees for improving their health and fitness. Utah currently is the only state with an official state-sponsored wellness program.

EPA begins study of 9 companies

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Environmental Protection Agency said Tuesday that nine companies which once conducted mining operations in Cherokee County are being studied as possible sources of pollution believed to have caused serious health problems in the southeast Kansas area.

"We are conducting a remedial investigation — taking water samples — to determine what kind of contamination is in the area. The identification is part of the research work we've done to determine who might be responsible," Katie Biggs, chief of the remedial section for the Superfund program, said Tuesday.

"We have been in touch with the companies, and they have been providing us with any information they can to assist us in the investigation," Biggs said.

Adviser denies rebel aid violations

WASHINGTON — After last year's congressional ban on "directly or indirectly" aiding Nicaraguan rebels militarily, the White House continued to give them political advice and — once last spring — urged the rebels to suspend fighting, a senior administration official says.

In a Sept. 5 letter, national security adviser Robert McFarlane depicted an active White House campaign to help the rebels politically, but denied that those actions violated the congressional ban on even indirect military help for forces fighting Nicaragua's leftist government.

"I can state with deep personal conviction that at no time did I or any member of the National Security Council staff violate the letter or spirit of the law" which took effect last Oct. 1, McFarlane said in a letter to Rep. Lee Hamiliton, D-Ind., House Intelligence Committee chairman.

Senate votes on immigration bill

WASHINGTON — The Senate, reversing itself on an immigration bill amendment, voted 51-44 Tuesday to allow 350,000 foreigners to enter the country as temporary farm laborers.

The seasonal workers provision was the last major immigration issue preventing a vote on the bill, which is designed to drastically reduce the number of illegal aliens entering the country.

But chief sponsor Alan K. Simpson, R-Wyo., delayed final action until Wednesday, in hopes of preventing a move to attach an unrelated Social Security provision to the legislation.

The overall measure would strive to slow illegal immigration by providing $16.7 million over two years to improve border enforcement, as well as imposing severe fines against employers knowingly hiring undocumented workers.

Within three years of enactment, the bill also would grant amnesty to thousands of illegal immigrants who arrived in the United States before 1980.

Denver mayor signs birthday card

DENVER — Mayor Federico Pena on Tuesday signed a door-size birthday card that will be presented to rock star Bruce Springsteen on his 36th birthday next Monday, when "The Boss" will be performing in Denver.

The card features a drawing of Springsteen dancing atop a cake and says, "Happy Birthday, Bruce." Inside is written, "Consider Denver Your Home-Town."

Springsteen's birthday falls on the second night of two concerts at Mile High Stadium, and the card will be presented during the concert.

Thief heads off with famous hats

FORT WORTH, Texas — Although most bad guys wear black hats, some crook may be wearing Tom Landry's new beaver chapeau.

But Tom Peters says he'll make another cap for the Dallas Cowboys' coach.

Peters, a 90-year-old hatmaker who has provided hats for some of America's most famous men, said someone broke a display window Monday at his downtown store and stole hats made for Landry and singer Ray Charles.

Five hats valued at more than $1,000 were taken, Peters said.

The haberdasher says he's made hats for all the U.S. presidents since Warren Harding except for Richard Nixon and Herbert Hoover. Two presidents returned them — Jimmy Carter said he didn't accept gifts, and Calvin Coolidge said it wasn't his style.

Graham talks to country's officials

BUCHAREST, Romania — Evangelist Billy Graham said Tuesday that he had met with Romanian officials to discuss the relationship between church and state in the Communist country.

"I have discussed the concern many Americans have about specific issues on church-state relations in my private discussions with ranking officials," he said, but would not elaborate. He said he had not been approached by any Baptists complaining of religious persecution.

Graham was winding up an 11-day tour of seven cities. Graham aide Ed Plowman estimated that at least 150,000 Romanians turned out to hear the evangelist.

Detective testifies in FBI espionage case

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Before former FBI agent Richard W. Miller was fired and charged with spying, he asked a private detective to photograph his meetings with Russians for eventual delivery to the FBI, the detective testified Tuesday.

Hoping to prove that the first FBI agent charged with espionage was trying to catch Soviet spies, not become one, the defense launched its case by calling Lawrence Grayson, a private investigator who reluctantly disclosed details of his meeting with Miller.

Several times, Grayson said he couldn't remember details and only volunteered them after defense attorney Stanley Greenberg showed him transcripts of his previous accounts to the FBI.

Grayson said Miller met him on Aug. 15, 1984, and asked if he had sophisticated photographic equipment.

He said Miller proposed that Grayson take pictures of Miller with "individuals of Russian nationality" at a meeting in Mexico tentatively scheduled for that October.

"I asked basically why wasn't he having his own people take pictures," said Grayson. "He said because his credibility was shot, and by using me he'd get back his credibility with the bureau."

Miller, 48, who had been assigned to counterintelligence, was arrested Oct. 2 and charged with conspiring to pass secrets to the Soviets for $65,000 in cash and gold. If convicted, he could receive a life sentence.

His attorneys maintain he had sought to redeem his faltering career by infiltrating the Soviet spy network, and hoped that Grayson's photos would help him do so.

Greenberg asked if Miller indicated what he would do with the pictures.

"He didn't really discuss what he was going to do with them," Grayson said. "He said he wanted to have his people believe him about what he was going to do."

Earlier Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Hayman read jurors descriptions of 51 classified documents found in Miller's desk at the FBI's Los Angeles office after his arrest.

They included memoranda dealing with Soviet foreign counterintelligence, the handling of "assets" or informants, and the role of double agents in the FBI foreign counterintelligence program.

Greenberg then read a list of classified documents found in Miller's apartment, which included an FBI telex regarding codefendant Svetlana Ogorodnikov and her previous role as informant to the FBI office in Los Angeles.

He acknowledged that also in Miller's apartment was a copy of a document entitled "Reporting Guidance: Foreign Intelligence Information," part of which referred to Soviet Union intelligence. The government alleges Miller gave that document to Ogorodnikov.

Unstable economy causes savings rate decline

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Whatever Americans have been doing with their money lately, they apparently haven't been saving very much of it.

Analysis

The latest figures from the Commerce Department indicate the savings rate — the percentage of income not spent — was 3.4 percent in both June and July.

Month by month, the figures tend to jump around quite a bit. But so far this year, the rate has lagged behind the 6 percent annual rate that has prevailed in recent years.

Even that latter figure looks paltry when you consider the standard recommendation of most financial advisers that people should aim to save at least 10 percent of their disposable income in their working years.

According to the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center, less than two-thirds of U.S. households list savings accounts among their assets.

Because of the indirect way in which they are calculated, the Commerce Department's data on the savings rate "should always be viewed somewhat skeptically," said Maury Harris, chief economist at the Wall Street firm of PaineWebber Inc., in a recent report on the subject.

"However, the recent drop in the Commerce Department's savings rate measure is so large and the resulting level so low that it should not be ignored."

Harris says several forces have combined lately to depress savings. The problems faced by farmers lately have quite evidently made savings an unaffordable luxury for many people in areas of the country where agriculture sets the pace of the economy.

In addition, he notes, a large part of the population — the fabled "baby boom" generation — is now in the 30-45 age group, which traditionally uses debt more heavily than the rest of the population.

What's more, Harris points out, interest income has lately fallen as a percentage of total income — and interest income is an important source of savings, because a lot of it is reinvested.

Groups to exchange ideas

Students for Educational Awareness will hold a public forum for discussion of allocation of the $700,000 available to the students as a result of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum bond refinancing. The meeting will be at 7:30 tonight in Union 213.

The money has been returned to the students. What it will be used for is entirely in the hands of the students. This comparative rarity offers an excellent opportunity for applying some of the good intentions of several student organizations.

Student Body President Steve Brown ran on a campaign that included increased awareness of Farrell Library inadequacies. Here is an opportunity to do something about those inadequacies, to the tune of $700,000.

Many speakers intend to offer their pitch at the forum. Aside from a library representative, there will be representatives from the Center for Student Development, Students for Handicapped Concerns, KSDB-FM, KSU Police and the debate squad. In addition, several individuals will address topics of personal concern, including the possibility of a campus bus system.

The SEA forum will feature an open discussion period at the end of the meeting for public presentation of ideas. Those with an interest in seeing the money does not go toward some esoteric project had better attend. And they had better speak up. The only way students can affect the decision is to use their vocal cords.

For too long those who have been dissatisfied with the way Student Senate handled money matters and questions of policy have merely bellyached to their friends over a beer. These same people now have a perfect opportunity to do something about their complaints. If they fail to respond to the offer, they truly have no one to blame but themselves.

Regardless of one's political viewpoint, it is important to recognize the important contribution SEA is making to the political process at K-State: For the first time in some time, there are the inklings of general student interest in the business conducted in senate. And that cannot be bad.

Rich Harris,

Winning isn't everything

A seven-year struggle has ended for Jim Dickey.

Operating with the lowest football budget in the Big Eight, at one of the losingest football programs in the history of major college football, the losses piled one too high. Dickey turned in his resignation.

But Dickey should not be forgotten quickly at K-State. He should be remembered as a coach who came into a bad situation in 1978 and gave the football program honesty and integrity, something many college athletic programs continue to lack. For that, he earned the respect of Big Eight coaches.

The pressure on a coach in any major college athletic program is intense. For Dickey, however, the pressure to win was possibly more than any coach in the Big Eight. K-State football fans are hungry for victories. After he gave them a taste of winning in 1982, fans — and Dickey — expected more than a 3-8 season in 1983 and a 3-7-1 season in 1984.

Alumni wanted Dickey fired. But he hung on for the 1985 season. With guarded optimism, he believed his team could win.

But whether it was a lack of coaching on his part or lack of leadership on the field, things didn't happen. K-State lost — two in a row to teams of questionable strength — not a pretty sight. So now Dickey will gain his place in the back of the K-State football media guide with 25-53-1 record next to his name.

Jim Dickey met with the press Sunday after his resignation was made official. With characteristic humor, he told the press the "good news" and the "bad news." The good news was that he would never lose again as the coach at K-State. The bad news — he would never win again as the Wildcat coach. It was time to let someone else try his hand at having a winning season and making it to a bowl game — a combination no other K-State coach had achieved.

Fans and alumni, the people who are supposed to make the big contributions to build K-State into the next Big Eight powerhouse, want to see a new team Saturday.

They'll see a new coach Saturday, but they may not see a new team.

Soviets continue human rights violations

MIKE RILEY
Collegian Columnist

With President Reagan agreeing to the economic sanctions against South Africa and with protests for divestment and against apartheid no longer grabbing headlines, one would think the issue of divestment would be coming to an end.

But there is a new cause on the scene that will make many of those who feel South Africa is the largest violator of human rights wake up and smell the coffee.

Although the human rights cause in South Africa is far from over, the protest for human rights in the Soviet Union has only begun. The group spearheading this human rights movement against the Soviet Union is the Young Conservative Foundation with its cause titled "Save the Oppressed People" or STOP.

The group's aim is to end investment with the Soviet Union due to the government's human rights standards, or lack thereof. The group has quite a point to make, and those who wish to compare Soviet Union and South African stances on human rights may have their eyes opened.

One of STOP's field men has said those who protest South African policies, but ignore what the Soviet Union has done are guilty of "selective morality." And in a very certain way he is correct.

I am in no way speaking in favor of apartheid, but in the same breath, I wish to point out to the many liberals looking for a cause that there are far more violations of human rights by the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union is guilty of more than 143 million murders, international terrorism, torture and religious persecution, atrocities in Afghanistan and Cambodia, aggression in Central America, suspected conspiracy to assassinate Pope John Paul II and, yes, let's not forget the civilian jet airliner the Soviets shot down two years ago.

David Finzer, 32-year-old founder of STOP, asks the question, "If racism is bad, which it is, if apartheid is bad, which it is, then shouldn't slavery, concentration camps, imperialism and torture be condemned at least as much?"

John Scanlon, California state chairman of STOP said, "We don't believe in selective morality. If you are going to abhor apartheid, you better abhor the gulag, you better abhor what is happening in Afghanistan and in Ethiopia and throughout Eastern Europe."

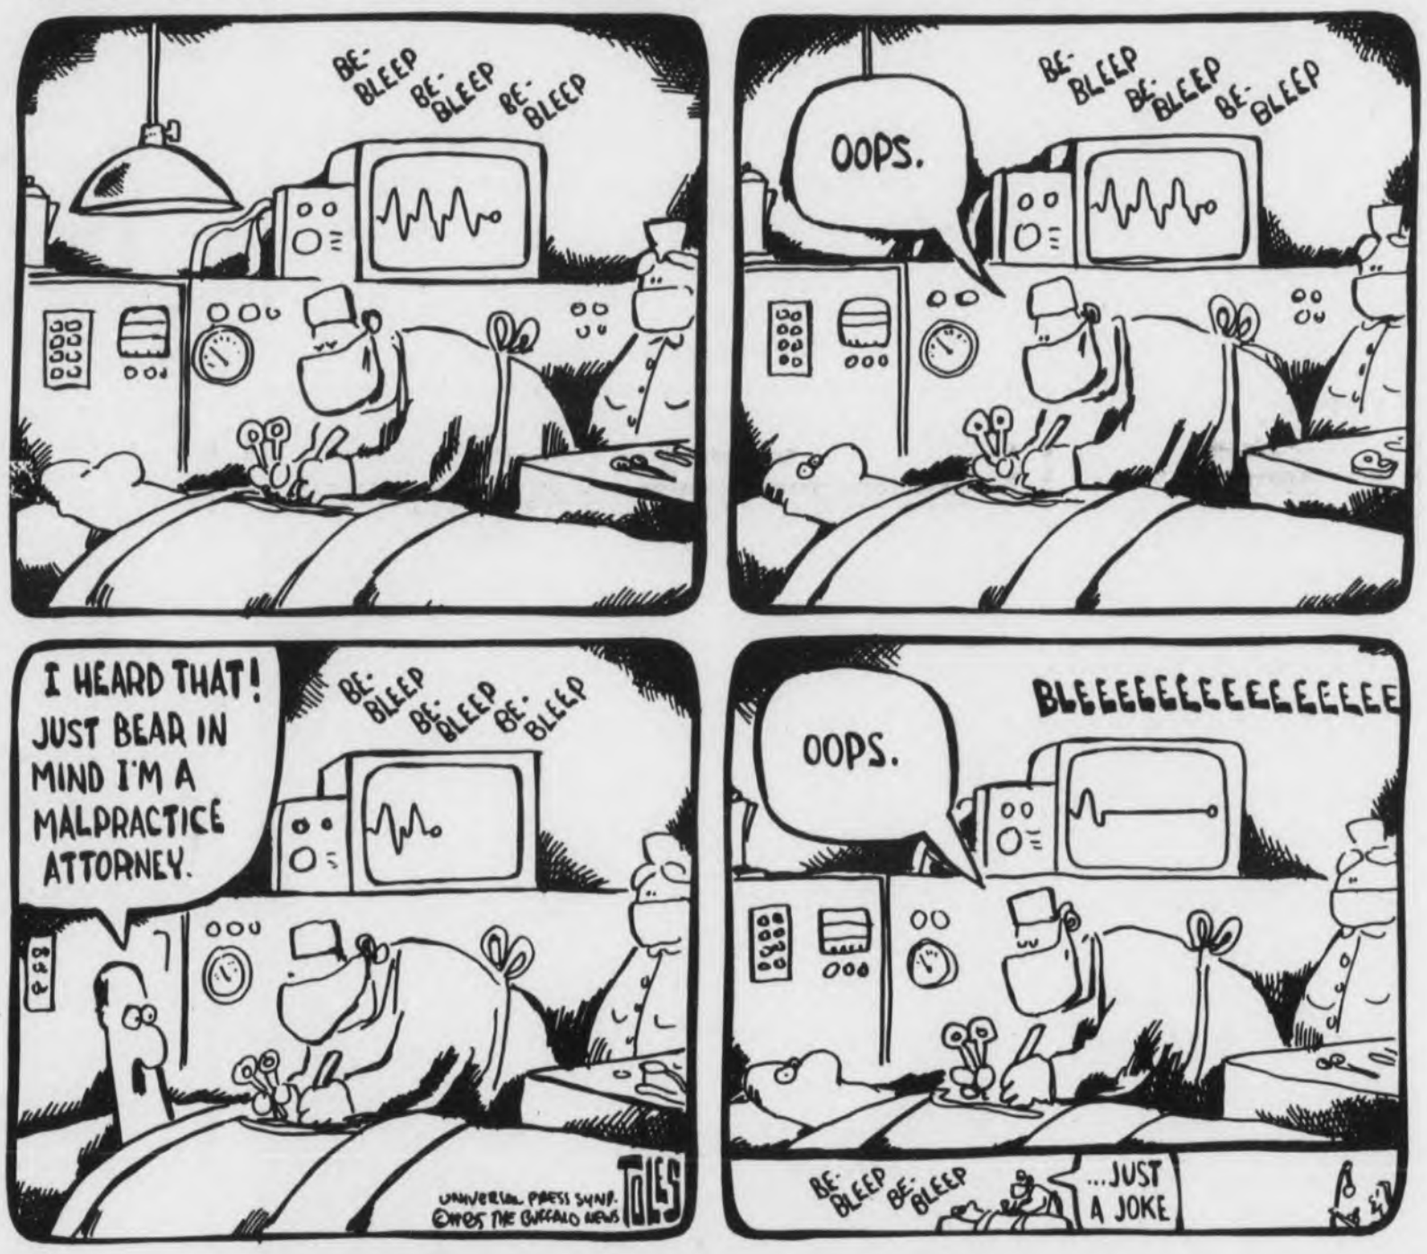
Although the lines of divestment with South Africa are fairly clear cut, many are confused as to what trade involvement the United States has with the Soviet Union. Here is where the true shock of the whole issue hits home.

Many giant multi-national corporations sell technology and domestic goods to the Soviet Union. Most of these sales have direct military applications, and thus fuel the arms race.

For instance, tanks manufactured at a truck factory built by the Ford Motor Co. have been used in suppressing the people of Afghanistan for years. Digital Equipment Corp. has reportedly sold Soviet bloc nations over 30,000 computers, many with direct military applications. IBM computers are believed to be the mainstay of the Warsaw Pact air defense system.

It's not enough that we provide the Soviet Union with sales of the military-applicable hardware, but we provide them much of the money to buy the goods with credits from the Export-Import Bank. This is simply selling rope to the hangman.

The STOP campaign is starting to pick up some momentum on college campuses across the nation. Students are pushing their administration to withdraw its funds from companies that trade with the Soviet Union, much in the same manner as those calling for South African divestment by their colleges.



Already the campaign has gone coast to coast with STOP movements in full swing at the University of California at Davis, to small prestigious schools on the East Coast. Some campaigns are even starting in private high schools.

The movement is using many attention-getting techniques ranging from mass protest to sit-ins at the office of liberal Assemblyman Tom Hayden, D-Calif.

Some students have gone as far as to return scholarships or decline awards from the companies that have interests in Soviet Union trade. One of the high points of the STOP campaign was the media coverage received when Joan McEnery, a senior at the St. Xavier Academy in Coventry, Conn., returned her Junior Achievement Award last spring when she found out the group's sponsor, Textron, sells to the Soviet Union and its allies.

"Surely you realize that the Soviet Union is a gross violator of internationally accepted standards of human rights," McEnery said.

It is beginning to appear that divestment can become capitalism's No. 1 weapon against human rights violations. One must hope that divestment is used responsibly and does not turn out hurting those it was designed to help.

Democratic Party now seeking white vote

DAVID BRODER
Syndicated Columnist

WASHINGTON — The unspoken assumption among most of those involved in the effort to reshape the Democratic Party after two successive landslide presidential defeats is this: We've got the blacks; let's concentrate on getting more whites.

They don't put it that crudely, of course. They prefer to talk about "getting back in the mainstream" or "erasing the special-interest label."

But there are few Democratic leaders who are unaware of the implications of the racial polarization in the Jimmy Carter and Walter Mondale votes. Both those men got more than nine out of 10 whites. As a result, they were wiped out in 1980 and 1984 by President Ronald Reagan.

As they prepare for 1986 and 1988, the emphasis among the Democrats is clearly on improving their acceptability to middle-class white voters, by demonstrating their concern about budget deficits, a strong, efficient defense, retirement benefits and tax burdens.

But while most Democrats are busy courting the straying white voters — from yuppies to hard-pressed farmers — there is growing intellectual and political dissent among blacks.

In the past few weeks, there has been substantial discussion among black politicians, and almost none among whites, about one striking finding from a survey of black voters taken before the 1984 election.

That survey showed that 59 percent of the 1,150 respondents said that if the Rev. Jesse Jackson had decided to run as an Independent in November 1984, they would support him against Mondale and Reagan. This astonishing response, if carried out, would have left Mondale with less than one-third of the popular votes. And it "makes a Republican a shoo-in in 1988, if Jackson decides to run as an Independent next time," commented Rep. Mickey Leland, D-Texas, chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and a 1984 Mondale supporter.

Jackson is, of course, saying nothing about his 1988 plans, and he is the key. Three-fourths of the blacks surveyed rejected the idea of a separate black party as an abstraction, while a heavy majority said they would follow Jackson as an Independent presidential candidate.

The knowledge that perhaps 6 million of the 10 million black voters were ready to follow Jackson out of the Democratic Party — and might be again — certainly casts a different light on the intra-party policy debates. The key finding from the National Black Election Study was reported by Shirley Hatchett and Ronald Brown of the University of Michigan Institute for Social Research in a recent bulletin of the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation.

The lack of notice it drew from white Democratic Party leaders is an indication of the party's preoccupation with the pursuit of turned-off white voters. But it is also evidence to many blacks of a growing gulf between the party leadership and the Democrats' most loyal constituency.

Leland, who calls himself "very much of a Democratic Party insider and loyalist," says: "It's harder and harder to defend that position to people outside the party when the Democratic Party just does not show any leadership on black people's behalf."

The national survey indicated that Jackson's support was concentrated among younger and better-educated blacks, the ones who are sure to be the political activists of the next decade or more.

One of them, William Nelson Jr., of Ohio State University, told a panel on black politics at the recent American Political Science Association convention that "black leaders have been forced to reassess their relationship with the Democratic Party." As he put it, "The Democrats have decided that black leaders should be shunned...They blame us for whites rejecting the Democratic candidate."

While conceding that no organization base exists for a black third party, Nelson said that he expected to see many more black politicians pursue "a new policy of pragmatism...seeking goals that are not dependent on white support."

Agreeing, Thomas Cavanagh, a specialist in black politics at the National Research Council, said in a recent paper that more blacks will run as Independents in local races in the South, in order to avoid the Democratic runoff primaries which have been a target of Jackson's complaints. Success for some of those campaigns would obviously add to the credibility of a Jackson independent candidacy in 1988.

But the overlooked finding that 59 percent of the black voters would have followed Jackson out of the Democratic Party in 1984 cannot be ignored by Democratic leaders forever.

Architects to sponsor series of presentations

By The Collegian Staff

The Department of Architecture, in cooperation with the K-State University Chapter of the American Institute of Architecture Students, will sponsor a series of exhibitions and presentations during the year.

The series, titled "Architecture from the Plains," is in its fourth season. Leading architectural firms from Missouri, Iowa and Minnesota will be participating in the program.

The series will focus on the buildings, philosophies and design methods of the six firms represented.

Exhibits may be viewed in Seaton Hall 205, and include drawings, models, photographs and other materials illustrating the work of the firms.

Hastings and Chivetta, an architecture firm in St. Louis, is the first of six scheduled exhibits. The exhibit will be open for viewing through Friday.

The firm has a staff of 34 professionals and has carried out more than 650 projects for clients from St. Louis, Louisiana and Washington.

As part of the series, a representative from each firm will presenting a slide show, along with a discussion of the firm's philosophies and designs. The presentation by Hastings and Chivetta will be at 8 p.m. tonight in Durland Hall 173.

All presentations will be given at 8 p.m. in Durland 173 and are open to the public.

Projects of Coy Hutchinson Stone, Kansas City, Mo., will be on exhibit Oct. 21-25. The presentation will take place Oct. 23.

On Nov. 18-22, Charles Herbert and Associates, Des Moines, Iowa, will exhibit. Their presentation will take place Nov. 20.

Gastinger Rees Walker, also from Kansas City, Mo., is scheduled to exhibit Feb. 3-7, with the presentation set for Feb. 5.

Setter, Leach and Lindstrom, Minneapolis, Minn., will display their work March 3-7. The presentation will be given March 5.

The final exhibitor will be Hellmuth Obata and Kassabaum from St. Louis. The firm will make its presentation April 16.

Mediocrity battle opens new front

California board rejects biology texts

By The Associated Press

California's decision to reject nearly 30 biology textbooks for watering down the theory of evolution has opened a crucial new front in the three-year battle to weed out mediocrity in America's schools.

California's school board, led by schools superintendent Bill Honig, voted last week to reject the junior high school texts printed by about a dozen publishers. On Monday, several publishers agreed to revise their texts to put more emphasis on the theory of evolution, which holds that humankind evolved from lower forms of life.

For the first time, the spotlight of school reform shifted to where some educators have argued it has belonged all along: on educational materials like textbooks and computer software which many have criticized as so dull and intellectually bankrupt that they represent a roadblock to school excellence.

California's use of its textbook buying power to force publishers to make changes in biology texts showed that in at least some respects, educational excellence and the laws of the marketplace are inseparable.

Honig, a maverick not easily categorized as a liberal or conservative, has taken on two formidable foes. On one hand are religious fundamentalists like Kelly Segraves who operates the Science Creation Research Center in San Diego and who have had considerable success in getting biology texts to give less space to the theory of evolution. On the other hand are textbook publishers who have seen school reform movements come and go, and who have openly doubted that educational excellence sells in the long run.

States like California and Texas have tremendous influence over textbook content across the country. Both are among the largest of the 24 states that have a statewide textbook review process. Equally important, the textbook selection process in those states includes open hearings at which religious fundamentalists can argue their views before a broad audience.

Last March, Texas's attorney general ruled unconstitutional a state board of education guideline requiring texts to present evolution as "only one of several explanations of the origins of huhumankind."

But it's the struggle with the publishers, not the fundamentalists, that could have lasting significance in determining the future direction of school reform.

Honig is by no means the first to criticize "dumbed down" texts.

Last February, former U.S. Education Secretary T.H. Bell criticized the quality of texts. A month later, Honig and other state education chiefs tried unsuccessfully to form an interstate textbook-purchasing consortium.

New York City in 1982 removed high school biology texts by three publishers from that school district's "approved" book list because they de-emphasized — or eliminated any mention of — the theory of evolution.

California has told the publishing industry it wants more challenging and intellectually sound texts — and it's putting its $100 million in textbook purchasing power where its mouth is.

Riley County Courthouse Revived

The clockwork in the courthouse tower runs the four outside clocks.

The Riley County Courthouse, in the 400 block of Poyntz Avenue, is being renovated to allow the 79-year-old building more courtroom space and an updated look inside.

County instigates renovation of 'horse and buggy' facility

With some renovation projects, the goal may be to simply improve the appearance or mechanics of a building. But other factors, including the right to a speedy trial, instigated the renovation of the 79-year-old Riley County Courthouse in the 400 block of Poyntz Avenue.

Riley County Engineer and Director of Public Works Dan Harden said the court's case load, especially with new drinking-under-the-influence laws, caused a considerable time delay because there was not enough room available for trials. One example Harden cited was an arson case that took six years to come to trial.

"The demands in the legal system had increased, and they still had this horse and buggy facility," Harden said.

"The problem was affecting almost everybody in the community who was using the legal system. The need (for a new facility) became fairly apparent," Harden said.

With the renovation near completion, the building now contains two additional courtrooms and an area allotted exclusively for small claims court. This will allow a larger number of cases to be heard at the same time.

Riley County District Court Judge Jerry Mershon said the county is the 10th largest in Kansas and the last of those 10 to update court facilities.

The renovation of the the structure, originally built in 1906, began late in the fall of 1984, Harden said. The renovation is expected to be finished in early 1986.

The courthouse is to be part of a plaza area which includes new county offices in a former music store, the First Christian Church, 115 Courthouse Plaza and the Carnegie Building, 105 Courthouse Plaza. The Carnegie Building will also contain another courtroom.

"Innovative redesign" is the name given to the project by Riley County Assistant Engineer Eric Shoults. Shoults served as the liaison between the Riley County Commission and the architectural firm Ron Reid and Associates in partnership with other consulting firms, Landmark Company and Cheney Construction Inc., all of Manhattan.

"We wanted to keep the character of 1906, to keep the architectural spirit of the building alive," Shoults said. "We wanted to put it in as an on-line facility, meeting all the (building) codes. Essentially we kept an old shell and built a new building."

During renovation, the old courtroom, on the building's third floor, was divided into two separate courtrooms. Other changes for the building's interior included transformation of the former county commission office into the small claims courtroom. Rooms on the basement, first and second floors were updated to house court-affiliated offices. Other administrative offices formerly located in the courthouse were moved to the Riley County Office Building, 110 Courthouse Plaza.

Harden said the ornate woodwork of the building took some "pretty good craftmanship" to preserve and work around. The wainscoting and tile floors were also retained.

Other concerns in the renovation included meeting fire codes, handicapped accessibility and energy requirements.

"There were some unique design problems," Shoults said. "Because of the historical character of the building, we were allowed to deviate from certain construction requirements."

Shoults said current fire safety codes allow no more than two floors be connected without fire doors between them. In this case, the three connecting floors were allowed to remain after the installation of fire alarms, ventilation and sprinkler systems to fulfill alternative safety requirements.

Shoults said the restoration work, plus a parking lot and landscaping, cost approximately $1.23 million. This put the cost per-square-foot at $40.

"If you would go out and build new facilities, you would be in the area of $75 a square foot," Shoults said. "There are substantial savings in the community by rehabilitating older structures."

The major source of funding for the project, Harden said, came from interest earned by the county on investments of city and county property and local school board tax revenues in interest-bearing accounts beginning more than five years ago.

Allan McKenzie, employed by Country Carpet, Rossville, spreads glue on the floor before laying the carpet in the basement.

Hunger project works to increase awareness

By MARK McDERMET
Collegian Reporter

"If there is political will in this country and abroad...it should be possible to overcome the worst aspects of widespread hunger and malnutrition within one generation." — National Academy of Sciences, Food Nutrition Study, 1977.

A cry of hunger is an unfamiliar sound to many people, but there are those trying to make those cries heard.

Answering these cries is the Manhattan organization of the International Hunger Project — a non-profit group seeking to increase awareness of the international hunger problem.

"To a great extent what the Hunger Project does is take pockets of unconsciousness from our mind and make us aware of the possibilities specifically for ending hunger wherever it exists," said Edith Stunkel, assistant director at the Center for Aging and national manager for a ending-hunger briefing sponsored by the Hunger Project.

"A briefing synthesizes crucial information in a way so that people can take decisive and effective action in ending hunger," Stunkel said. "People who make a difference in the world take knowledge and act upon it. That's what the briefing is designed to do."

People in 135 countries are enrolled in the Hunger Project. By the end of century, 40 countries will be directly involved, said Lynn Doxon, assistant instructor in horticulture and ending-hunger briefing leader.

Stunkel estimates that more than 3,000 individuals in the Manhattan area have enrolled in the Hunger Project.

"It's set up to make us do it. Hunger isn't going to end by them doing it; it's going to end by us doing it," she said.

What has spawned involvement by entertainers has also grabbed the attention of almost 4 million people across the nation, Doxon said.

As an organization, the Hunger Project has become the definitive source in ending hunger, said Doxon. Other similar organizations doing relief and development work come to the Hunger Project as an educational resource.

"The Hunger Project does not directly do relief and development. There are many organizations with expertise in that area," Stunkel said. "Its purpose is to make what's happening to end hunger work."

"It is not an organization you can join. It's not an organization that has an ideology. It has one idea — ending hunger. It doesn't say what positions on issues should be taken, that is up to the individual involved in the Hunger Project," Doxon said.

A briefing leader's work involves conducting a training program, being a community leader in ending hunger and leading an ending-hunger briefing, Doxon said.

"What began in 1981 as a seven-hour program due to widespread unconsciousness on the subject is now a two-hour presentation on the facts and issues of hunger and what we as individuals can do to end it," Stunkel said.

"This is not just another seminar with good information. This briefing turns people around regarding their involvement in ending hunger," she said.

Last year in Manhattan, briefings were held for 200 elementary school children in their classrooms. On Sept. 24, a briefing will be held at University for Man. The format includes audio-visual materials, a lecture by the briefing leader and time set aside for classroom discussion.

"The briefing has all the information that will make even the most skeptical realize that they have it in them," Doxon said.

"We (Hunger Project) generated the idea in which the Live Aid concert came forth," Stunkel said.

"It's like the Hunger Project created the climate for the Live Aid concert to occur. In the wintertime flowers don't come up, but in the springtime the flowers bloom," Doxon said.

The idea the Hunger Project generates is that hunger can and will be ended, Stunkel said.

'Fright Night' combines comedy, terror

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Nearly every big city has a late night horror television show complete with a "Mistress of the Dark" or a "Master of the Shadows." These hosts and hostesses guide us through an evening of ripped-out throats, cobweb-filled crypts and blood-stained sacrificial altars.

Film Review

The main attractions are the featured films, usually titled something like "I Was a Teenage Vampire" or "Bloodsuckers From Beyond the Stars." But the hosts turn the evenings into events, comfortable sit-down-and-get-loose sessions.

Peter Vincent, Vampire Killer, is one of these hosts. At one time he starred in many a cheap horror flick, but now he is just a host, watching his audience dwindle as interest in vampires dwindles. Now kids only want to see maniacs in hockey masks hacking up scantily dressed young ladies. Peter Vincent's show is "Fright Night," also the name of this movie.

As Peter Vincent, Roddy McDowell has finally found a role that lets his natural hamminess pay off. He looks constipated as he walks through "Fright Night" but that's just right for the character.

The hero of the movie is Charly. He religiously watches Peter Vincent's horror show and revels in the sudden breezes that extinguish candle flames and the thick fogs that roll across darkened bogs. But Charly doesn't really believe in whatever it is that goes bump in the night.

He doesn't, that is, until the new neighbor moves in, and the first thing moved in is a coffin. Soon after, dismembered young ladies start turning up all over town.

Charly wonders if there could be a connection. Late one night, Charly catches a glimpse through the neighbor's bedroom window, a glimpse of the neighbor's two-inch-long fangs poised to pierce a young lovely's jugular. That's enough for Charly. The neighbor must be a vampire. But who'll believe him? Who can help? Why Peter Vincent, Vampire Killer, of course! So Charly sets out for the aid of his idol.

The film revels in and flaunts cliches, and then mugs like a spoiled child. It's horror mixed with comedy and outrage. Holland wants to shock the viewer with how much of a bad boy he can be, indulging in genuinely gruesome special effects.

Holland comes close to pulling it all off. His lead character isn't very interesting, though. Charly is so wide-eyed and naive that he's boring. Because the movie spends so much time on him at the start of the movie, the beginning drags.

Once the vampire discovers that the peeping tom next door knows altogether too much, once the vampire decides he must kill off this little busybody, once the suave vampire (Chris Sarandon doing a Frank Langella impersonation) is invited by Charly's mother into the house for a drink, then things heat up and Holland lets loose with a torrent of ultra-black comedy.

Not everyone will enjoy this mixture of comedy and horror. If the gremlin in the blender seemed to be in bad taste — not to mention the gremlin in the microwave — then chances are "Fright Night" will seem like some sort of abomination.

But if there was pleasure in seeing one gremlin splattered against kitchen cabinets and another one turn the insides of the microwave into black goo, then chances are "Fright Night" will seem to be a good time.

It's not nearly as witty as "The Howling" and it's a completely different genre than "Ghostbusters." Director Holland is able to create some true terror up on the screen when he puts his mind to it. Most of the time the film is schizophrenic, but that's part of the fun. Holland puts the comedy and outrage upfront and lets the horror filter through later.

Phony advertisement asks for complaints against local police

By The Collegian Staff

Respondents to an advertisement in Monday's Manhattan Mercury may find the telephone numbers listed accurate. But those parties associated with the ads had nothing to do with placing them.

The classified ad, under "Special Notices," read: "Any resident of Riley County who has been harrassed, threatened, abused, assaulted, or knows of any criminal activities of any Riley County Police Officers or employees of Riley County Police, past or present are urged to contact the FBI at 776-4451 or 1-816-221-6100 or the KBI at 1-232-6000. Your information will be kept confidential."

A spokeswoman for the Kansas City, Mo., office of the FBI said, "I do not know anything about the ad," after it was read to her. "Contact the Manhattan office," she said.

A representative of the Manhattan FBI office located in the Federal Building at Fourth and Houston streets said the FBI did not place the ad.

"We are not aware of who put the ad in," he said.

Gary Pettijohn, representing the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in Topeka, said, "We were not responsible for the ad."

Riley County Police Department Assistant Director Les Bieler said, "We sure as hell didn't (run it) either."

Bieler said the department has a good idea of who placed the advertisement, adding the individual was out to embarrass the department. He also said the individual has a history of actions against other governmental agencies.

Bieler also noted the FBI and KBI investigate complaints against local departments, but they are public, not confidential.

An employee of the Mercury's advertising department said the paper isn't running the ad anymore. The paper doesn't require identification for running ads, the employee said.

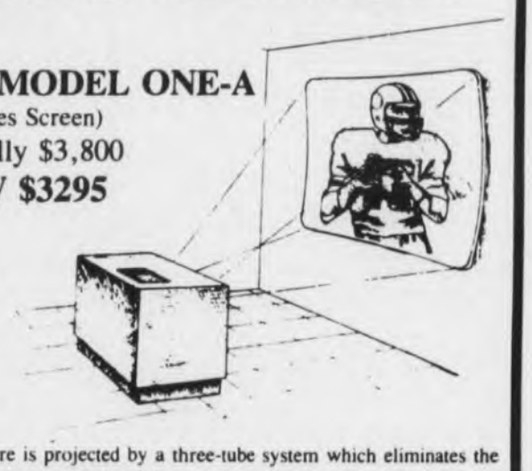
well as the Jefferson County district attorney and the water system in The Dalles, the seat of Wasco County. He said electronic bugs had been placed in his bedroom and on telephones, and that chemicals had been dumped in law enforcement vehicles to keep them from running.

He expanded on the allegations Tuesday, saying he now believes "street people" brought to the commune a year ago were drugged to keep them in line.

Weaver said that he had been assured by an official in FBI Director William Webster's office that "an investigation would begin."

Weaver said law officers had been telling him since last year, when he called for investigations of the commune-city and its dealings, that they needed a "stool pigeon."

"We got the biggest one of all," Weaver said. "The Bhagwan himself. That's going to break it."



Dr. Laurence R. Foster, a deputy epidemiologist for the Oregon Health Division, said progress of the investigation would depend on whether new evidence, such as witnesses or documents, was uncovered.

The guru's statements and allegations are not enough, Foster said.

ASK offices relocate next to Legislature

By The-Collegian Staff

Associated Students of Kansas, a students' organization which lobbies for educational benefits, has moved its administrative offices in Topeka to a new location, said Brett Lambert, junior in political science and ASK legislative assembly chairman.

Lambert said the move would be helpful for the organization's lobbying activities because the new office in the Capitol Tower, located at 400 S.W. Eighth St. in Topeka, is larger and closer to the office of the Board of Regents and the Legislature.

"It's right across the street from the Capitol, which, of course, is a much better location for a lobbying organization like ASK," Lambert said.

He said financial considerations were also part of the factors affecting the move. ASK determined the organization would save money if the move was made now instead of later.

ASK had no reason to believe the move would be expensive when the long-term costs were considered, Lambert said.

"We were projecting for the long-term situation," Lambert said. "In the old office, space was limited and the supplies we had to use were also extremely limited. We had five to six people working in an office the size of a dorm room. This hampered our organizational activities."

ASK is sponsoring an open house in the new state office at 3 p.m. Friday.

Steelworkers struggle to save 'high' wage rates

Walkout by Wheeling-Pittsburgh employees continues

By The Associated Press

MONESSEN, Pa. — Mark Hyslop wanted to attend business school when he graduated from high school more than nine years ago and even put money down on tuition. However, he decided to take a job in the local steel plant after a neighbor told him about openings.

"I think now maybe that was a mistake," said the 27-year-old crane operator, who was sitting with a union buddy. They were on picket duty in the United Steelworkers' 60-day-old walkout to hold the line against wage concessions at Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp.

Vince Nightman, 35, who shared an unpainted, plywood shelter with Hyslop on a chilly afternoon recently, said he gave up a job at an electrical equipment factory outside Pittsburgh to work at Wheeling-Pittsburgh's Monessen plant. The move six years ago put an extra $2 per hour into his paycheck.

Like some 8,200 other USW pickets against Wheeling-Pittsburgh, Hyslop and Nightman are soldiers for organized labor in the battle to save what generations of USW members have struggled to achieve — one of the highest manufacturing wage rates in the world.

Wages, fringe benefits and other components of hourly labor costs for unionized steelworkers reached an all-time high of $26.29 in the fall of 1982, according to the American Iron and Steel Institute.

Wheeling-Pittsburgh, teetering on the brink of insolvency for several years, won concessions that dropped its hourly labor rate to $21.40 before filing for reorganization in federal bankruptcy court last April.

The company is now leading the steel industry's push to bring labor costs closer to those in domestic mini-mills or in foreign mills, where production can be government-subsidized and wages are low.

Officials at Wheeling-Pittsburgh say the company cannot survive without further reducing labor costs to $15.20 per hour. With labor contracts expiring next August throughout the industry, competing steelmakers have begun asking the USW for a share of whatever savings the seventh-largest producer wins in its current labor conflict.

"We're the test case, no doubt about it," said John Amprim, Hyslop's union president at USW Local 2698. "If we lose, everybody loses."

The front line in that battle runs through the middle of this declining riverside community of blue-collared immigrants, and through the eight other communities in Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia where Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel maintains plants.

No matter who wins, Monessen has already been battered. The 2-mile-long steel plant owes $207,000 in real estate taxes, or 21 percent of the city's income from all property tax.

The production halt has also drained nearly $80,000 from the city's treasury, said City Administrator Paul Shives.

Officials favor benefit district

Commission to sign petition

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan City Commissioners voted Tuesday night, 3-2, in favor of the city signing a petition that would form a benefit district in the 300 block of Colorado Street.

The petition asked that costs be equally divided among the 16 lots that would receive curb and sidewalk improvements as a part of downtown redevelopment.

Manhattan attorney John Fay, representing Dean Conkwright, owner of Bud's Auto Service, 301 Colorado St., argued his client would not benefit from the proposed improvements. Fay asked commissioners to either deny the petition or remove his client's name.

Chris Curtin of Curtin/Bowman Enterprises, 1600 Poyntz Ave., said Conkwright would benefit by increased property values after improvemets were made.

Mayor Suzanne Lindamood and Commissioner Gene Klinger said they could see a benefit to Conkwright's business but not to the extent of other businesses in the benefit district.

In other action the commission approved a request from Griffith Lumber Co., 231 Pierre St., to purchase 5 acres of Industrial Park land at the corner of U.S. Highway 24 and Levee Drive. The relocation was necessary due to proposed redevelopment.

Another project in the downtown redevelopment area was delayed pending further study.

The project would have been an agreement with Manhattan Ice and Cold Storage, 209 Yuma St., for an option to purchase city-owned land to be acquired from the Union Pacific Railroad.

Outlook for jobs 'positive' in agribusiness field

By RUSTIN HAMILTON
Agriculture Editor

The outlook for finding employment in the field of agriculture is a positive one, according to company representatives participating in the agribusiness careers fair Tuesday at the Union.

The theme for this year's fair was "Shake Hands with the Future."

"It's a start," said Dixie Glanville, senior in agricultural journalism. "It gives me an opportunity to get some leads into some good job possibilities."

"I think there is a real positive future in agriculture, especially in the cereal food division," said Ann Lange, employee relations supervisor of Quaker Oats Co.

Food is a necessity and companies dealing with food have a fairly stable future ahead of them, Lange said.

Kraft Inc., another company dealing with the creating and processing of food, has also felt the constant need for students directly out of college, said Mick Cary, product manager.

"In the food science area we never experience 'boom times' or 'bust times' when we are searching for employees," Cary said. "Our recruiting has always been very steady throughout the years."

Students may not always end up in the town or state they want, but there is usually a job in their line of work somewhere, Cary said.

While some companies are constantly recruiting students, many experience variable recruiting times, depending on the time of year.

The meat processing business has its fast or slow times, depending on whether a new plant is opening, said Lonny Jepsen, cooperate recruiter for Iowa Beef Processing Co.

"We keep in touch with the students either way," he said. "You never know when something might open up."

The Peace Corps, on the other hand, probably has more openings than all other companies combined, said Dana Hamm, Peace Corps representative.

"We'll send 3,600 people to foreign countries this year," Hamm said. "Around 1,500 of those will be in the agriculture field."

More than 1,000 students attended the fair which offered 32 exhibits.

"This was a great opportunity to visit with possible employers and find out the future of ag business," said Dan Stanley, senior in animal sciences and industry. "I'm encouraged by what I've heard today."

AWOL

Staff/John Sleezer

ABOVE: After having a brief taste of freedom from the Sunset Zoo and being drenched with water by the Manhattan Fire Department, a blue and gold macaw is finally captured in the back yard of Rich and Jan Clark's house at 230 Summit Ave. with the help of zookeeper Art Knisley. RIGHT: After the capture, head zookeeper Caroline Meek scolds the wet and angry bird before taking him back to the zoo. According to Meek the macaw escaped from the children's area of the zoo on a good gust of wind as he was being put away for the night.

Baptist church delays action on divestment

By The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The Southern Baptist Foundation's finance committee group delayed on Tuesday making a recommendation on whether to divest the church's assets in companies doing business in South Africa.

Tim Hedquist, director of financial planning for the finance committee, said the panel instead would review the issue at its next scheduled meeting in February, allowing time to find out more about what church entities have invested in South Africa and how much is invested.

He said the national foundation also wants to learn more about where local groups within the church stand on the issue.

"The committee did not have enough information to act on the motion," said Hedquist. "There has been no move to take any action. We're still in the study phase."

Hedquist said a subcommittee of the the financial panel would consult with 20 church agencies and other organizations before meeting again in February.

Hollis Johnson, executive secretary-treasurer of the foundation, supported maintaining church investments in white minority-ruled South Africa and using those investments as leverage against the apartheid government to have it cease its racial policies.

"I think we can do more good by staying with the companies that are already there and see to it they are making conscientious efforts to improve the conditions of blacks," Johnson said.

"If we sold the stocks, we'd have no right to go to a company and tell them how to run their business there," Johnson told the Southern Baptist executive committee's finance group, which meets here through Wednesday.

He said about $5 million of the $40 million the foundation manages for several agencies of the Nashville-based Southern Baptist Convention is tied up in firms with links to South Africa.

Game gives students experience in stock market

By BRENDA KITCHEN
Collegian Reporter

Anyone can invest and manage $100,000 in the stock market risk-free by playing the Stock Market Game.

The game, coordinated by the Center for Economic Education in the College of Education, is a statewide computer-simulated game. Participants are given a hypothetical $100,000 to invest in New York and American Stock Exchange stocks for a 10-week period, said Vera Freeman, Center of Economic Education director.

The 10-week playing time forces players to deal with short-term investments which are more volatile, and therefore a greater risk, than stocks they might choose in other circumstances, Freeman said.

Players get the "experience of buying and selling stocks without actually having to invest their own money," she said, adding that the game is beneficial to players because it gives them a better understanding of how the market economy works.

The game is open to educators, students and the general public. It is typically played in teams by elementary, junior and senior high students in connection with a school course, said Bette Zikmund, Stock Market Game coordinator.

Larry Andersen, a Kansas educator, supervised a group of students from Manhattan High School who played the game in the spring session. Andersen, who is currently the principal at Onaga High School, taught social studies at Manhattan High School last year. He said the Stock Market Game was a helpful teaching aid and was easy to use.

"The instructions provided a good solid beginning (for those playing the game for the first time)," Andersen said.

Because a progress report is circulated weekly to all participating schools, students have an added incentive to do well, he said.

Andersen said cost is often a deciding factor when choosing educational programs, but the cost of participating in the Stock Market Game is minimal.

Dave Johnson, head of the Mathematics Department at Manhattan Middle School, sponsors the Stock Market Club, which plays the Stock Market Game.

"I think that there was a need with the kids here — the K-State game was perfect," Johnson said.

He said students who play the game learn to appreciate not only the work and study that go into investing in the stock market, but also the amount of luck involved.

"No matter how much they study up on a company or a certain stock, there are still some items that they have no control over," Johnson said.

Students and individuals not associated with a school may participate in the open division, Zikmund said.

Gov. Kerrey requests calm in terrorist cases

By The Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Gov. Bob Kerrey advised law enforcement officers from nine states Tuesday to remain calm in dealing with terrorists and paramilitary groups.

"The terrorist wants authority to overreact so he can show the authority was wrong in the first place," Kerrey said during a speech at the annual meeting of the Mid-States Organized Crime Information Center.

Kerrey said it is important for law enforcement officers "not to batten down the hatches and go on the defensive" in terrorist situations.

"It is important for us in the face of terrorist acts, very important, to go on the offensive," he said.

He said officers should approach situations with "calmness, humor, and help our people avoid disorientation."

The state was "badly disoriented" last year by the death of Cairo farmer Arthur Kirk, the governor said. Kirk died Oct. 23 in an exchange of gunfire with a State Patrol special weapons and tactics team.

Law enforcement officers were criticized for taking action against the armed farmer, who had gone to a sandbagged bunker on his farm.

However, law enforcement officers were criticized for not acting quickly enough earlier this year at a Rulo farm where a group of survivalists were living, he said.

Officers discovered a cache of weapons and stolen property on the farm during raids this summer. In August, they found the bodies of a 5-year-old boy and a man buried in unmarked graves.

He alluded to Nebraska's current seat belt law, which was "such a popular bill" that citizens are clamoring to vote on it next year.

Represented are law enforcement agencies in Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, the Dakotas, Minnesota, Illinois and Wisconsin.

Lack of fan, alumni support reason behind Dickey's 'firing'

DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Money talks.

The resignation of Jim Dickey as K-State football coach was, and continues to be, surrounded by controversy. Money is likely the reason why.

Athletic Director Larry Travis has admitted that if Dickey had not offered to resign, he probably would have asked Dickey for his resignation. In other words, Dickey was forced out as K-State coach under pressure from Travis.

Before we make Travis out to be the bad guy (or good guy, if you wanted Dickey fired), we should take a look at why he felt he needed to force Dickey into resigning.

As Travis told me in an interview earlier this year, football and basketball are the two major revenue-producing sports on any college campus. Without the income derived from these two sports, an athletic department is doomed to fail.

The money made by the football and basketball programs at major universities comes from two major sources — alumni support and revenues obtained by putting fans in the stands on game days. Herein lies the reason Dickey was forced out.

If Dickey had remained head football coach for the balance of the season, K-State would have likely lost several thousand dollars of alumni support. More importantly, however, the number of fans in the stands would have likely continued to decrease at an alarming rate.

At the first game this year, against Wichita State University, 30,300 fans came out to watch the Wildcats get upset by the Shockers 16-10. Last Saturday, only 17,550 watched K-State lose again, this time to the University of Northern Iowa by a 10-6 score.

By making the move to force Dickey out now, rather than waiting until the end of the year, Travis has all but guaranteed there will be a greater number of fans in the stands for the remainder of the year.

How will a new coach put fans in the stands? Novelty, plain and simple. A change of any sort in athletics, let alone a change in coaches, is enough to spark the interest of even the most casual fan.

I'll admit I'm intrigued enough to find out whether or not the change will be of any benefit. Travis is betting there will be several thousand additional people who share my curiosity. His job depends on it.

If the gamble doesn't pay off, the problems will continue to snowball. Lack of revenue at the gate and lack of alumni support lead to decreased operating budgets. Decreased operating budgets can lead to poor recruiting efforts, and poor recruiting efforts can lead to poor teams.

Poor teams, as we have seen for years at K-State, lead to two things — the firing and/or resignation of coaches and the lack of fan support. Lack of fan support is what got this snowball moving downhill. A change in coaches is what an athletic director hopes will stop it before it destroys an entire program.

I seriously doubt the change in coaches will result in any immediate noticeable differences on the field. A new coach can only do so much with the assistant coaches, players and playbook left by the former coach. He can encourage enthusiasm and hustle, as K-State interim head football coach Lee Moon has said he will, but seldom can he win games by his presence alone.

Travis is hoping that we, as K-State students and alumni, will come out and support our team regardless of whether or not we believe the change in coaches will lead to a change in performance on the field.

I support his efforts, and I hope this gamble pays off. If it doesn't, I'll be writing about losing teams at K-State for a long time to come.

Travis has been upfront with the students, alumni and media to this point, and I would hope he would continue to be in the future. Travis' handling of whether Dickey resigned, was asked to resign or was fired left a little to be desired from my point of view, however. I wish he and other athletic directors around the country would quit trying to pull the wool over the eyes of those fans whose support is so vital to their programs.

If athletic directors truly want to put fans in the stands, they should do what Travis said he would do upon taking the job last spring — communicate openly with the fans.

If Travis would have come to us in this situation with the truth, I believe we would have responded by showing our support for our University and our athletic director. He may have felt, however, that he couldn't wait for that to happen — the office he occupies has had somewhat of a revolving door the past several years and he probably didn't want to be the next one pushed through it.

By attempting to hide the truth from us, however, he may have made the same mistake many of his predecessors made — biting the hand that feeds him. For Travis' sake and for our own, let's hope he hasn't made the wrong decision.

Pirates' Tanner says he didn't warn Berra to avoid drug dealer

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Pittsburgh Pirates Manager Chuck Tanner testified Tuesday he never warned infielder Dale Berra to stay away from a man now accused of dealing cocaine to major league baseball players.

Tanner was the first defense witness in the U.S. District Court trial of Curtis Strong, 39, of Philadelphia, the former Phillies clubhouse caterer accused of 14 counts of dealing cocaine to ballplayers while the Pirates were at home from 1980 to 1984.

Meanwhile, former Pirates slugging star Willie Stargell was also requested to testify, but his attorney told defense attorney Adam O. Renfroe Jr. that Stargell would invoke his constitutional right against self-incrimination on any drug-related question, according to a source involved in the case who spoke only with anonymity.

Stargell, now the Pirates' first base coach, denied talking to anyone associated with Strong's defense.

Stargell, the Pirates' team captain when they won the World Series in 1979, was identified last week by several former Pirates as the source of amphetamines in the team's locker room while a player. Stargell denied the charges.

Stargell, unlike the seven players who have testified for the Justice Department in the Strong case, was not given a grant of immunity to testify.

Niekro to give 2nd try for victory milestone

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — As 46-year-old Phil Niekro continues his quest to become only the 18th major league pitcher to win 300 games, one question keeps coming up: "How'd you do it, Phil?"

How did this quiet, unassuming man come out of Ohio in 1959 and go on to pitch 22 big league seasons after spending over five years in the minors?

"I try to take good care of myself," said Niekro, who will go after No. 300 again tonight when his New York Yankees play the Detroit Tigers. "I know what I have to do. I'm pretty selective about what I do and don't do. I think that's helped some over the years."

Niekro, who failed in his first attempt to win his 300th against the Toronto Blue Jays last Friday, also credits an even disposition for much of his success. He always seems very low key.

"I'm known for that," Niekro said. "I don't get flustered very easily," he said. "I seldom get upset or anything like that.

"If I lose, I don't let it eat at me forever. It's not the end of the world or anything like that. The sun will still come up tomorrow and life will go on."

If Niekro succeeds against the Tigers, he will become the second pitcher this year to join the exclusive 300 club. Tom Seaver, the veteran Chicago White Sox right-hander, joined the select circle last month.

Another reason Niekro has been able to survive this long in a young man's game is that his bread-and-butter pitch is and always has been the knuckleball, a pitch that's easy on the arm and next to impossible to hit.

And, for that reason, Niekro knows he's probably a dying breed.

"Once I get out of the game, my brother, Joe, and Charlie Hough (of the Texas Rangers) are all that's left," Niekro said. "I haven't heard of any guys in the minors throwing a knuckleball."

Toss for tiebreaker games goes to Blue Jays, Royals

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Toronto Blue Jays and Kansas City Royals, respective current leaders of the American League East and West divisions, Tuesday won coin tosses to determine home sites for possible division tie playoffs.

American League President Bobby Brown first flipped a coin for the Eastern Division. Pat Gillick, the Blue Jays' executive vice president, called "heads" and won the home-park advantage in a possible playoff with the New York Yankees. The Yankees were represented by Woody Woodward, vice president of baseball administration.

A similar ceremony was conducted by conference phone calls with the Royals and California Angels, running one-two in the AL West.

Before the Blue Jays could meet the Yankees in a divisional playoff, they would have to play a strike-caused makeup game with Baltimore on Oct. 7.

Seattle beats KC, 7-0

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Phil Bradley drove in four runs with his 20th homer and a single and Matt Young pitched a seven-hitter as Seattle beat the Kansas City Royals 7-0 Tuesday night.

Young, 12-15, won for the fifth time in his last six starts as the Mariners' won their seventh game in eight meetings with the American League West division leaders.

Kansas City maintained its two-game lead over the California Angels, 5-2 losers to the Chicago White Sox.

Kansas City starter Steve Farr, 2-1, gave up four runs on four hits before being relieved by Mike Jones with one out in the fifth.

Drugs

The trial was recessed earlier than anticipated Tuesday after Renfroe failed to call St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Joaquin Andujar as a witness.

Andujar, previously linked to cocaine use in testimony by former Cardinals teammates Lonnie Smith and Keith Hernandez, was not called because the defense determined after meeting with him that he could be of little help, sources said.

The only baseball figure the defense is now likely to call is former Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn, the sources said.

Kuhn would be asked to detail what, if any, steps he took to alert law enforcement officials to an apparent drug problem within baseball or if Strong was ever identified to baseball officials as a cocaine source.

Kuhn's name has not previously been mentioned as a possible witness.

Tanner, on the witness stand for about a half hour, said one of his coaches once warned him in Philadelphia that "a short, fat guy was hanging around our hotel and people didn't think he was a good character."

"I didn't know anything about it," he said, "and I was a little irritated by this."

Tanner said he called Berra at a hotel bar and told him an "unsavory-looking character" was trying to meet Pirates players and that Berra should avoid him.

"I talked to Dale and told him to be careful, that there were a lot of people around and not to hang around with any of them," Tanner said. "He said, 'I'm OK, I'm just having a couple of beers.' I said, 'OK,' and I went to bed and went to sleep."

Tanner, rebutting Berra's testimony of last week, said he never warned Berra to stay away from Strong specifically.

"I didn't know Mr. Curtis Strong until seeing him on TV (after he was indicted)," Tanner said.

Howe released by Minnesota after missing weekend series

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Relief pitcher Steve Howe, who missed the Minnesota Twins' weekend series in Cleveland because of a recurrence of his cocaine addiction problems, requested and was granted his unconditional release, the Twins said Tuesday.

"Steve will devote his immediate full attention to complete recovery from his personal problems," the team said.

Howe, the 1980 National League Rookie of the Year with the Los Angeles Dodgers, was suspended for the 1984 season by former Commissioner Bowie Kuhn for violation of baseball's drug policies.

He was released by the Dodgers on July 3 after failing to report for a game for the fifth time since 1983. The Twins signed him Aug. 11, at which time Howe said Minnesota's relatively laid-back atmosphere would be better for his recovery.

Howe was unavailable for comment Tuesday. Tom Mee, the Twins' publicity director, said Howe requested that the Twins not release his unlisted telephone number.

Twins President Howard Fox said Howe's request came after a 1½-hour meeting with Dr. George Mann, the director of the Twins' employee assistance program.

"It was a decision that Steve made after his meeting with Dr. Mann," Fox said, adding that it was possible that Howe could one day return to baseball or even to the Twins.

He said it was highly unlikely that Howe would return this year.

"I get the idea that he's going to pursue recovering from his personal problems, and that will take time," Fox said.

Commissioner Peter Ueberroth had not made any ruling on Howe's status, Fox said.

Howe, 27, disappeared last Thursday after appearing on ABC-TV's "Nightline" show to discuss drug problems in sports. He asked team officials for permission to report late for Friday's doubleheader against the Indians due to an illness in his wife's family.

But family members reported that Howe never showed up and he missed doubleheaders on Friday and Saturday and a single game on Sunday. Twins Vice President Andy MacPhail said a disappointed Howe finally contacted him Sunday and returned to the Twin Cities on Monday.

Fox said Howe admitted to what he called a "temporary recurrence" of his cocaine addiction.

"I don't know anything that we could have done differently," Fox said. "I thought he was a fine young man. I thought he had a grasp on his problem. We had no warning."

Four faculty members enter design plans in competition

By TIM STRODA
Collegian Reporter

A team of four faculty members in the Department of Pre-Design Professions entered design plans in a limited competition in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, last spring.

The competition was to build an exhibition center for local Saudi Arabian industry, said Donald Watts, associate professor in pre-design professions.

The plans, submitted by team members Watts; Velizar Genov, assistant professor in interior architecture; Fayez Husseni, assistant professor in pre-design professions; and Carsten Jensen, assistant professor in architecture, were designs for a building project with a proposed budget of about $80 million.

"This project was bigger than anything any of the team members had ever worked on," Watts said.

The building includes 200 stalls for local industrial exhibits, a museum, an auditorium, an art gallery, a mosque, a cafeteria, administrative offices and capacity for 300 covered parking stalls, he said.

"It was a great opportunity to do a challenging major project."

The design team was formed and organized by Husseni after he was contacted by a former classmate who is now a partner in one of six Saudi Arabian architecture firms. The team members were invited by the Jeddah Chamber of Commerce to participate in the contest, Watts said.

The University team had about a month to design the building and prepare their presentation, he said.

Because of the project's size and complexity, knowledge of Saudi Arabian urban design was an important consideration for developing the design, Watts said. Additionally, it was important for the sponsors to recognize traditional Saudi Arabian values while providing a modern exhibition complex, he said.

"We tried to reflect the importance the Saudi's are putting on the long-term goals of all their industrialization," Watts said. "We hoped the judges would see their idea of a modern Saudi building when they looked at our presentation."

Genov said there are strong social traditions in how the Saudi Arabian people live so the team tried to design a building that would fit the traditions of the Saudi Arabian nation.

"We didn't design according to normal (western) procedures," Genov said. "Our building tries to connect the history and culture of the area."

The size of the building, the time limitation and instilling an area's culture into a project was a great experience for the team members, he said.

Being picked by the Jeddah Chamber of Commerce as the winner of the contest would mean getting to work on the actual project, which may include trips to Saudi Arabia to serve as consultants, he said.

The winner of the contest hasn't been decided and no date has been set for the announcement, Watts said.

"Our intention was to make a design proposal which would make a very strong impact on the person viewing it. We hope it works," he said.

The team's investment in the project was the time element involved and the Saudi Arabian firm took care of the expenses.

Reagan opposes import restraints, calls legislation 'economic disaster'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan voiced sharp opposition Tuesday toward legislation to impose restraints on imports, warning that a "mindless stampede toward protectionism will be a one-way trip toward economic disaster."

Reagan, at a nationally televised news conference, reiterated his support for "free and fair trade for all" hours after his top trade official, Clayton Yeutter, vowed major market-opening results from the president's new trade initiatives and dismissed as "defeatest in nature" a major Democratic proposal for a tax on imports.

Reagan downplayed the significance of the nation's trade imbalance, inching toward $150 billion. He said the deficit had been accompanied by a "great recovery, the greatest one we've known in years."

He cited "33 straight months of growth and more than eight million new jobs."

And while about 1.6 million jobs had been lost in import-beleagured U.S. manufucturing industries, he said these were more than offset by an increase in jobs in service and travel-related industries.

He declared that free trade could lead to a "decade of growth" and the creation of 10 million new jobs. "Opportunity is our engine of progress," he said.

Earlier, administration and congressional officials indicated Reagan was shying away from proposing major new legislation in his upcoming trade package.

Instead, Reagan will call for beefed-up enforcement of existing laws and may lend his support to certain selected but as yet unspecified pieces of legislation now pending in Congress, the officials said.

Reagan reiterated his commitment to moving against unfair trading practices in other nations that erect barriers to the sale of U.S. products abroad.

investigation on suspicion of spying.

Her 59-year-old husband worked in the Naumann Foundation, which is closely tied to the junior party in Kohl's coalition government, and had once been a member of East Germany's Communist Party, Rebmann said.

Bonn security officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Willner had been under suspicion for some time.

In resignation letters sent to their respective employers, the couple said they had fled to East Germany, Rebmann said.

Axel Wernitz, an opposition Social Democrat and chairman of the Parliament's Interior Committee, said the latest case would cause "considerable damage" to West Germany.

Deputy government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff said Willner's defection marked the first spy case to hit the chancellor's office since the Brandt government fell.

In 1974, the popular Social Democrat was forced to resign when it was revealed that a ranking chancellory aide, Guenter Guillaume, was an East German spy.

The Willners were the fifth and sixth suspected spies who have fled from West Germany to East Germany in the past six weeks.

Hans-Joachim Tiedge, who was one of Bonn's highest-ranking counter-espionage agents, fled on Aug. 19.

Hans-Juergen Foerster, a spokesman for the prosecutor's office, confirmed that Tiedge, who was responsible for Bonn's counter-intelligence operations against East Germany, had worked on the Willner case.

Willner failed to report to work in the internal political section on Monday, following a vacation in Spain that started Aug. 12, Foerster said.

Rebmann identified Willner as a former member of the Waffen SS, a Nazi military unit during World War II. He was held by the Soviet Union as a prisoner of war, became a Communist Party member after settling in East Germany in 1949 and moved to West Germany in 1961.

toward having the government retaliate against countries which close their doors to imports of American-made telephone equipment.

Reagan also defended his policies toward South Africa's white-ruled government, saying, "I think that when you're standing up against a cellophane wall and you're getting shot at from both sides you must be doing something right. If it had all come from one direction, I would looked again and said, 'Well, did I miss something here.'"

Reagan said he "must be pretty near the middle" if some critics say he should do more while others say he has done too much toward ending the apartheid system in South Africa. The president last week imposed economic sanctions against Pretoria.

The question-and-answer session with reporters, televised live from the East Room at the White House, was the 31st of Reagan's presidency and the fourth since his second term began in January.

General Assembly opens session

U.N. budget faces reduction

By The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The General Assembly opened its 40th session Tuesday and the most pervasive issue, although not yet on the agenda, was the U.S. effort to make the world body mend its free-spending ways.

The United States threatens to reduce its share of the total U.N. budget from 25 percent to 20 percent unless weighted voting is introduced for money matters. That system would give the major Western allies control of fiscal policy.

The session was gaveled to order by outgoing Assembly President Paul Lusaka of Zambia.

Spanish diplomat Jaime de Pinies was chosen by acclamation to replace Lusaka and serve as president of the 40th General Assembly. More than 90 visiting heads of state and government are expected to address the session, including President Reagan and Libya's Moammar Khadafy.

Reagan will be here Oct. 23-24 for a commemoration of the date the U.N. charter came into force, Oct. 24, 1945.

Lusaka said he strongly opposed changing the current voting system, which gives each of the 159 assembly members one vote regardless of how much it contributes to the budget.

He said the U.N. charter specifically granted equality to each member, and weighted voting would require a change in the charter.

The only veto power now lies with the five permanent members of the Security Council — the United States, Soviet Union, China, Britain and France.

Congress passed a bill last month, which Reagan signed, requiring that the U.S. contribution be limited to 20 percent of the U.N. budget unless weighted voting on fiscal matters is introduced by next year.

The United States, the largest contributor, now pays 25 percent of the U.N. budget, or nearly $200 million this year.

If the charter were changed and each country's voting power reflected its contribution, the United States, Japan, West Germany and France could control U.N. spending because together they provide more than half the budget.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., sponsored the bill, claiming there is too much fat in the U.N. bureacracy.

Water

Mike Pollack, a mechanical engineer with Black and Veatch Consulting Engineers in Kansas City, Kan., said typical chilled water systems consist of water circulated through a refrigeration system at a main plant, then sent through pipes to individual units where a fan forces air across cooling coils creating the air conditioning.

Watson agreed with Cool that age was probably not a factor in the failure of the pipe. Cool said settlement might have something to do with the failure and the cast-iron pipes which make up the system usually last for 100 years.

Cool said the campus system has about 50 pounds per square inch while the city system, which has sections more than 100 years old, has an average pressure of about 85 pounds per square inch.

Congressional leaders agree to delay decision about tax-reform plan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders agreed Wednesday that they will not be able to deliver tax overhaul legislation to President Reagan's desk this year, as he wanted.

"I don't think it has any chance of getting through Congress this year," House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., said after a private meeting with Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan., and other top leaders from both sides of the Capitol to discuss the legislative agenda for the remainder of the year.

Earlier in the day, Dole repeated to reporters his view that "I don't see how we can finish it this year."

The comments came as Reagan appealed for support of tax reform in a speech in Concord, N.H.

O'Neill emphasized that the House still plans to take up the measure this year.

"Are we trying to put it through the House? The answer is yes," O'Neill said. But, he added, "It's taken us this long and it'll take the Senate some time, too, I would imagine."

O'Neill said, "We've agreed that we're going to be out of here before Thanksgiving" for the year. That means there would be no time on the congressional calendar for passage of the tax measure.

Construction to begin on ionic research lab

By The Collegian Staff

Ground-breaking ceremonies for the expansion of the James R. Macdonald Laboratory took place Wednesday morning. Construction on the building north of Cardwell Hall will begin next week.

The $6.19 million structure will house research facilities for the study of ionic collision and will be the only one of its capability in the nation. The machine will be capable of removing electrons with the new cryebis ion source.

The cryebis ion source is a device for removing electrons from atoms by electron bombardment in a strong magnetic field, said Patrick Richard, professor of physics.

Ionic collision occurs when an atom is shot at a target atom forcing the two to collide. This allows researchers to see how an atom reacts to the collision and what the interior structure of the atom looks like, Richard said.

"I am really thrilled about this expansion. It's a great opportunity for the faculty and students here at K-State," said President Duane Acker at the ground-breaking ceremony.

"It's wonderful the confidence that the Department of Energy has in our facilities. When we had our meeting with them earlier and they found out that the Kansas Legislature had approved the sponsoring of $1.09 million to the project, they revised their proposal from $3.5 to $5.0 million to construct the laboratory in the best way possible," he said.

The addition of the facility could mean about a $1 million increase in funds for future research projects in the lab. It will also mean more opportunities in the area of research for the graduate and undergraduate students, Acker said.

"It's a great statement for the department (of physics) to have the Department of Energy say that our facilities are the best to be found and that they want to keep K-State No. 1 in this field of ionic collision," said Provost Owen Koeppe.

The building should be completed by early spring, however, if good weather continues, it may be completed by late winter, Acker said.

Weir free, but Reagan not pleased

By The Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. — The Rev. Benjamin Weir is free after a 16-month kidnapping ordeal in Lebanon, but President Reagan said Wednesday that he "will not be satisfied" until the six remaining American captives also are released.

Weir was released to U.S. authorities in Beirut on Saturday, but an announcement was withheld to determine whether the release of the other Americans might also be obtained.

See related story Page 7

"We were trying to keep it so quiet because we don't want to do anything that endangers the chances of the other six," Reagan said at the conclusion of a speech promoting his tax reform proposal.

But White House spokesman Edward Djerejian, briefing the press after Reagan's speech, said it became apparent Tuesday night that no more releases were "imminent."

Unconfirmed reports about Weir's release surfaced Saturday with an anonymous telephone call to the Reuters news agency. The Presbyterian Church said early Wednesday that Weir had been freed. Soon afterward, Reagan supplied the official confirmation that Weir was "back in America, safe with his family."

"I am happy for him and his family," the president said, "but I will not be satisfied and will not cease our efforts until all the hostages, the other six, are released."

Later, as he boarded Air Force One to return to Washington, Reagan held up six fingers and told reporters, "Six more to go."

Weir, 61, a Presbyterian minister, was kidnapped by terrorists May 8, 1984, in Beirut.

Neither Reagan nor Djerejian offered any details about his release.

Djerejian said Weir was in Norfolk. Va., but that he was not hospitalized. Doctors described him

SEA forum details proposals

Speakers suggest uses for $700,000

By MARK MCDERMET
Collegian Reporter

Ideas for the use of $700,000 students will receive from the refinancing of bonds for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum was the topic of discussion at an open forum sponsored by Students for Educational Awareness Wednesday in the Union Big Eight room. Approximately 35 people attended the forum.

The $700,000 has been appropriated for students this semester due to a new Internal Revenue Service regulation. It allows the University to refinance approximately $4.5 million in outstanding student-financed bonds from Union Annex I and II, KSU Football Stadium and Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, proposed using $250,000 to construct a rare book room and a student study area in Room 315 in Farrell Library.

Gretchen Holden, coordinator of Services for Students with Physical Limitations, said she would like to see $150,000 used to make Anderson Hall accessible for handicapped students by constructing an elevator in the southwest corner of Anderson.

A campus mass transit system was proposed by Gordon Derr, instructor in civil engineering. Derr proposed a trial basis during the spring semester 1986 for the system. He said the trial basis would cost approximately $95,000.

Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications and director of KSDB-FM, proposed using the money to set up facilities and equipment to utilize the transmission tower KSDB is receiving from a private donor.

Buller said the money would also pay for engineering studies necessary to comply with Federal Communication Commission requirements.

Charles Beckom, University police chief, discussed using the funds to improve campus security. Beckom suggested buying emergency phones to be placed on campus and incorporating a computerized system

Britain stops trading of ostracized Soviets

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Britain called a halt Wednesday to the exchange of diplomatic expulsions that began when the KGB's top agent in London defected. The end came after the Soviet Union ordered six more Britons out, making the score 31-31.

The Kremlin, in its first major diplomatic imbroglio since Mikhail S. Gorbachev assumed power March 11, took the unusual decision to retaliate in equal numbers to Britain's expulsion of 25 alleged Soviet spies last Thursday and six more on Monday.

The Foreign Office said after Moscow completed the second round Wednesday that it would not evict any more Soviets, insisting that it had not backed down and that Britain had come out ahead.

In Moscow, the official news agency Tass said Ambassador Bryan Cartledge was summoned to the Foreign Ministry Wednesday morning and told that the Soviet Union expected Britain to stop its "unfriendly actions."

Unhappy property owners join forces for fair prices

By COLLEEN WILSON
Staff Writer

A group of business and property owners who are displeased with offers they have received from the city for property facing acquisition for the downtown mall have joined forces to create the Committee for Just Compensation.

"Our main goal is to get equitable treatment for everyone who isn't satisfied (with the offer for their property)," said Ruth Schrum, 720 Midland Ave. Schrum is serving as the committee's chairperson and is owner of the building housing Lady Foot Shoes, 221 Poyntz Ave.

Schrum said she believes in the philosophy of strength in numbers, which prompted her to approach other affected property owners.

She said there was a "unanimous feeling" among the approximately 25 business and property owners present in a meeting of the committee at Schrum's house Friday evening, that "no one felt they were offered a fair price for their property.

"We feel there is an uneven scale of values being offered," Schrum said. "The city keeps saying that their offers are fair but we don't agree. To me it's the big business fighting the small."

Schrum said the group was able to talk together, share ideas and is trying to Strike delays construction of tanks

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Five thousand hourly workers walked off their jobs Wednesday at General Dynamics Corp. plants in three states, virtually halting construction of the M1 and M1A1 tanks for the Army, officials said.

The strike began Wednesday afternoon at the company's largest tank assembly plant, at Lima, Ohio, and at operations in Scranton, Pa., and in the Detroit suburbs of Warren, Sterling Heights and Center Line, said United Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp.

"This means that all negotiations have ended," Stepp said. "We told the corporation that the union stands ready to meet."

Stepp said the council representing locals covering blue-collar employees at the five General Dynamics Land Systems division plants rejected his recommendation that union members be allowed to vote on a tentative contract agreement reached last weekend.

General Dynamics spokesman William Sheil read a statement saying the giant defense contractor was "very disappointed" that the pact "is not being recommended by the council for a membership vote." Production of the Army's M1 tank and its new derivative, the M1A1, would virtually cease with supervisors doing some work, he said.

Workers at the Lima plant, which has 2,400 hourly employees, staged a wildcat strike Monday but returned to work later that day.

The council wants wage parity with Chrysler Corp. workers, cost of living allowances similar to those of UAW-represented auto workers and better health, safety and pension provisions than contained in the pact announced Sunday, Stepp said.

Chrysler sold the Land Systems division to General Dynamics in 1982 to raise cash when the automaker was struggling to stave off bankruptcy.

The average Chrysler worker is paid $13.23 an hour. Information provided to its employees by General Dynamics showed their wages in June ranging from $7.49 to $11.50 per hour.

In addition to the Lima plant, tanks also are built at the Warren facility, where 1,600 UAW members are affected by the strike.

The walkout also affects 480 UAW workers at a machining plant in Scranton, Pa.

Reagan announces U.N. nominees

UNITED NATIONS — President Reagan has nominated nine people to represent the United States at the 40th session of the General Assembly, a U.S. spokeswoman said Wednesday. The team again is headed by Ambassador Vernon Walters.

Other delegates include Walters' deputy, career diplomat Herbert Okun; Reps. B.H. Solomon, R-N.Y., and Daniel A. Mica, D-Fla; and John Davis Lodge, former ambassador to Switzerland, spokeswoman Irene Payne said.

Solomon and Mica will continue to serve in Congress if the Senate confirms their nominations.

Payne said Reagan nominated four alternates: Robinson Risner, a retired Air Force brigadier general from Texas; Joseph Verner Reed, former ambassador to Morocco; Patricia M. Byrne, former ambassador to Mali; and Hugh Montgomery, a former CIA official and director of the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

Reed, Ms. Byrne and Montgomery will hold the rank of ambassadors with the U.S. mission at the United Nations.

The representatives will serve on various committees, deliver foreign policy addresses, speak to visiting foreign delegations and vote in the U.N. General Assembly during the three-month session.

Former Boy Scout still prepared

NEWENT, England — Frederick Cooper, 85, knew what to do when his ladder fell and he found himself stuck high up in the tree he was pruning.

He pulled a cordless telephone from his pocket and called the fire brigade. But they didn't believe him.

So, after waiting half an hour he called the police. They sent two men to get him down.

When asked how he happened to have a cordless phone with him at the top of a tree, Cooper replied: "I was a Boy Scout when I was younger."

The Scouts' motto is "Be Prepared."

Iacocca will not enter politics

ST. CLAIR BEACH, Ontario — Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca has delivered another emphatic "no" to the notion that he will run for president of the United States.

"No! Any other questions?" Iacocca replied Tuesday night when asked if he would accept a draft for a presidential nomination.

"I don't want to sound selfish. I'd pitch in. I would help out. But I'm not a political animal and I don't want to be in the political world," he said in a speech to Canadian and U.S. journalists.

He did not say how he would help out.

Iacocca, as the nation's best-known business leader and a persistent critic of Reagan administration economic policies, was mentioned as a possible Democratic presidential or vice presidential candidate in 1984.

Former prisoner talks of suicide

CHICAGO — Gary Dotson felt like committing suicide last spring after a judge ordered him back to prison despite testimony by his alleged victim that she had lied when she said he raped her, his mother says.

"Prison authorities announced that Gary was being moved because he was now a celebrity and they needed to protect him from other inmates," said Barbara Dotson of suburban Country Club Hills in an interview in the October issue of Redbook magazine. "But they told me that he also needed to be protected from himself.

"Prison counselors had asked him if he felt like committing suicide and Gary had said yes."

Dotson, 28, was serving a 25- to 50-year sentence when Cathleen Crowell Webb, 23, said she had lied because she feared becoming pregnant by her teen-age boyfriend.

Gov. James R. Thompson commuted Dotson's prison term to the six years he had served.

Governor observes border patrol

DENVER — Gov. Richard D. Lamm, a strong proponent of tougher immigration laws, went riding with U.S. Border Patrol agents as they rounded up hundreds of Mexican aliens south of San Diego.

A spokesman for the Immigration and Naturalization Service said Tuesday that Lamm was working as a television reporter during the Sunday ride.

"I thought they (agents) did a terrific job, polite and firm, but fair," Lamm said Tuesday through his press office.

Pentagon official denies deficit link

WASHINGTON — A top Pentagon official said Wednesday the nation's security was being jeopardized by politicians who complain about the national deficit, but who don't have the will to control domestic spending.

Deputy Defense Secretary William H. Taft, the No. 2 man in the Pentagon's hierarchy, said the American public has been "seriously misled" by efforts to link defense spending and the deficit.

Congress has promised to cut the deficit by cutting the Pentagon's budget, "but the fact is that they haven't done it," he said. "Congress has used every penny of the $66 billion it has cut out of defense outlays for 1985 and 1986 in the last 18 months, and $31 billion more besides, to fund increases in other programs and cover underestimates in its budget calculations."

Taft disclosed a list of weapon programs that he said were being cut below the levels considered necessary under the guise of cutting the deficit.

"This is not fat that has been cut," Taft said. "This is muscle — this is capability."

The list includes reduced purchases of helicopters, armored personnel carriers, air-defense and air-to-air missiles and Aegis cruisers and attack submarines. The Pentagon is also trimming significantly its plans to increase active-duty strength, Taft said.

Farmers net income may be rising

WASHINGTON — A revised forecast by the Agriculture Department showed Wednesday that net farm income could edge up slightly from a previous estimate but still be far short of last year.

The department's Economic Research Service said 1985 net farm income could be in the range of $23 billion to $27 billion. That was $1 billion more than the $22 billion to $26 billion agency forecast a month ago.

Last year, mainly because of a large rise in the value of crop inventories, net farm income jumped to $34.6 billion from $15.8 billion in 1983, when crop production was cut sharply by drought and government acreage programs.

Retail food prices are expected to average 2 percent to 3 percent higher this year, compared with a 3.8 percent gain in 1984. That represented a slight reduction in the earlier food price forecast of a 2 percent to 4 percent rise.

8 protesters make appeal to judge

LAWRENCE — Eight people convicted of trespassing during anti-apartheid demonstration at the University of Kansas appealed the convictions to Douglas County District Court on Wednesday.

The eight were convicted of criminal trespass following May 3 and May 9 demonstrations at the University of Kansas Endowment Association to protest the association's investments in companies which do business in racially segregated South Africa.

The eight were convicted July 31 and sentenced Aug. 13 to $50 fines, half of which was suspended, and ordered to pay $5 in court costs.

Sixty-five people in all were arrested during the demonstrations. Thirty were convicted, seven were acquitted, 21 pleaded no contest, five entered a diversion program and two still face trial.

Lobbyists increase funding efforts

TOPEKA — Lobbyists spend $9,024 to influence Kansas lawmakers in August, an increase of about $3,800 over the July total, according to a monthly report released Wednesday to the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission.

Utility lobbying groups accounted for about $3,360 of the total and spent more than twice as much as Education lobbyists, the second-highest spenders during August.

About $8,815 of the August total went for food and drink, according to the report. Gifts amounted to $128 and $80 was reported as "other" expenditures.

The August expenditures, which were about $4,800 more than for the same month in 1984, brought total lobbyist spending for the first eight months of 1985 to $384,750. The 1985 figure is about $92,524 or

Elephant doing well after injury

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Penny, a 6,000-pound elephant at the Kansas City Zoo, reached through a hydraulic gate for an apple and the gate slammed shut, cutting off 10 inches of her trunk, zoo official said Wednesday.

"She is doing great, as well as can be expected. She has been allowing handlers to feed her," Rich Block, director of the zoo's public relations, said Wednesday.

He said handlers will hand-feed her about 150 pounds of hay each day and give her water from a hose until the trunk has healed.

Nelson outlines FarmAid funding plan

By The Associated Press

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Willie Nelson outlined a five-point FarmAid spending plan Wednesday that would provide counseling and cash for financially troubled farmers — and spread the word about their plight.

Nelson, the driving force behind the star-studded FarmAid benefit concert here Sunday, set aside no funds for lobbying Congress on farm legislation, according to a release from his office near Austin, Texas.

Nelson said he believes the millions of dollars expected from the all-day event and related fund-raising efforts should be used for:

— Direct cash payments to needy farmers.

— Legal assistance.

— "Transitional" help, such as counseling and job placement, for those who have lost their farms or risk losing them.

— A nationwide hotline to direct farmers to service agencies best able to help them.

— Improving public awareness of the financial plight of many U.S. family farmers.

Nelson had indicated earlier that some FarmAid money might be used to lobby Congress for enactment of one version of the hotly disputed 1985 farm bill that would call for a referendum on federally mandated crop reduction.

"Farmers need it desperately. They have to have it to survive," Nelson said Sept. 5 after a meeting here with farmers.

The idea immediately drew fire from the American Farm Bureau, and Nelson's decision to drop it was hailed by spokesman Dennis Vercler of the Illinois Farm Bureau.

"Hallelujah! We were worried about any money being spent on any lobbying on any of the various competing farm bills," Vercler said, adding he believes people contributing to FarmAid would have opposed political use of the funds.

Nelson will do some personal lobbying, however.

He, Mellencamp and Young were to meet Thursday behind closed doors with members of the Senate Agriculture Committee to discuss farm problems and ways to distribute concert proceeds, the committee announced Wednesday.

The nearly 80,000 tickets for the concert were sold out in three days. The Nashville Network is televising 12 hours of the concert to cable subscribers and has syndicated a three-hour segment to more than 100 television stations, including superstation WGN-TV of Chicago.

FarmAid already has drawn at least $1.8 million in corporate donations, an aide to Illinois Gov. James R. Thompson said Wednesday.

Jim Skilbeck, the governor's special events coordinator, said Campbell Soup Inc. and Chevrolet Motors each had pledged $500,000, while Miller Brewing Co. had pledged $300,000; Sears, Roebuck and Co., $225,000; and Quaker Oats Co., Fram Oil Filters Co. and Duracell Co., $100,000 each.

Much of the material, time and manpower involved in putting the concert together has been donated — including all the performances.

Here is a list of the 50 performers scheduled to appear at the Sept. 22 FarmAid agriculture benefit concert, released by publicists:

Alabama, John Anderson, the Beach Boys, the Blasters, Jimmy Buffett, Glen Campbell, David Allen Coe, John Conlee, Ry Cooder, Lacy J. Dalton, Charlie Daniels Band, John Denver, Bob Dylan, John Fogarty, Verne Gosdin, Sammy Hagar, Merle Haggard, Daryl Hall, Don Henley.

Developmental series dissects relationships

By The Collegian Staff

The Center for Student Development is sponsoring "Enhancing Relationships," an eight-part series, beginning today and continuing through Nov. 7.

Those in the program discuss problems in relationships and receive feedback, said Cliff Schuette, assistant director of the Counseling Center and leader of the group. His co-leader is Laura Hill, graduate in education and graduate assistant at the center.

"It's not a therapy group; it's more of an educational one," Schuette said. "We're not trying to change personalities, just help."

Groups will consist of friends, boyfriends, girlfriends, roommates and married couples involved in relationships, Schuette said.

He said there is no set organization of topics, but the sessions will cover problems such as listening, dealing with conflict and expressing emotions to another person.

"Some people may want to talk about love or being in love, so then we might try to focus on that topic for one session," he said.

"We put everyone (singles, married, older, younger) together because diversity can be educational — they can learn from others' experiences," Schuette said. "We try to capitalize on that diversity for communication between the group."

Schuette said his experiences with groups in the past have been positive because everyone is more "safe" in a group and more likely to speak up.

"The focus is on students because this is the time in life for improving and learning about relationships, intimacy and communicating," Schuette said.

Bill would eliminate 'hobby farmers'

Helms proposes cut in farm supports

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Jesse Helms, R-N.C., proposed $9 billion worth of savings in the emerging new farm bill Wednesday, including a 20 percent across-the-board cut in farm income supports.

He also argued benefits should be targeted to the farmers most in need of financial help, and that those who are well off or do not depend on farming for their livelihood should be excluded from direct subsidy programs.

"Despite the difficult economic conditions in the agricultural sector, there is immense wealth in the sector, and most of the payments in our farm programs end up going to farmers with very large net equity and income," Helms said.

Helms aides indicated that if the move to cut income support payments fails, he would propose ways of cutting so-called "hobby farmers" and large, wealthy producers out of the subsidy programs — in effect, putting farm programs under a "needs test" much like eligibility standards for welfare.

The Senate panel has been working for months on a new long-term farm bill to replace the law that expires at the end of this month. It has worked out most of the details of a new bill, but the measure exceeds congressional spending guidelines by some $9 billion over the next three years.

In a meeting Tuesday with Republican congressional leaders at the White House, President Reagan reiterated his unwillingness to sign any legislation that exceeds the three-year, $39 billion budget target for farm and farm credit programs.

Topping the list of proposed cuts was a reduction in the proportion of each farmer's cropland that would be eligible for income supports, known as "deficiency payments" because they make up the difference between what a farmer gets when he sells his crops and a set target price.

Instead of paying the farmer based on his entire production, the subsidy would apply only to the portion of national output of wheat, corn, cotton and rice needed to meet domestic and export needs and provide an adequate reserve.

Student Senate to vote on funds, committee

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will vote on legislation establishing the Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee and a resolution for campus United Way fund-raising activities at 7 tonight in the Union Big Eight room.

The ad hoc committee bill calls for a committee of five student senators and three at-large students to review proposals for the allocation of $700,000, made available through the refinancing of the current student debt. The legislation is sponsored by Senate Executive Committee.

The United Way resolution calls for senate's support of United Way fund-raising activities on campus. The legislation is sponsored by Sandi Schmidt, senior in political science and State and Community Affairs chairperson. Schmidt is also the chairperson for the campus United Way activities.

Senate will also hear a presentation from Sally Traeger, senior in marketing, about the National Organization of Students Against Multiple Sclerosis. Traeger attended a five- day conference sponsored by the organization in Miami, Fla.

Traeger will explain what multiple sclerosis is and how it affects people. She will also discuss what the organization is and its fund-raising events planned for February 1986.

History honor society receives chapter award

By The Collegian Staff

For the second consecutive year, the history honor society, Phi Alpha Theta, has received the best chapter award in its division.

The winners are given $250 from the International Society in Allentown, Pa., in the form of credit which the honor society uses to purchase books.

Best chapter award is given to the chapter in each division that contributes the most time, effort and service toward the organization. Last year, Pi Alpha Theta donated $500 to Farrell Library to buy needed books. The society also donated this year's award to the library.

"It is unusual to win the award twice," said Brenda Martin, graduate in geography and president of Pi Alpha Theta.

Pi Alpha Theta is a national honor fraternity. Different divisions of chapters are determined by enrollment size of universities.

"K-State is in the top division with 15,000-plus students," said Marsha Frey, the organization's adviser and professor of history.

The chapter this year consists of approximately 30 faculty and students.

Comparison of Chrysler, farmers absurd

LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

There's something ridiculously wrong when farmers and starving people become the cause for "-aid" concerts. These are charity events for people on different sides of the world with one basic problem — food.

Comparisons of Lee Iacocca's bailout of the Chrysler Corporation and the plight of the American farmer has me fuming.

Yes, Iacocca should be commended after bringing his company up from depths of despair that would make raising the Titanic look simple.

In the true spirit of democracy, Iacocca had to deal with the politics, embargos and foreign trade. And Iacocca repaid his debt. He was a good soldier — a happy camper of sorts.

My question is, could Iacocca's Chrysler harvest wheat?

Could Iacocca's car feed Ethiopians, give senior citizens nutritious foods or teach children about the beauty of a sunset?

Farmers are in a desperate situation. Politics, embargos and foreign trade have had a negative impact on farmers as well.

But, food? Must we use food as a weapon? Food fights, whatever their origin, are ridiculous. Hungry people are not the solution to our political problems.

Yes, Americans have enough food now and the price is right. We could never imagine being without enough food — just as we never anticipated the gasoline shortage in the '70s. But let's ask the ultimate question.

Just what, exactly, is the backbone of the United States?

Those who favor Iacocca's philosophy might expect corporate farmers to eliminate competitors who could not operate a profitable business. Thus the backbone of the United States would be business — a dog-eat-dog world.

The worst part is with corporate farming prices, we might all be eating dog meat.

However unrealistic, I believe the American farmer is the backbone of the United States. Agriculture allows men and women to purchase a tract of the "land of the free" — and walk on it. Farmers harvest with pride the fruits of America.

To picture a farmer pulling a plow for someone else angers me. I cannot help but think about the struggle of American Indians to keep their land.

Pushing farmers off their land might be more difficult these days. Somehow I would not feel sorry for the three-piece-suit executive coming to take a farm and being met by unsubmitting farmers pointing not bows and arrows, but automatic weapons.

This is not an unrealistic scene. If a conflict occurs there would be no good soldiers — no happy campers.

No one in this country should be trapped like the farmers are now. Despite budget constraints, the federal government has bailed farmers out before. The budget debt is no reason to cripple the agricultural community — the backbone of our nation.

A challenge to own the land of the free is facing every farmer still trying to hold his ground. To see the faces of these men, once proud of their profession and now downtrodden with grief, is not a pretty sight.

A nation based on the principles of liberty cannot withstand a blow that would cripple its backbone. Abandoning these farmers now would put the entire nation on a highwire — one I'm not sure would leave the nation with a net below.

For those who like the Iacocca synopsis, you can take your Chrysler out on a Sunday drive — and walk on it.

And maybe while we're giving the lady in New York Harbor a facelift, you would have us consider changing the image a bit to resemble Iacocca.

Who knows, a few pails of debt bailed out of the sinking American dream now might keep us all afloat later.

Trading spies child's game

The current rhetorical arguments going on between the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom are almost funny, until the implications are considered.

The global intelligence community has seen a great deal of change in recent months. With multiple evictions from many nations, daily defections from the highest ranks of the secret services, convictions of espionage in U.S. military forces and almost hysterical charges about accidental invasions and international fender-benders, there is a new sense of awareness about the goings-on of spies.

James Bond is a myth. The real intelligence operative almost never carries a gun, certainly never runs around with beautiful enemy spies (known in the business as a "honey trap") and is probably no more glamorous than the average civil servant.

But what they do keeps their nations safe at night and in the rat race by day. Spies ferret out little bits and pieces of information that together often comprise all we know of our enemies and our friends.

Still, it seems almost silly to be evicting each others' diplomats and correspondents as fast as they can be located simply because the other guy did. This sort of thing escalates into the end of diplomatic relationships and the beginnings of a new hot spot in the cold war. That is dangerous, too dangerous to risk in the name of getting even.

If the people the British and the Soviets are evicting really are spies, then not only are they increasing the risk of false or misinterpreted news being accepted as gospel, but they are really only scratching the surface.

"Moles," the deep-cover operatives, are the backbone of intelligence services. It's doubtful that the moles are being evicted. What is more likely is that there are innocent diplomats and journalists being given the bums' rush in the name of national security.

This can have disastrous implications, not the least of which is the end of the reconciliations that increased knowledge about "the other guy" can bring.

Surely Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States have better things to do with their intelligence services than play international bouncer.

Short-term aid no answer

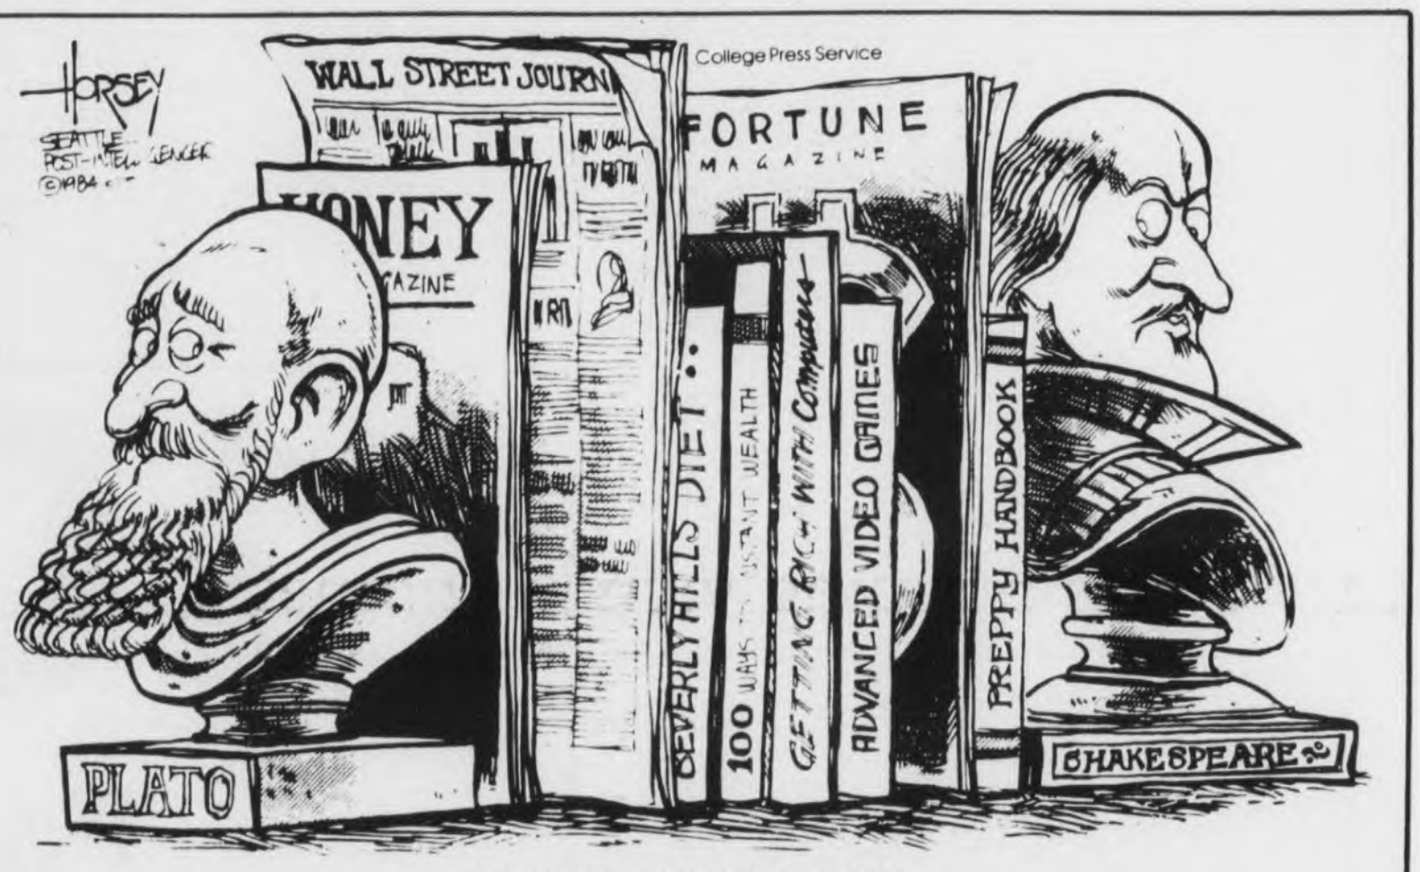
Congress must decide how long and to what extent federal subsidies to the American farmer will be allowed to continue.

Central to the issue is whether the federal government should bail out the Farm Credit System, a consortium of borrower-owned financial organizations.

Of the $212 billion owed by farmers nationwide, about $74 billion is owed to FCS. At least $11.1 billion of the funds owed to FCS is classified as uncollectable.

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., has said if the FCS was forced to absorb the loss, it could result in the bankruptcy of the Farm Credit Association, which includes the FCS — not to mention the banks that also might be declared insolvent.

What would a bail out by the federal government achieve? Would it save the individual, family farmer? Or would it merely delay the demise of family farming as we know it and enhance the opportunities of large-scale corporate farmers throughout the nation?



Running a productive farm is a business, comparable in scope and importance to any manufacturing enterprise. While farmers are adversely affected by economic fluctuations outside their control, delaying the inevitable may not be the best route.

The choice is not easy. It is, for all practical purposes, a choice between the continuation of agricultural subsidies or a drastic reduction in federal aid to agriculture. There is no crystal ball to view the effect of discontinuing subsidies.

We must realize that many problems faced by farmers, such as high interest rates, low land values and presidential embargoes, are not caused by their inability to manage a business. And when the crumbling of the rural economy and long-standing tradition is considered, federal assistance to farmers may be necessary.

This will not provide a lasting solution, however. To believe otherwise is a cruel deception.

COLLEGE READING LIST

Rebates, reallocation, and coach rehiring

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

I'm not sure I know all the reasons why, but it seems to me I should be getting a rebate in the mail from the University any day now.

Due to bond refinancing, the students now have $700,000 which they may spend however they wish.

It also is becoming apparent that the $1.9 million already collected from the students for the proposed 'Big Barn' may also become available for reallocation if the project is scrapped.

Having been blessed with a sharp mind for numbers — and a Sharp calculator — I punched in 700,000 and added 1.9 million and came up with 2.6 million. I then divided it by 16,000, the approximate number of students at K-State, and got a grand total of $162.50, or approximately 800 percent of what my bank account now reads, which could be refunded to each and every student.

What would I do with the money? With $162.50 I could probably buy the four remaining textbooks I need at the Union Bookstore. I could make 650 withdrawals from the ZIP machine and be able to pay the service charge. I could buy 275 Mr. T air fresheners and smell like Mr. T for the rest of my life. The options are endless.

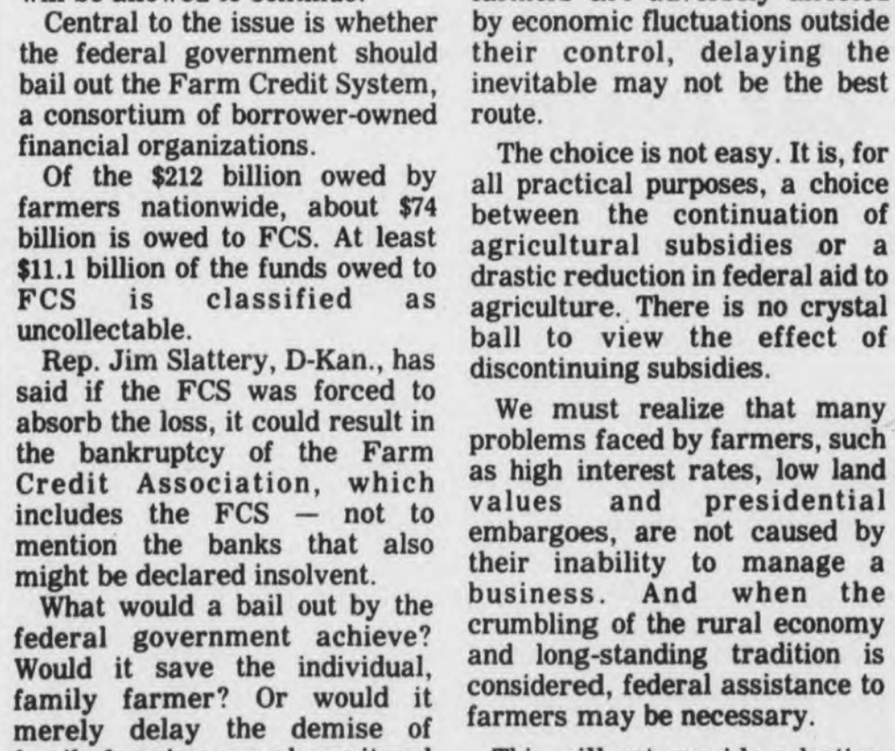
Now before everyone gets too excited and begins thinking of ways to spend their rebates, I don't think the University will be sending us checks in the mail. The key phrase attached to the money is "reallocated to retire existing bonds," which actually means, "students will have little say in the matter." But just in case they do ask me, I do have a few ideas.

My first impulse is simply to give the money to the KSU Police Department so they may better deal with illegally parked cars. They could buy two helicopters and require students to put big parking permits on the tops of their cars in the form of a bull's-eye. This way, if they found somebody illegally parked, they could simply drop a small explosive that would disintegrate the automobile and eliminate the hassle of towing it.

But why stop there? The police could build a new bi-level bicycle rack out at the rec complex and begin to ticket bicyclists and motorists in one parking lot. If they use the money wisely, they may afford to have hall monitors who could ticket people for sitting against the walls in the hallways without a "waiting for class" permit.

Perhaps a better way to spend the money would be to use it in hiring a football coach and a new University president. With $2.6 million, we could rehire Jim Dickey and pay him more money to do the same job! Or, we could hire nine more football coaches and let them each coach one of the remaining games so they can all have respectable 0-1 records at the end of the season.

If we reallocate all the money for the coliseum, we could probably hire nine new presidents as well as nine athletic directors. This way, each athletic director would only have to fire one coach and the nine presidents wouldn't look so bad.



Of course, there are other things to do with the money. We could put a dome over the football stadium, but we would probably have to remove the precious stadium lights we use so often.

Still another possibility exists if we put the money in a blind trust for Farrell Library and dare the state to match it. If they did, imagine the security measures the library could take to prevent the loss of books and magazines — armed guards, lie-detector tests and even immediate prosecution.

Of course, we can't forget the Union. If we gave the money to them, they could build another bookstore and pretend to have price wars with them. They might even splurge and replace the sound system in Forum Hall and reduce the price of their movies back to $1.50. Maybe they'll take the automatic urinal one step further and give it speech capabilities as in the new cars, "Thank you. Be sure and zip up."

Instead of attempting to build one 16,500-seat coliseum without a lighted or paved parking lot, maybe we should attempt two 8,000-seat coliseums, or four 4,000-seat coliseums without lights or pavement.

In all seriousness, students, the money we have collected should result in reduced fees down the line. If it doesn't — well, this student will be heard from again.

Protesters of apartheid promote 'selective morality'

Editor,

Re: Mike Riley's column, "Soviets continue human rights violations," in the Sept. 18 Collegian:

I have only one thing to say to Riley. That is, "Thank you!"

It is refreshing to see a columnist who is gifted with the insight to discuss America's "selective morality" in regard to the Soviet Union and the South African "crisis."

The intent of this letter is not to support apartheid in any fashion. However, I feel that many Americans have, through their "selective morality," blown the entire South African issue out of proportion.

This inflation of a relatively minor issue has come not through letters and petitions to congressmen or the president, but rather it has come through the cheap and theatrical means of picket lines, as well as undisciplined, shouting demonstrators.

As far as I am concerned, those who have been party to such demonstrations have not been concerned with South Africa's problems, but rather with getting their faces in the newspaper or on television. A quiet word often does more good than a shouted profanity.

Infections, hormone shots cause concern

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — An outbreak of rare, fatal infections among people who received human growth hormone raises "the ominous possibility of a burgeoning epidemic," government researchers report.

In the past year, four people have died from the rare illness, known as Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. Experts believe they were victims of a slow-acting virus, which may take years to develop, that unknown to scientists was contained in their hormone shots.

"There is absolutely no way to predict what is going to happen," said Dr. Paul Brown. "The only thing that's going to tell us is the unrolling of several more years."

The growth hormone, derived from the pituitary glands of cadavers, has been given to 11,000 people over the past 22 years to prevent severe short stature. Patients take two or three shots a week for several years.

Brown and colleagues from the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Disorders and Stroke are conducting animal experiments and surveys of patients to try to assess the scope of the problem.

They say the cases seen so far could represent the worst of the outbreak. Or they might foreshadow a much more severe epidemic to come.

"My instinct tells me that there is not going to be an epidemic of major proportions among this population," Brown said in an interview. "But that is instinct, not science, and I'm just hoping."

Federal authorities suspended distribution of the hormone in April after it appeared that some of it had been tainted with the virus that causes Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, which progressively attacks the central nervous system and is inevitably fatal.

Dr. John D. Crawford, who has administered growth hormone at Massachusetts General Hospital, said of the report, "The concerns raised are certainly legitimate."

But he added, "I would say, emphasize the facts and go light on scare tactics of worst-case conjecture."

Fraternities win top awards at summer national meetings

By JANET MATTHIAS
Collegian Reporter

Of the 25 University fraternities governed by the Interfraternity Council, 15 attended summer national conventions and won more than 25 awards.

Tau Kappa Epsilon received the Top TKE Award, the highest award given to nine of 272 TKE chapters across the United States and Canada.

Beta Theta Pi was declared one of the top six chapters of the 115 Beta Theta Pi chapters in the United States and Canada and received the Sisson Award. Beta Theta Pi also received the North Dakota Award for outstanding publication.

For the second consecutive year, Delta Upsilon received the Director's Award for superior Delta Upsilon chapters on college campuses with 15 to 25 fraternities — the highest award in its classification among the 110 chapters in the United States and Canada.

Sigma Phi Epsilon received the Buchannon Cup for being one of 30 top chapters of 264 national chapters. They also received the 100 Man Chapter Award for having 100 men in their chapter.

For the fourth year in a row Pi Kappa Alpha received the Chapter Excellence Award. Of the 176 chapters, 30 of these awards were presented.

Lambda Chi Alpha received an award for outstanding involvement for campuses of 15,000 students or more. Three of these awards were given out of the 228 Lambda Chi chapters.

Sigma Alpha Epsilon received a Chapter Excellence Award for the second consecutive year. They were nominated for the Robert L. Cousins Award for outstanding rush programs and the John Baugh Award for excellence in pledge programs and education.

Sigma Chi received the Peterson Significant Award for outstanding performance in all major fields of operation, programs and activities given to 75 of the 192 chapters. Sigma Chi also received a Public Relations Citation.

Phi Gamma Delta received an honorable mention for the Baker Cup award for social services, third place for the Brightman Award for graduate relations and the John T. McCarty Award for meeting standards of the national fraternity. They also received a one-year award for meeting or exceeding All Men's Average GPA which was 2.716 for last spring.

Pi Kappa Phi received the Bronze Star Award for donating over $2,500 to their national philanthropy, PUSH-Play Units for the Severely Handicapped. They also received the Red Rose Club award for doubling last year's donation.

Kappa Sigma won an honorable mention award for their alumni newsletter. Evan L. Davis, Kappa Sig alumnus, received one of two Distinguished Service awards.

Alpha Kappa Lambda received the Logos Chapter Improvement Award and the Alpha Kappa Lambda Achievement Trophy.

Alpha Tau Omega was a runner-up for the Harry L. Bird Award for alumni newsletters.

Delta Tau Delta received the national award for excellence in financial management.

Phi Delta Theta received the Sound Learning Award, a Silver Star for Excellence award and a General Headquarters award.

Law limits access to AIDS test

Plan to help insurance firms

By The Associated Press

MILWAUKEE — A state legislator has drafted a proposal to allow insurance companies access to AIDS virus tests following complaints that a new Wisconsin law limiting such access might mean excluding AIDS victims from insurance coverage.

"If we were forced into it by the state telling us we could not even find out what a person's condition is, we would have to consider (exclusion) of some policies," said George Hardy, legislative counsel for Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co.

He has drafted language for an amendment to allow insurance companies to see the AIDS test results, and Rep. Gervase Hephner of Chilton has drafted a proposal that would allow insurance companies to look at test results.

Linda Reivitz, secretary of the state Department of Heath and Social Services, said samples taken routinely from blood donors are examined to see if donor's blood has the antibody to the human T-cell lymphotropic virus-type III (HTLV-III), which is believed to cause AIDS.

The presence of the antibody means donor was exposed to the virus, but doesn't necessarily mean he has AIDS or will contract it.

Hardy said he was concerned about legislation approved in July that would limit an insurance company's access to the results of the tests.

"In the case of all other diseases, we're permitted to get all the facts, but this legislation prohibits us from requiring a test to determine if they have the AIDS virus," Hardy said. "We think we can show that it's a reliable test for insurance underwriting purposes."

Northwestern Mutual has had 32 AIDS claims in the past two years: 15 death claims, eight premium waiver claims and nine disability claims.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield United of Wisconsin, which represents 40 percent of all private group health policyholders in the state, is also considering putting a rider on its policies to exclude AIDS.

"If we had somebody get medical underwriting for an individual insurance policy, and determined they did have AIDS, we might put a rider on the policy to cover everything else but AIDS for a period of 240 to 365 days," said Alan Gaudynski, public relations and legislative affairs director for Blue Cross.

AIDS is an affliction in which the body's immune system becomes unable to resist disease.

City starts building victims' homes

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Mayor W. Wilson Goode said he is optimistic that new homes will be ready by next May for all 250 people left homeless by the fatal MOVE fire four months ago.

At a "topping-off" ceremony Tuesday marking the installation of the first roof on one of the 61 homes being rebuilt, Goode said construction is on schedule and that he is satisfied with the quality of the work.

Goode, who originally said he hoped the residents could return by Christmas, said his goal was to have the new homes ready for occupancy within a year after the fire.

The May 13 fire was started by a police bomb dropped on the fortified headquarters of the radical group MOVE. It killed 11 MOVE members and caused more than $10 million in damage.

The city is paying to house the homeless and rebuild the 61 houses. The city also is paying to repair 82 other houses damaged by fire, smoke and water.

The assault has become the focus of several investigations, including one by a committee appointed by the mayor.

Workshop attracts journalism students

By The Collegian Staff

More than 1,200 high school students from 92 Kansas schools will convene on campus today for the fourth annual Fall Journalism Day.

The workshop, sponsored by the Kansas Scholastic Press Association and the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications, is being hosted by Student Publications Inc.

"Approximately 80 sessions are scheduled throughout the day concerning various aspects of photography, advertising, graphics and special writing techniques," said Dave Adams, director of Student Publications and workshop director.

More than 80 speakers will present programs during the day to high school students and their faculty advisers.

The keynote speaker is Carl Vandermeulen of Orange City, Iowa, a nationally known scholastic photo-journalism speaker and writer.

He will speak on "Why Go Through All the Trouble of Doing Good Journalism?" He will also speak at several other sessions throughout the day.

Another feature this year will be a yearbook viewing room. This allows students and advisers a chance to see yearbooks from all across Kansas. On-the-spot critiques for 100 yearbooks and student newspapers will be in Kedzie Hall.

Publications will be critiqued by media professionals and college faculty from the University of Kansas, Garden City Community College, Cowley County Community College, Pittsburg State University, Fort Hays State University and K-State. The faculty members, professionals and high school advisers will also give presentations during the day.

"K-State journalism students are a big part of this workshop," Adams said. Award-winning Collegian photographers Andy Nelson, sophomore; John Sleezer, senior; Jeff Taylor, senior; and Jeff Tuttle, junior, will make presentations. All four are majoring in journalism and mass communications.

"This is a big day for everyone," he said. "This is the largest luncheon that the K-State Union has ever served. We have had 1,200 students pre-register."

U.S. shows progress in reading ability

Figures improve over 14-year period

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The reading ability of 17-year-old students improved in the past four years after a decade of stagnation, but 9-and 13-year-olds have stopped making progress, a federally backed testing agency said Wednesday.

At all three age levels, pupils read better now than in 1971, the National Assessment of Educational Progress reported, and the biggest gains have been registered by blacks and Hispanics.

But "The Reading Report Card," a study based on tests administered to 250,000 school children over the past 14 years, also dramatized the big gap remaining between minorities and the white majority.

The average black and Hispanic 17-year-olds can read "only slightly" better than the average white 13-year-old, it said.

It graded reading on a five-step scale — from rudimentary to basic to intermediate to adept to advanced.

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett called the findings "good news and bad news."

"We are not raising at present a generation of illiterates. Virtually all of our children possess rudimentary reading skills sufficient to follow simple directions...and respond to easy questions," he told a news conference.

But he expressed concern that almost 36 percent of the 9-year-olds have not acquired the basic comprehension skills needed to succeed in third- and fourth-grade work, and that 40 percent of 13-year-olds and 16 percent of 17-year-old students lacked the intermediate skills "to handle much of what is studied in a sixth-or seventh-grade class."

There are 1.3 million such 13-year-olds and 482,000 17-year-olds, the report said.

The 17-year-old students were the only age group to improve their performance over the 1980 assessment. Dropouts were not tested. One in every four students entering high school fails to graduate.

Only 5 percent of the oldest students reached the highest rung on the reading ladder, the advanced skills. Bennett said, "one in 20 is too thin a layer to meet the nation's needs" for scholars, scientists, teachers, writers and other professionals.

This was the fourth national assessment in reading since 1971 and the first run by the Educational Testing Service of Princeton, N.J. Its report for the first time compared youngsters' reading ability at different ages on the same scale.

The report also said children who watched six or more hours of television daily generally scored poorly.

Soviets successfully steal Western technology

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviets have been much more successful than previously thought in stealing Western technology and as a result, "we are subsidizing the military buildup of the Soviet Union," Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger said Wednesday.

Weinberger released a study asserting the Soviets have targeted specific American defense contractors and universities; are acquiring thousands of technical reports that are not classified but are useful, and are diverting high-tech equipment designed for one purpose but which can be used in weapons programs.

"By their own estimate, more than 5,000 Soviet military research projects each year are benefiting significantly from Western acquired technology," Weinberger said at a news conference.

The report said that while comprehensive figures are not available, the Soviets estimate they saved at least $640 million in 1980 alone on selected military research projects by obtaining Western technology.

Neither Weinberger nor Assistant Defense Secretary Richard Perle, who later briefed reporters on the study, would elaborate on the sources used to measure the Soviet effort.

But the report, said Perle, should lead to efforts by the United States to "even up" the number of Soviet diplomats allowed to operate here compared with the Americans in the Soviet Union. The United States and its allies should also consider "a system of blacklisting" to prevent Soviet agents who are expelled from one country from gaining posts in another allied nation, he added.

Perle said he would recommend that President Reagan not discuss any broader scientific and educational ties with the Soviets when he meets with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in November.

The study was described as the product of a special Technology Transfer Intelligence Committee including officials from the Pentagon, the CIA and 20 other U.S. agencies. Much of the general information in the study was disclosed previously. But it gave what it called more examples of how the Soviets collect information and products and what they do with such technology.

For example, the report said the Soviets somehow secured documentation on the weapon-controlling radars used on the Navy's F-A-18 jet fighter. It said the documents served "as the technical basis for new look-down, shoot-down engagement radars for the latest generation of Soviet fighters."

Using technical studies published by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Soviets copied the wing structure of an experimental U.S. plane known as the YC-14 for a new generation of short-takeoff jets, Perle said.

Although the Pentagon believes it is now doing a much better job controlling access to technical documents, NASA, the Patent Office and the National Technical Information Center remain key sources for the Soviets, Perle said.

Officials probe guru's claims

By The Associated Press

RAJNEESHPURAM, Ore. — Law enforcement officials met Wednesday with disciples of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh to investigate allegations by the Indian guru that some of his closest advisers plotted murder, wiretapped phones and left the sect $55 million in debt.

About a dozen Rajneeshee leaders left the commune last weekend amid the accusations.

Meanwhile, the central Oregon commune-city suffered another setback with a ruling by the Oregon Supreme Court that Rajneeshpuram improperly annexed 119 acres of agriculturally zoned land.

The court ruled Tuesday that the city should have had a state-approved urban growth boundary before it converted agricultural land to urban uses.

The fate of 20 buildings on the annexed land probably would depend on the resolution of a lawsuit challenging Rajneeshpuram's incorporation, said Mark Greenfield of 1000 Friends of Oregon, a land-use watchdog group. The buildings include the sect's meditation hall, cafeteria and hotel.

The Supreme Court has sent the main incorporation case back to a state board for reconsideration.

Wasco County District Attorney Bernard Smith said the results of Wednesday's meeting about the investigation would not be made public.

Gov. Vic Atiyeh said Wednesday that state officials were willing to help if the Rajneeshees ask them to investigate. Authorities so far haven't received any concrete evidence, he said.

But Atiyeh said he was not be willing to meet with Rajneesh, and expressed skepticism that the guru has changed his attitude toward Oregonians.

Most of the departed disciples have followed Rajneesh's personal secretary, Ma Anand Sheela, to Europe where they reportedly plan to open a gambling casino, Rajneeshees say.

Haunting vision of America created in prize-winning film

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Sam Shepard's plays take place on the fringe of society, out on the American wasteland. There he can strip away barriers until emotions are exposed like raw nerves. Such brutal frankness can look like surrealism at times.

Film Review

"Paris, Texas," grand prize winner at the 1984 Cannes Film Festival, (screenplay by Shepard and L.M. Kit Carson, direction by Wim Wenders), takes place on the American wasteland as well. When it begins, Travis Bickle (Harry Dean Stanton in his best performance yet) is walking across western Texas — a rock-strewn, inhospitable region that looks like the Mariner shots of the planet Mars.

Travis has been wandering for 4½ years, searching for a place where nothing exists, where there are no reminders of his past. He's an odd little man, whithered away under the harsh sunlight. His skin is baked a reddish-brown. He wears a tattered two-piece suit, a neatly tied necktie, a greasy, red baseball cap and shoes that flap as he walks.

After he wanders into a hole-in-the-desert bar and passes out, a barkeeper searches through his clothes until finding a phone number. This brings Travis's brother, Walt (played by Dean Stockwell), all the way from Los Angeles.

This opening is so striking because these characters haven't just been recycled from other movies. This isn't the gadgetry of a Spielberg, Coppola, or Lucas. These characters have never been seen before. They're fresh and exciting. (Although Travis looks more like a carp that's lain on a pier for a couple weeks.)

As Walt drives and Travis mutely stares at the horizon, Travis's life slowly gets pieced back together. That isn't what Travis wants, so he tries running away. Gradually it's revealed that Travis has a family of his own, but that family has fractured — mother, father and son each going in separate directions. The boy, named Hunter, was raised by Walt's family. He knows nothing about having a father who disappeared in the desert.

In "Paris, Texas," Los Angeles looks like just any other western city. That's part of the point. Life on what used to be the American frontier has been homogenized until it's like a McDonald's hamburger and fries — the same everywhere, and oh, so boring. So much for individuality. Even the city of Paris, Texas is virtually indistinguishable from Los Angeles.

Eventually Hunter takes a liking to his father (first, he seemed liked the weirdest old codger he'd ever seen), and then together they head out for Paris, Texas. After doing a little detective work, Travis finds his wife, played by Nastassja Kinski in an odd bit of casting. She is working at a peep show, and in a private "fantasy booth", for a quarter a minute, he is finally able to get in touch her.

At this point the movie takes on a different look. This may have been caused when Shepard had to go work on another project, "Country." Then, without an ending for his movie, Wim Wenders called in script doctor L.M. Kit Carson.

The last quarter of the movie is then a bit stagey. The climax that was being set up turns into more of an epiphany. That's a bit discomforting at first, but gradually it starts to make sense. Here in this land of alienation, where the family unit is being torn apart, Travis can only talk to his wife by putting quarters into a slot and looking through one-way glass. She can't even clearly see her face.

It's a bit heavy in symbolism and the talks are dragged out for too long, where a quick punctuation might've worked better, but "Paris, Texas" is still a powerful film.

Ry Cooder's gentle, wispy score gently nudges the story forward. His music is just as spare as the action on the screen and together they create a haunting vision of America, an America where alienation is spreading and turning the cities themselves into part of the wasteland.

Six remain in captivity

Lebanese free U.S. hostage

By The Associated Press

The Rev. Benjamin Weir, kidnapped in Lebanon on May 8, 1984, has been freed. Here are brief biographies of the other six Americans still reported kidnapped or missing in Lebanon:

TERRY A. ANDERSON — Anderson, 37, the chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, was kidnapped by gunmen on March 16, 1985. Anderson's wife, Mikki, and 8-year-old daughter, Gabrielle, had left Beirut earlier because of concern for their safety. A graduate of Iowa State University, Anderson worked at AP bureaus in Tokyo and Johannesburg before being assigned to Beirut.

WILLIAM BUCKLEY — Buckley, 56, a political officer at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, was kidnapped March 18, 1984. Buckley, a bachelor, was from Medford, Mass.

DAVID JACOBSEN — Jacobsen, 54, administrator of the American University Hospital, was kidnapped on May 28, 1985. A divorced father of three from Huntington Beach, Calif.

REV. LAWRENCE MARTIN JENCO — Jence, 50, was kidnapped Jan. 8, 1985. The Joliet, Ill., priest was a member of the Order of Servants of Mary. He directed Catholic Relief Services operations in Lebanon, serving both Christians and Moslems. "He always said that if he were to die, he'd like to die as a missionary," said his brother John Jenco, of Joliet, Ill.

PETER KILBURN — Kilburn, 60, a librarian at American University, failed to report for work on Dec. 3, 1984. Some statements made in the name of the Islamic Jihad have said he was kidnapped; other statements have said nothing about him.

THOMAS SUTHERLAND — Sutherland, 54, was acting dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut when he was abducted on June 9, 1985. He was on leave from Colorado State University and had worked in Beirut for two years.

Carlin begins 10-day trade mission

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin leaves Thursday morning on a 10-day trade mission to four European countries as he tries to drum up new business investments and jobs for Kansas.

The governor is scheduled to visit four nations during the trip, which his chief spokesman, Michael Swenson, described as a "follow-up to the trade mission in May 1984."

During the earlier visit, Carlin spent 16 days in Europe, stopping in England, West Germany and France on an excursion paid by the Kansas Cavalry — an organization of private businessmen designed to spur economic and industrial development.

Taxpayers will pay for the latest junket at an estimated cost of $50,000.

Accompanying Carlin will be an entourage of about a dozen, including staff members Jim Ploger and Pam Horton Curtis. In addition, Charles "Jamie" Schwartz, secretary of economic development and four of his aides will make the trip.

The governor's sister will pay her own way, along with the spouses of staff and legislators.

Carlin will fly to Amsterdam, Netherlands, and on Friday will be in Brussels, Belgium, where he will meet with members of the European Economic Community and the commissioner for agriculture.

The governor will spend the night in Brussels and will attend dinner with executives of the Toyota Corp. On Saturday, Carlin will fly to Munich, West Germany, for a meeting with another round of meetings with industrial leaders. They will spend four nights in Munich.

Then it's on to Stuttgart, West Germany, where Carlin will meet with senior executives of Daimler-Benz, the parent firm of the Mercedez-Benz automobile manufacturer.

Carlin will leave for Geneva, Switzerland, where he hopes to meet with senior executives of the Nestle Corp., before traveling to Paris.

come up with some basic goals.

"I'm very pleased with the amount of cooperation and support people (the unsatisfied business and property owners) are showing," she said. "We are going to consult further before making our next move."

Gary Stith, community development coordinator for the city, said the offers made were based on appraisals made by two separate appraisers. If property owners don't like the appraisal, they can either retain their own appraiser and negotiate or go to court where a judge would make a final decision.

In cases of non-agreement, he said, the city could exercise its right of eminent domain — the right to buy property for public use.

Doug Long, owner of Mel's Tavern, 211 S. Third St., and Bentley's, 213 S. Third St., said he refuses to sell his property for the $20,000 the city has offered him for both establishments.

"There's no place in Manhattan for me to relocate," Long said. "I've been here for 10 years and my businesses have been all paid for for seven years.

"They've offered me $10,000 for the bars and offices located above Mel's. I've talked to various construction firms and the lowest bid I've received to rebuild is $138,000."

Long said relocation will be difficult for all tenants in the downtown area but he said he believes his business will be one to suffer the most. He said people will continue to go to service businesses for repairs regardless of where they are located, but his bars need the traffic flow, parking access and visibility.

Another property owner, Jean Farrell, co-owner of Farrell TV and Electronics, 215 Poyntz Ave., refused to disclose the amount she and her husband were offered for their property but said it was the same amount they were offered one year ago.

"We didn't accept it (the offer) the first time and we still aren't," she said. "We have it (the business) insured for twice what was offered and that doesn't even include the land it's on."

Dale Anderson, co-owner of Standard Plumbing Inc., 226 Poyntz Ave., said he has received an offer for his property but he's not satisfied with it. He and the city are still negotiating a price.

However, Anderson has moved his business to a new location at 609 Pecan Circle, in the 28,000 square-foot Home Center Mall, located across from the Westside Market on Fort Riley Boulevard. Anderson said he had already "had the new store ready to move into and it was costing him money." Anderson said he decided to go ahead and move after being told he would still qualify for relocation assistance by city representatives.

An inspiration for the living

Sunset Cemetery

By KEVIN SNELL
Collegian Reporter

"If I should die I hope I will not be buried on this bleak and desolate hill."

This quote is attributed to a Manhattan pioneer woman who gazed upon the hill that became Sunset Cemetery. The hill she saw in the late 1850s, however, bears little resemblance to the cemetery of today.

Sunset Cemetery is an L-shaped patch of land in southwest Manhattan containing 48 acres. Its main entrance is along Sunset Avenue, the eastern border of the cemetery. Manhattan High School is along its southern edge.

After the founding of Manhattan in 1855, the city fathers began to search for a suitable burying site for the town's dead. Most of the settlers of Manhattan were New England natives, who traditionally built common cemeteries. In the South, the dead often were buried at the corners of homesteads.

In August 1860, the city bought 35 acres on the hilltop from Clark M. Lewis. The price paid for the cemetery land was $610. Burial on a hill was supposed to shorten a soul's journey to heaven.

More land purchases have expanded the cemetery to its current size.

A stone marker in Sunset states that the traditional first burial was a 20-year-old woman named Juliet Lovejoy Whitehorn, who died of typhoid fever in November 1860. Her grave is located by the main gate and is marked by a 10-foot stone shaft. There are older death dates listed on markers, but they are re-burials.

Originally named Manhattan City Cemetery, Sunset received its name in 1908 as the result of a contest by the city to find a new name. The name "Sunset Hill Cemetery" was proposed, and it was shortened by common use to Sunset Cemetery. Not until Dec. 31, 1935, did Manhattan officially change the name to Sunset Cemetery.

There are about 15,000 graves within the cemetery walls, and there is room for 5,000 to 10,000 more, said Frank Johnson, cemetery foreman. He said there are about 115 burials a year. The cemetery has been sold out since 1975, but many plots are not used. Anyone who wishes to dispose of a plot must sell it back to the city.

Until Sunrise Cemetery was built on Stagg Hill Road on the south side of town in 1966, Sunset was the only large cemetery in Manhattan. It has been the town's burial ground for 125 years and in that time it has seen many changes. One change involves the evolution of grave markers.

Staff/Jeff A. Taylor

A war memorial of simple white crosses commemorates local soldiers who were killed in action.

Some of the oldest markers in Sunset Cemetery are in the form of stone shafts, ornate rectangular tombstones and a number of small identical stones that mark the graves of Civil War veterans. Many of these old stones are weather-worn and covered with moss and other growth, showing their age.

Some odd and interesting designs are marble benches, huge rocks with inscriptions and stone that is carved to resemble tree trunks. Some gravestones of children include pictures of them.

Sunset has special sections that require markers no more than 8 inches high and another that requires markers be level with the ground. Most modern grave markers are rectangular stones 8 to 9 inches tall.

Most markers face the west and the setting sun, hence the name "Sunset Cemetery." This contrasts to the pattern in many Christian cemeteries of stones facing the east and the rising sun, which symbolizes resurrection.

In 1920, H.P. Wareham bought a 100-foot-diameter circle of land in the cemetery for $1,000. On that plot, the Wareham family commissioned a marble mausoleum for $60,000. The marble structure has stained-glass windows, marble columns and bronze doors, with benches, flower pots, a birdbath and a lawn surrounding it.

A less elaborate private vault is the W.J. Fortune crypt, built in the 1920s. It is a grass- and flower-covered mound of poured concrete and is inlaid with seashells and tiles. An iron gate bars the entrance.

There are two war memorials on the grounds. One is a Civil War era cannon erected in 1898 by the Grand Army of the Republic, a Civil War veteran's group. It stands in the eastern part of the cemetery.

The other memorial is the war cross section in the west end. Simple, white wooden crosses bear the names of local soldiers who died in the United States' wars. Also, there are soldiers from each war buried against the bordering wall. A cannon and memorial plaques stand at the site.

Sunset Cemetery is maintained by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department as a mature cultural park. In 1936, Harold N. Cary, assistant cemetery superintendent, said the objectives of the cemetery were to serve "as a permanent and inviolable burial ground" and to "be so beautiful as to inspire the living."

As a result of beautification efforts made over the years, the bleak hill the first settlers saw is bleak no longer. Lush grass and an abundance of trees, including mature Scotch and Austrian pines and numerous native varieties, make Sunset seem more of a park than a cemetery.

Johnson, who became cemetery foreman in 1977, has a crew of four full-time groundskeepers. The crew mows the grass, keeps the trees neat, removes dead flowers from graves and keeps the cemetery watered. The groundskeepers also dig, fill and seed graves. Johnson handles burial arrangements and sells lots.

While the residents of the cemetery might not care about the efforts made to beautify their resting places, many of the living are indeed "inspired" by its beauty. Sunset is anything but dead.

"We have a lot of people come in and take care of lots, and many come in and take walks or jog," Johnson said.

Faculty to discuss conflict-of-interest

Graduate dean suggests policy revision

By MARGARET MAY
Collegian Reporter

The dean of the graduate school has proposed a revision of the faculty's handbook on conflict of interest.

The present policy states that a conflict of interest exists when faculty's non-University interests are influenced or advanced by their University positions at the expense of their University responsibilities.

A hypothetical example of a conflict of interest, said Robert Kruh, dean of the graduate school, might be a professor develops a computer program on his own and uses it to start a company besides working for the University. Then his department decides to purchase a new computer program. If the professor's program is the best, it may be a conflict of interest for his department to purchase the program from his company therefore adding to his personal income.

When a conflict of interest arises, it is left to the discretion of the dean of that faculty member's college to determine whether the conflict actually exists and what action to take, Kruh said.

The need to update the policy was identified by George E. Miller, vice president for administration and finance. Kruh integrated new ideas into the old policy and wrote a proposal now in a faculty senate subcommittee.

Faculty senate will receive the proposal after the subcommittee has studied it.

Most of the present policy is taken from the American Association of University Professors and the American Council on Education. Kruh said the policy needs updating.

"There are things going on now, particularly as a result of the increasing emphasis on technological development and interaction between universities and industry and moreover, entrepreneurial activities on the part of faculty members," Kruh said.

Many universities are revising their policies, Kruh said.

"Conflict of interest is not bad in itself," he said. "I think the issue here is that one needs to recognize that the opportunities for conflict in interest come up but we want to be forthcoming and identify them so that everybody is protected. We don't want anybody to be embarrassed — we don't want the faculty members to be embarrassed, we don't want the school to be embarrassed, or the students. It is just a matter of sound policy."

The University is getting more activity on the faculty's part, who are coming forward with ideas that might lead to business and commercial developments which help the state's economy, Kruh said.

"We are just trying to prevent any misunderstandings," he said.

While any technological products would probably be the result of entrepreneurial activities of faculty in the sciences, Kruh said, the policy will also affect the applied sciences such as engineering.

"What we are doing is amplifying it (the policy) and making it more particular for the University," Kruh said.

"Generally speaking, conflict of interest can be negated by full disclosure of the information. If all of the parties involved know about a potential conflict of interest, and can prove it, then there isn't a conflict of interest," said John Mingle, executive vice president of research foundation. "It's when it is essentially unknown and surfaces later that most people are worried about."

There cannot be a "cut-and-dried" case and there will always be much discussion on conflict of interest on the academic level because different people have different ideas, Mingle said. Usually a middle ground is reached and most university policies are middle-ground.

"I think this one (policy proposal) is a fairly middle-ground proposal," Mingle said. "It isn't extreme in any manner and of course the other extreme is to have no policy at all."

Most cases are common sense, said Terry Johnson, head of the Division of Biology. The primary job, Johnson said, is to deliver the best education to the undergraduate and graduate students and provide research that everyone can be proud of.

Housing construction increases 6.2 percent

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Housing construction in August posted its best gain in five months, a 6.2 percent increase which analysts said Wednesday provided further evidence that the economy is finally showing signs of revival.

The Commerce Department said construction of new homes and apartments rose to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.75 million units in August, reversing a 3.2 percent July decline. It was the biggest increase in housing activity since a 14.7 percent March advance.

The report on housing was the latest in a series of bright August economic statistics. The government has already reported that unemployment declined for the first time in six months while industrial production and retail sales showed healthy gains last month.

All these statistics have been cited by the Reagan administration as proof that the economy is rebounding after a year-long slump. Strength in housing construction is a key underpinning for administration hopes of a five-fold increase in economic growth in the second half of the year.

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said the new report showed not only a rise in actual construction but a gain in building permits, a good barometer of future activity.

Economists had been mystified as to why dramatic declines in mortgage rates since last year did not seem to be triggering a big increase in sales and construction activity. But they said the latest report and an expected big jump in August sales, which the government will report later, should show that the gains were just delayed.

Apple co-founder resigns over dispute

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Steven P. Jobs, the 30-year-old whiz kid of the personal computer industry, has resigned as chairman of Apple Computer Inc. after a feud with management of the company he co-founded in a garage nine years ago.

Jobs said in a letter to company officials, dated Tuesday, that he was leaving because of the company's "hostile posture" to his plan to begin a new company specializing in computers for higher education.

In May, Jobs lost a power struggle with John Sculley, Apple's president and chief executive officer, and was stripped of day-to-day management duties at the Cupertino-based company. The move came as the company was being reorganized, firing 20 percent of its workforce, and as its stock fell to a three-year low of $14.25 a share.

The stock rose by $1, closing at $16.25 a share in trading Wednesday on the over-the-counter market.

Apple was born in 1976 when Jobs and fellow college dropout Steven Wozniak showed off a simple computer to the Homebrew Computer Club in the Silicon Valley's Menlo Park, south of San Francisco. Jobs sold his Volkswagen van for start-up capital and convinced electronics wizard Wozniak they should market the computer.

Apple computers became hot items, especially in schools, and made Jobs and Wozniak multimillionaires. But Apple and other small-computer companies found themselves struggling over the past year as demand for personal computers leveled off.

Wozniak left Apple in February to start a new non-computer company called Cloud 9.

Jobs complained in his letter that since the reorganization he had been left "with no work to do and no access even to regular management reports."

"I want to work and contribute and achieve and don't want to become sterilized in some Siberia part of Apple Computer," he told the San Francisco Examiner.

Jobs' telephone number is unlisted and he could not be reached for additional comment Wednesday.

The resignation followed the latest skirmish between Jobs and Apple's board of directors. At a meeting last Thursday, he offered to resign if the directors believed his new venture would conflict with Apple's goals.

The directors declined to accept the resignation, asking Jobs to think it over for a week while company officials studied his new venture to see if Apple might want to invest in it, according to Jobs' letter.

Apple would not comment Wednesday on the resignation. Company spokeswoman Kathleen Dixon said the company had received Jobs' letter and would make a statement "as soon as it is appropriate."

Sunset

Two people who enjoy the cemetery's beauty are Don and Joyce Hoyt, Manhattan. The couple enjoys nightly walks through Sunset with their dog.

"We come about every night, except maybe on weekends," Don Hoyt said. "We always bring the dog. He needs the exercise."

The Hoyts said they have family and friends buried in the cemetery, but they don't feel uncomfortable when they're walking.

"It's not an eerie feeling at all," Don Hoyt said. "The setting is calm, beautiful and certainly peaceful. We feel comfortable."

Joyce Holt said being in the cemetery among the dead makes them think about life.

"Sometimes when we remember where we are, we are reminded of what life is," she said. "It makes you live each moment more fully."

Don Hoyt agreed.

"There's a perspective you get when you face your own mortality, and I think it makes you love life more," he said.

West Germans reject request to tap telephone of defectors

By The Associated Press

BONN, West Germany — The government rejected a request to tap the telephone of a couple who defected to East Germany, although the husband had been suspected for years, an Interior Ministry official said Wednesday.

The defections of Herbert and Herta-Astrid Willner were announced Tuesday. She was a secretary in Chancellor Helmut Kohl's office and he worked for a foundation linked to a party in the conservative government coalition.

West Germany's growing spy scandal began early in August with the first of several defections and there are increasing demands that Interior Minister Friederich Zimmerman resign. One defector was Hans-Joachim Tiedge, the man in charge of catching East German spies.

Hans Neusel, the ministry official, told a news conference that Herbert Willner had been under surveillance sporadically for 12 years and Tiedge, who defected Aug. 19, was in charge of the case.

He said Kohl was informed Aug. 28 that Willner was being watched because her husband was suspected of spying for communist East Germany, but agreed with ministry officials that there was not enough evidence to justify tapping the couple's phone or reading their mail. Willner, 45, was a secretary in the domestic affairs department of the chancellery.

By that time the Willners were out of the country. They left Aug. 12 for a vacation in Spain and are believed to have gone to East Germany at the end of the month, Neusel said, adding that Tiedge may have warned them.

Hans-Juergen Foerster, a spokesman for chief federal prosecutor Kurt Rebmann, said a search of the Willners' apartment revealed equipment that could be used for spying, including a container suitable for concealing microfilm, sensitive documents and a large amount of money.

The Willner case is the first time a spy has been found in the chancellery since Guenter Guillaume, a top aide to Chancellor Willy Brandt, was exposed in 1974. Brandt resigned and now is chairman of the opposition Social Democrat Party.

"Mrs. Willner worked in the nerve center of the government. We are happy that (the East Germans) have lost" an agent in the chancellery through her defection, Neusel said.

Bonn's counter-intelligence agency, the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, asked the Interior Ministry on May 17 for permission for the special surveillance, he said.

West German authorities announced Tuesday that the Willners had written letters saying they had defected.

Willner worked at the Friedrich Naumann Foundation, which is linked with the Free Democratic Party, junior partner in the Christian Democratic chancellor's coalition.

Rebmann, the federal prosecutor, said Willner belonged to East Germany's Communist Party before immigrating to the West in 1961.

His wife had worked in the chancellery since 1973, and had access to classified documents.

Bonn's counterspy agency first ran a check on Herbert Willner in 1973 in response to a query from a "friendly" embassy in Bonn, Neusel said, and he had been in and out of the files since.

Chinese study wheat process

Milling team visits campus

By ALICE KUNSHEK
Collegian Reporter

Maintaining friendship and gaining experience are the primary reasons the People's Republic of China's milling science and technology team is visiting the United States.

"The visit is giving us more opportunity to be friends with the U.S.," said Madam Zhu Li, vice director of the Beijing Grain Bureau and speaker for the five Chinese leaders. "That friendship is very important."

Another aim of the team's visit is to gain experience by viewing different kinds of wheat and presenting questions to U.S. agronomy specialists.

"We all are very interested in the treatment of wheat crops," Li said. "It (the visit) is to help us understand more deeply the wheat process."

With the help of the U.S. Wheat Commission the Chinese have been able to build a new flour mill in Beijing, with advanced equipment and technology, Li said.

Tuesday, the group toured the International Grains Program and the Department of Grain Science and Industry in Shellenberger Hall and the American Institute of Baking.

The team's visit to the United States will end in Washington, D.C., where they will meet with officials from the Department of Agriculture and Winston Wilson, president of the U.S. Wheat Commission, Li said.

The five leaders are responsible for all the milling in China's 2,000 mills and for a large percentage of the baking in China.

"Since China is now the largest wheat-producing country in the world, it's easy to make the mistake of thinking they will no longer be importing wheat," said Jim Bair, Kansas Wheat Commission marketing specialist.

"However, we need to remember that China is a traditional rice-consuming nation, and with a population of more than 1 billion, it represents one of the most significant and exciting markets in the world today," Bair said.

"We're hopeful that this visit will help the U.S. increase exports to the People's Republic of China above the 45 percent share of that market we currently possess," he said.

The People's Republic of China was the fourth leading importer of U.S. wheat last year, purchasing more than 100 million bushels, he said.

The team arrived in the United States on Sept. 8, visiting a variety of milling plants and wheat facilities until their in stay in Kansas. The entire visit was arranged by the U.S. Wheat Commission, and will end Sept. 24.

Bottom falls out of casket; pallbearer files damage suit

By The Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — A Lancaster County man has filed a lawsuit against two casket companies after the bottom fell out of a casket during a funeral in January.

Joseph Pearl filed the suit in Lancaster County District Court earlier this week against Thompson Casket Co. Inc., a Minnesota casket manufacturer, and Artco Casket Co., a Kansas City, Kan., firm which bought the casket from Thompson and sold it to an unnamed Lincoln mortuary, the suit said.

Pearl alleged that on Jan. 23, as he and other pallbearers were removing the casket from the hearse at the cemetery, the casket's bottom fell to the ground, striking Pearl's foot, and exposing the deceased's body to Pearl.

He is asking for $150 to cover medical bills and an unspecified amount in general damages.

Sedorcek in new position as golf coach

By TONY CARBAJO
Collegian Reporter

The transition from player to coach can often be a difficult one. K-State's women's golf coach Rob Sedorcek is battling at a young age to make the transition a smooth one.

Sedorcek, the ace of last year's men's squad, was asked to cross over to the coaching ranks after last year's women's coach, Lila Levin, stepped down from the position.

Sedorcek said being a coach has been a situation he hasn't experienced before.

"It is a different type atmosphere," he said. "I am used to following orders, not giving them. Now, I am having to give instructions to someone else."

Sedorcek said he has not worked with women much in the past, but sees no problems ahead. He has spent his past two summers being tutored by Stan Thirst, one of the best golf instructors in the Midwest and a teacher of Tom Watson.

Tough competition has been scheduled for the women this fall. Sedorcek said he believes that to be the best, you must play with the best.

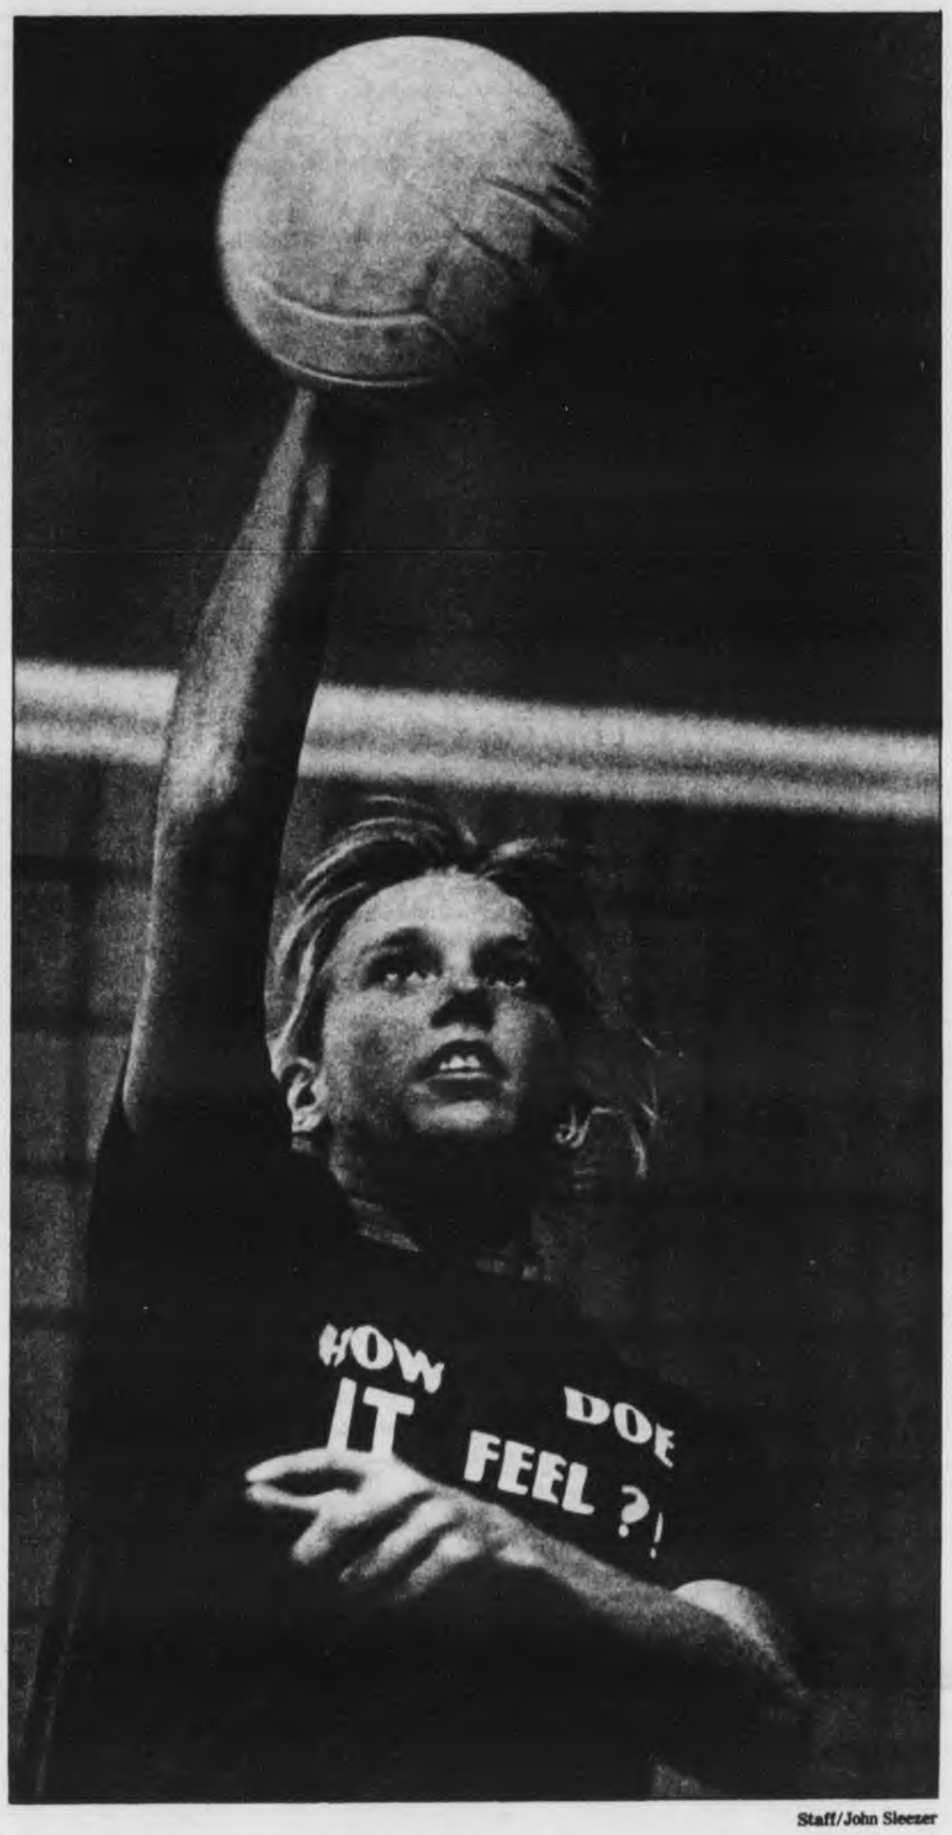
"If one wants to improve, they must play in a better competitive atmosphere," he said. "I want them to be put in the most competitive situations possible. So, we are jumping in right away at some tough schools."

Making K-State a "tough" golf school is a goal Sedorcek is trying to achieve. He said he believes with a little hard work it can be done.

"I want to sell the program and the school (to recruits). I want to get some good golfers up here," he said.

After finishing his eligibility last year, Sedorcek said, he wanted to be affiliated with the team in some capacity this season. When the unexpected opportunity came up for him to coach the women's team, he accepted.

Levin said she stepped down as coach because of the travel and her increased involvement in community interests.



"I had other interests to pursue," she said. "I didn't have the time to give to golf that it needed. My health wouldn't allow me to travel the way I wanted to."

Levin said she is pleased with the progress the team has made under her guidance. She said she believes the program is on the rise.

"I feel Rob will be good for the program because of his energetic attitude," she said.

Sedorcek said he wants to provide a positive atmosphere for the women to work in. He said this year's goal is for each woman to improve on last year's finish and to bring home at least one tournament trophy.

"I am excited about this season," he said.

Renee Whitney, senior co-captain for the K-State volleyball team, was ranked 10th in the nation last year as an attacker, and is a nominee for All-American in the season.

Concentration, desire key Whitney's success

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

The concentration can be seen on her face as she sets up and runs the offense. The concentration builds as she goes through practice and a conditioning program.

Concentration and hard work are what have earned Renee Whitney, setter and senior co-captain for the K-State volleyball team, the right to become a nominee for All-American for the 1985 season.

Last year Whitney was a first-team All-Big Eight selection, as well as being in charge of the offense which finished third in the conference and ranked among the top 20 nationally.

Whitney also led the team in both digs and assists with 304 and 1,062 respectively. She was selected as the team's Outstanding Player and was chosen as the Big Eight's Player of the Week. She finished as the conference's fourth leading attacker, good for 10th in the nation.

Being an All-America candidate is an honor Whitney said she is excited about, but she also sees her chance of becoming an All-American as a team honor.

"When Scott (Nelson) told me I was a nominee I was excited," Whitney said. "Having someone recognized as an All-American is a reflection on the team. Individuals couldn't get there without the team. If it happens that will be great and good for the team, but I don't think about it every day."

Whitney began her career and interest in volleyball while in junior high. She attended Manhattan High School and competed in all sports, but began to concentrate on volleyball her junior year.

"My sophomore year I decided I wanted to get a scholarship to play volleyball," she said. "So my junior year I became totally dedicated to it. When the basketball team would be practicing at one end, I would be at the other end working on my setting."

Following graduation from Manhattan High School, where as a two-time All I-70 Conference selection she helped the team to three league championships and three sub-state titles, Whitney decided where she wanted to continue her volleyball career.

"I did go to Nebraska to look at their program, but I didn't really fit in there," she said. "So I stayed here on the scholarship that Scott gave me."

Being from Manhattan made the transition from high school to college volleyball easier for Whitney.

"Usually when you go away to a school everything is new," she said. "Plus you have to get settled. I was already settled and all I had to think about was volleyball."

Whitney said she has seen a number of changes take place during her four-year career at K-State.

"My freshman year everything was real basic — we just concentrated on getting good passes and then a good set. Now passing is one of our strengths and we run a real quick offense," Whitney said.

"When I first came here, our defense was our strength because we weren't real strong in other areas. Now, our all-around game is much more consistent."

By virtue of her position as a setter, Whitney has a lot of responsibility as a senior co-captain. She has to learn the Wildcat hitters, know the offensive tactics that are most beneficial and be aware of the opponents' defenses.

'Having someone recognized as an All-American is a reflection on the team. Individuals couldn't get there without the team. If it happens that will be great and good for the team, but I don't think about it every day.'
— Renee Whitney

"I do a lot of thinking off the court while I'm at home," she said. "I look at the lineup and look and see what hitters I will have and think through what type of set they work best off of. Then once I get on the court I feel more comfortable with what I have to do."

Her awareness on the court involves identifying with the opposing team's defense, how many blockers are being used and then setting to the hitter who has the best advantage over the defense.

One thing that Whitney said she believes has led to the success of the Wildcats is competing in the United States Volleyball Association during the spring, which puts K-State on a yearlong training schedule.

"During USVBA it gives us a chance to rebuild for next year. We play in a lot of tournaments and the competition is so stiff it really challenges you," Whitney said. "The spring season allows us to work on new things, because it is not as critical of a time as during the Big Eight season."

After the USVBA season, Whitney earned first-team All-Mid America region honors and was chosen as the Most Valuable Player of the regional championships.

Whitney's volleyball career with K-State will end this season, but she plans on continuing her love for the game in other areas.

"I've thought about playing in a professional league," she said. "They are all over in Italy and Europe. I'm not ready to quit playing yet."

Alumni team downs K-State in tight rugby battle, 14-12

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Rugby Football Club's alumni team defeated the current K-State squad 14-12 in a game played last Saturday afternoon.

The alumni team took an early 3-0 lead on a penalty kick by lock Steve Stone. K-State tied the score moments later as center Willie Knopick scored on a penalty kick of his own.

Wing Bill Bequette then stole a K-State pass and scored a try to put the alumni team back on top, 7-3. Knopick converted another penalty kick for K-State just before halftime to make the score 7-6.

The second half opened with Bequette scoring a try off a blocked kick to make the score 11-6 in favor of the alumni. K-State came back to take a 12-11 lead as prop Darren Granneman scored a try and Knopick was able to add the conversion.

In the final minutes of the contest, fullback Jim Hewitt scored on a penalty kick to give the alumni the lead, 14-12.

The squad will travel to Topeka Saturday for the Kaw Valley Cup Tournament.

Ewing signs lucrative contract with Knicks

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Patrick Ewing, saying he is not St. Patrick let alone a franchise savior, signed a contract Wednesday with the New York Knicks that makes him the highest-paid rookie ever in pro basketball and one of the richest ever in professional sports.

The value and length of the contract were not disclosed by Ewing, the Knicks or ProServ Inc., the Washington-based agency that handled the negotiations for the 7-foot center from Georgetown University. Estimates ranged from five to seven years and from $12 million to $15 million.

But at a Madison Square Garden news conference announcing the signing, Donald Dell, chairman of ProServ, said Ewing "will be the highest-paid rookie ever in the NBA."

Ewing, regarded as the best defensive center to come out of college since Bill Russell in the 1950s, said he felt no pressure to turn around the Knicks' fortunes by himself. New York finished 24-58 last year and earned the right to draft Ewing No. 1 in the National Basketball Association's June draft by winning a lottery among the seven worst teams in the NBA.

In his four years at Georgetown, the Hoyas went to the finals of the NCAA Championship Tournament three times, winning the title in 1984. He averaged 14.6 points and 9.2 rebounds a game as a senior.

"I have nothing to be worried about," Ewing said. "All I can do is play as hard as I can. I don't consider myself a savior. I'm not Jesus, or even St. Patrick."

Dave DeBusschere, the Knicks' vice president in charge of basketball operations, called the signing "a significant day in the history of New York. We all look forward to seeing the great attitude and determination of this young man."

"I feel great and I'm glad it's over," Ewing said. "I can get down to what I do best and that's playing ball. I left negotiations to my lawyers because I didn't want to pressure them. I spent my summer preparing myself to play."

Knicks Coach Hubie Brown said Ewing will play both center and power forward for the Knicks, rotating at those positions with Bill Cartwright, who was injured all last season, and Pat Cummings.

Rosen begins shake-up to put Giants on top

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Al Rosen put the last-place San Francisco Giants on notice Wednesday that none of their jobs are safe and that changes will be coming as he takes on the challenge of turning the club around.

Rosen's first move as president and general manager, replacing Tom Haller, was to name former Detroit pitching coach Roger Craig as field manager, replacing Jim Davenport. Rosen said he also will hire Bob Kennedy, his former assistant with the Houston Astros.

"1986 will be a year when the Giants will be competitive," Rosen said. "We promise that. There will be changes made. I'm not afraid to change."

Power, pitching and speed will be emphasized in trades the Giants make, he said.

Rosen said he will have more authority to shape the Giants because he will have financial responsibilities that Haller didn't have. Haller, a former Giants catcher who held the titles of vice president and general manager, was not offered another job with the club.

Club owner Bob Lurie said Haller will seek a job as a field manager elsewhere and that Davenport will talk with Rosen about taking another job with the Giants. Davenport left with a 56-88 record in his only season as a manager.

In turning over more control of the club to Rosen, Lurie said, "Al Rosen was my first and only choice for this job. I felt very keenly the need to bring in someone who is first and foremost a top baseball talent, someone with a proven record of judging talent and putting successful teams on the field."

Baseball drug trial continues

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — The attorney for a Philadelphia caterer accused of dealing cocaine to major league baseball players said Wednesday more players weren't called as defense witnesses because "their squirming and squeeching on the witness stand" wouldn't help his client.

Adam O. Renfroe Jr., attorney for Curtis Strong, 39, rested his case Wednesday after calling one baseball figure, Pittsburgh Pirates Manager Chuck Tanner, as a defense witness.

"I am confident every base has been touched," Renfroe said.

U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond said he will give the case to the jury Thursday afternoon after Renfroe and U.S. Attorney J. Alan Johnson deliver their closing arguments. Renfroe promised a rough-and-tumble session.

"It's going to be a street fight," he said. "There's going to be a rumble in that courtroom."

Johnson exhibited for reporters the chart he will display to the jurors that will summarize the 14 cocaine distribution counts against Strong and correlate them with the players who allegedly bought the drugs and the teams they were playing for at the time.

Renfroe said he decided not to put any players on the witness stand because they possibly would have been prejudiced against his client.

"We subpoenaed a number of players. We talked to a number of players and their attorneys. But we decided their interests would be selfishly motivated in this case," Renfroe said.

"They would be forced to testify against other players," Renfroe said. "For that reason, we decided it wouldn't be in the best interest of Curtis Strong to call them, that they wouldn't be effective witnesses."

Renfroe previously had promised to call "five or six" players to rebut testimony of seven current or former players who claimed Strong sold them cocaine and was well-known as a drug distributor among National League players.

Strong, employed briefly as a clubhouse cook for the Philadelphia Phillies this season, is charged with distributing cocaine to players on 14 dates from 1980 to 1984 when the Pittsburgh Pirates played home games.

Renfroe said he considered calling St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Joaquin Andujar, Pittsburgh Pirates first base coach Willie Stargell and Hall of Fame outfielder Willie Mays as witnesses.

But he said he decided after a luncheon meeting Tuesday with Andujar that, because the 21-game winner had received immunity from the government, "why should he come forth and help me?"

Andujar, the first consecutive National League 20-game winner in a decade, was identified as a cocaine user in earlier testimony by former Cardinals teammates Lonnie Smith and Keith Hernandez.

Stargell, the NL co-Most Valuable Player on the Pirates' 1979 championship team, was named by former teammates Dale Berra and Dave Parker as a distributor of amphetamines in the team's locker room.

Mays' name unexpectedly surfaced in the 12-day trial last week when former Pirates outfielder John Milner said he once tasted a liquid amphetamine called "red juice" that he obtained from Mays' locker in the early 1970s while both were with the New York Mets. Mays vehemently denied the charge.

Renfroe did not name the other players he said he subpoenaed as possible witnesses.

Mariners down K.C. on three-hit shutout

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Bill Swift, Roy Thomas and Ed Nunez combined on a three-hitter and the Seattle Mariners continued their mastery over the Kansas City Royals with a 6-0 victory Wednesday night.

Fifth-place Seattle, which shut out Kansas City 7-0 on Tuesday night, extended the Royals' scoreless-inning string to 26.

Swift gave up one hit and struck out three before being replaced by Thomas at the start of the fourth. The Mariners said Swift left because of a groin strain suffered in the third.

Thomas, 7-0, gave up one hit in 4 ⅔ innings and Nunez allowed one hits the rest of the way.

The Mariners, who won for the ninth time in their last 12 games, pinned the loss on Mark Gubicza, 13-8, who walked six before being relieved by Mark Huismann with two on and no out in the third.

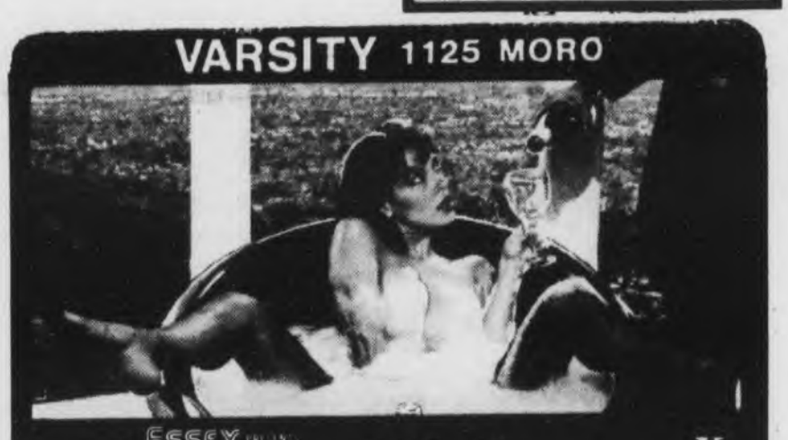
Gubicza, who had won four straight games, worked to a 3-2 count against seven of the 15 batters he faced, walking five of them. He got out of a one-out jam after two walks in the first, striking out Gorman Thomas and getting im Presley on a fly ball.

But in the second, Dave Henderson doubled through the gap in right-center and moved to third on a bunt single by John Moses. Henderson scored on an infield single by Spike Owen. A bases-loaded walk to Alvin Davis brought in another run.

'Cats to make video, poster with students

By The Collegian Staff

The "Cats Are Back" is the theme for the 1985-86 women's basketball team and the team hopes to solicit student support in promoting that theme.



The team is making a poster and video at 3 p.m. today and students can become involved. Interested fans are asked to meet on the east side of Ahearn Field House, dressed in purple, to be a part of the poster, media guide and video.

The picture for the poster will be taken outside with the video to be filmed inside. The video will be used as a recruiting tool and as a part of the highlight film at the end of the year.

The K-State Marching Band and cheerleaders will be in attendance and an autograph and photo session will follow.

Manhattan residence burglarized

A home in the Prairie South Addition off Kansas 177 south of Manhattan was broken into and vandalized recently. Damages of more than $3,500 were reported to the Riley County Police Department.

The crime occurred between July 15 and Aug. 15. Entry to the house was gained by breaking out a 4- by 2-foot window on the residence's west side. Several doors throughout the house also were opened, letting rain onto the oak flooring. Several windows in the house were broken and window screens were cut.

Information on this or any other crime may be reported to Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers need not identify themselves and may qualify for a cash reward of up to $1,000.

The following callers are asked to contact Crime Stoppers this week 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday: D-85-0004, D-85-0015, D-85-0034 and F-85-0014.

allowing a direct line to campus officers. He also suggested using a computer ticket tracking system encompassing the ticketing process from enrollment to the issuance of parking tickets. He estimated the cost at approximately $50,000.

Earl Nolting, dean of students and director for the Center for Student Development, suggested the money be used to renovate Holton Hall in one phase instead of three, thereby saving students money and ensuring the project would be completed by 1986-87 instead of 1993.

Paul Nelson, coordinator of the FONE Crisis Center, proposed using $5,000 to supplement the center's advertising allocation from student senate and purchase a computer system to be used in the center's referral program.

Ed Schiappas, assistant professor in speech and debate coach, proposed using the money in one of two ways. Schiappas said the squad could use $80,000 to $100,000 to be put in a general fund and use the interest from the fund or using $25,000 to $30,000 in a short-term program over a three-year period.

John Markiewicz, chairman of the board of directors for the Child Care Cooperative, said he wants to use the money to renovate three wings of Jardine Terrace to be used as child care facilities. He estimates this will cost $88,000.

Steve Scott, fifth year student in architectural engineering and representative of KSU for the Best Coliseum, proposed putting the $700,000 back into the coliseum fund.

Nancy Twiss, adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, said the money should be used to set up a scholarship fund.

Students with additional ideas may turn them into the Student Government Services office. Each proposal must be in writing and contain a reference person and phone number.

Mobil appeals to recover natural gas

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — There will be a "tragic waste" of natural gas in the Hugoton field of southwest Kansas unless infill drilling is allowed to begin very soon, the lead witness for Mobil Oil Corp. told the Kansas Corporation Commission Wednesday.

George H. Liveris of Englewood, Colo., said the Hugoton field represents a vital energy source for the United States as the 21st Century approaches and there is an urgent need to takes steps now to gain maximum production from the field.

Liveris was the first of five witnesses scheduled to testify for Mobil in hearings before the KCC on an application to permit twice as many wells in the Hugoton field as have been allowed for the past 40 years.

He outlined Mobil's case, then turned the stand over to four other witnessses for the company's technical testimony.

The first was Eileen A. McMullin of Lakewood, Colo., a production geologist for Mobil who will return to the stand Thursday, when the KCC hopes to conclude the Mobil witnesses.

Foes of infill drilling include Northwest Central Pipeline Corp. which is scheduled to be first among the intervening opponents to present its witnesses. Other opponents include KPL Gas Service, Union Gas, Peoples Natural Gas, Northern Natural Gas and Panhandle Eastern Pipeline.

Liveris, who retired last January after working for Mobil for more than 30 years, was retained by that company as a consultant to testify in the infill drilling hearings. He supervised field development and evaluation for Mobil in the Hugoton field for the last 19 years.

"Because of the tremendous reserve potential yet to be produced and the declining reservoir pressures, the Kansas Hugoton field would not only command top priority as a producing field in Kansas, but would indeed demand our attention as a national energy source," Liveris said in his testimony.

"A prudent operator responsive to the need for conservation, protection of correlative rights and the best interests of the consumer would agree that immediate measures must be taken in the Kansas Hugoton field in order to prevent a tragic waste of a very large and valuable resource."

The hearings, which began in late July and will run at least five more weeks, will recess Thursday afternoon and resume Monday in Wichita, when opponents may begin presenting their witnesses.

Proponents, mainly gas production companies and royalty owners, contend that unless infill drilling is permitted a significant amount of natural gas never will be recovered from the field — the largest ever discovered in the U.S. They said disconnected reservoirs of gas will never be tapped unless additional wells are drilled.

Opponents, mainly pipeline and gas distribution companies, argue there is no market for the additional gas infill drilling would produce, the "new" gas could be sold at a higher price under federal deregulation and that will mean increased cost of energy to consumers.

Liveris said a study done by Mobil on 25 wells in the Nix area of the Hugoton field indicated that 20 to 25 percent of the gas will never be recovered just using existing wells, and that drilling a second well on each 640-acre section would allow recovery of about half the untapped gas.

McMullin, who has worked for Mobil five years, said she has spent the past 18 months making a geologic study of the Chase formations in the Hugoton field.

"My geologic study has led me to believe that, due to the great variability in porosity and permeability for formations in the Chase, the existing boreholes do not effectively and efficiently drain the Chase formations at the current spacing of 640 acres," she said.

Farm credit banks ask for more federal funds

By The Associated Press

JACKSON, Wyo. — The Farm Credit Corp. of America will need federal money if it is to continue providing credit and related services to U.S. farmers, the group's president said Wednesday.

Alton B. Cook, president of the Farm Credit Corp., said the boards of directors of the nation's 37 Farm Credit System banks have agreed to ask the federal government for money. He blamed the depressed farm economy for the banks having to take the action.

Speaking at the corporation's annual national directors' conference here, Cook said the boards of the system banks agreed to authorize a special committee to seek such assistance.

The special legislative committee will be composed of three system directors and three bank presidents. The directors are Armstead M. Feland III of North Little Rock, Ark.; Grant Lucas of Ceres, Calif., and Ray Moss Tucker of Finchville, Ky. The presidents are Gene Swackhamer of the Baltimore District; Burgee Amdahl of the St. Paul, Minn., District, and Douglas D. Sims of the St. Louis District.

The Farm Credit System is a nationwide network of borrower-owned financial institutions organized as cooperatives.

Truck, bus collision kills one, injures three

By The Associated Press

STEVENS POINT, Wis. — A school bus collided with a truck that burst into flames, killing the truck driver as the eight children aboard the bus scrambled to safety, authorities said.

Two of the children suffered minor injuries and a passenger in the truck suffered second-degree burns.

Henry Goebel, 56, of rural Horicon, died of asphyxiation in the smoke and flames that engulfed his truck as it lay on its side beside the bus, said Portage County Coroner Scott Rifleman.

The bus was on a route that picks up about 20 students in kindergarten through high school for the Waupaca School District in adjoining Waupaca County.

The bus was turning into a rural driveway on Wisconsin 54 about 7 a.m. when the truck that had been following collided with it and overturned, spilling fuel, sheriff's deputies said. Both vehicles skidded into a roadside ditch and were destroyed in the flames.

Several students escaped out the back door of the bus while driver Marlin G. Standke grabbed two others and pulled them out a side door, deputies said.

as being "in good mental and physical condition," the spokesman added.

He said the United States had "absolutely" made no deal with the terrorists who had held Weir. "Our position on negotiating with terrorists is very clear," he said.

Asked if the United States had given up anything to win Weir's release, the spokesman said, "I'm not going to get into that."

Djerejian refused to answer questions on why only Weir had been freed.

But he said that "we have been in contact with several governments" in the drive to free the other Americans. He said Syria, widely believed to have influence with the terrorists, had "not specifically" helped these efforts.

According to Djerejian, officials had hoped the release last week of the last Lebanese prisoners held at Israel's Atlit prison camp "would improve the atmosphere in the region." Following the release, he said, "We did enhance our efforts."

Vice President George Bush has scheduled a meeting Friday with the families of the six remaining kidnapped Americans.

Another White House spokesman, Peter Roussel, said the president told Weir the United States would continue its efforts until all the hostages are freed. Roussel said those efforts would include "prayer as well as diplomacy."

He quoted Reagan as telling the freed American, "You are an inspiration to the people of this country and to all who might find themselves in situations of similar adversity."

A native of Salt Lake City, Weir graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary. He served as a pastor in Oakland, Calif. and as a U.S. Army chaplain before being appointed to Lebanon as a missionary in 1953. Fluent in Arabic, he worked with the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon and was actve in humanitarian activities and relief programs in Lebanon.

When Weir was kidnapped, a man claiming to represent Islamic Holy War or Islamic Jihad, a terrorist group, told the French news agency Agence France Press that his organization was behind the incident.

The caller said Weir's abduction was meant to "reiterate our commitment to the first statement we made after the U.S. Marine headquarters blast that we won't allow any American on Lebanese soil."

The group had claimed responsibility for the Oct. 23, 1983 truck bombing of Marine headquarters at Beirut airport, which killed 241, as well as attacks on a French paratroop building in Beirut and an Israeli post in southern Lebanon.

Dole said that while the Senate would not act this year, he feels support will still be there at the beginning of next year — in effect, a delay of only a few months.

Reagan, however, said Wednesday that politicians who maintain popular interest in his tax overhaul plan is nearly dead are themselves out of touch with the American people.

"America wants tax reform; America deserves tax reform," Reagan said on the steps of the statehouse here. "If we stand together, America is going to get tax reform."

"There are politicians in Washington — some of the same ones who constructed this tax code monstrosity — who say you, the American people, are not interested in tax reform," Reagan said. "The political establishment back in Washington says you don't care about these things. I say the Washington establishment is out of touch with the people."

Spies

Tass initially reported that "a number of" Britons were being expelled for "impermissible activities," and that the Soviet Union had resolutely protested their actions. A later dispatch told the Soviet public there were 62 Britons and Soviets involved.

The cycle of ejections reduced the number of British citizens in Moscow from 103 to 72 and the number of Soviets in London from 234 to 203.

Britain started the scrap by expelling 25 alleged Soviet agents last Thursday on information provided by Oleg A. Gordievski, 46, identified by the Foreign Office as the KGB station chief in Britain who defected recently and received political asylum. Gordievski is reported to have been a double agent for up to 15 years.

The Soviet Union responded on Saturday, ignoring London's warning not to retaliate and ordering an equal number of Britons out of Moscow.

On Monday, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's government expelled six more men it said were second-rank intelligence operatives, and the Kremlin matched that Wednesday by ejecting six more Britons.

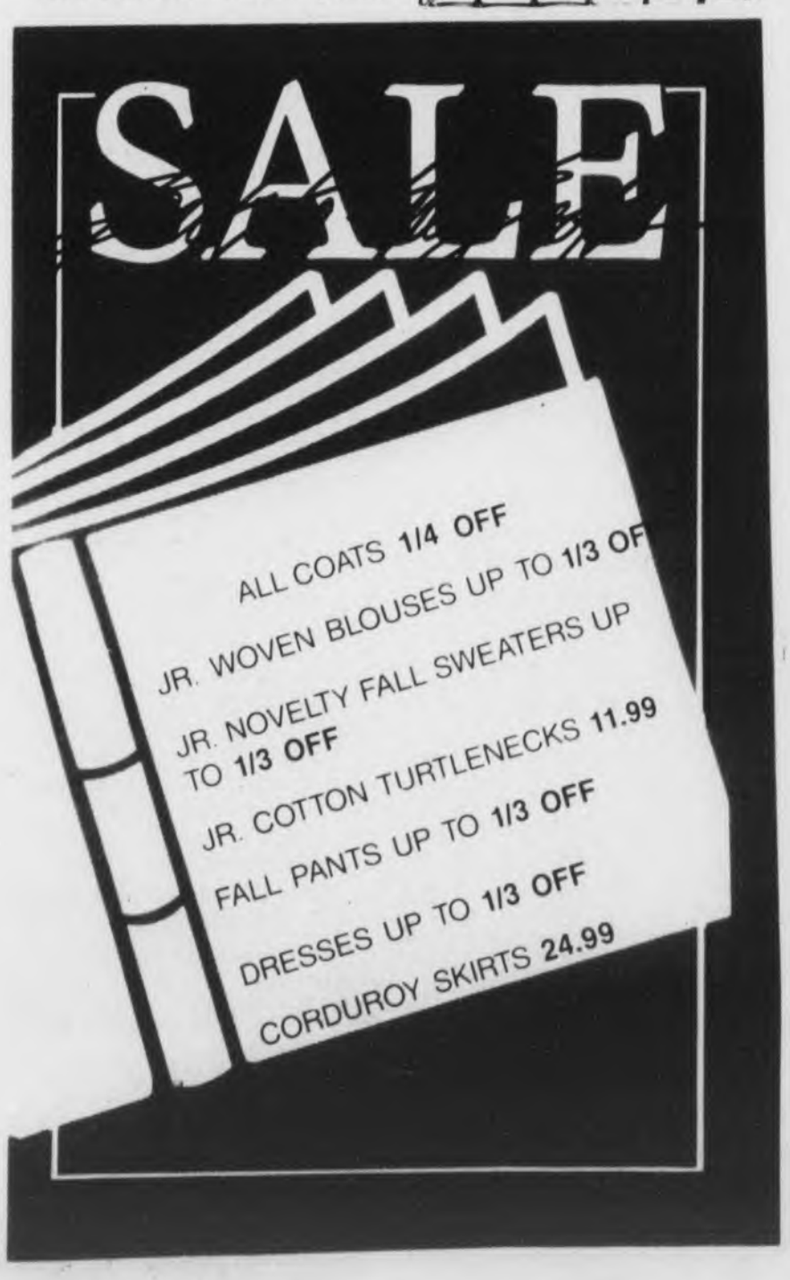
Those declared unwelcome by both sides were allowed three weeks to leave.

It was the biggest spy confrontation between Britain and the Soviet Union since 1971, when London kicked out 105 alleged Soviet spies. The Kremlin reacted mildly, expelling only 18 Britons, 10 of whom had already left the Soviet Union, and the matter ended there.

The only expulsions since were in a series of exchanges between 1981 and April of this year that cost the Soviets 12 alleged spies and Britain 8.

Sir Geoffrey Howe, Britain's foreign secretary, said Wednesday in London: "The Soviet Union must bear the full responsibilty for this lamentable episode. This severe setback to United Kingdom-Soviet relations was not of our choosing."

Both he and Mrs. Thatcher expressed hope that relations would improve over the long run.



When Gorbachev visited Britain last December, as No. 2 man in the Soviet leadership, Mrs. Thatcher and many British officials were impressed by his style and performance. The prime minister said: "I like Mr. Gorbachev. We can do business together."

Asked Wednesday whether she still felt she could do business with him, she paused, then said: "Yes, but men can be difficult sometimes."

Britain said Gordievski's defection gave it a major gain in the East-West intelligence contest. The KGB agent "was in a position to know full details of Soviet intelligence activities and personnel in this country," the Foreign Office said.

Britain's hope for better relations was evidenced Wednesday when the Foreign Office confirmed that Howe still intends to meet with the new Soviet foreign minister, Eduard A. Shevardnadze, next week in New York. Both will be attending the 40th anniversary session of the U.N. General Assembly.

Quake cripples Mexico, kills more than 170

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — A devastating earthquake struck central Mexico on Thursday, toppling hundreds of buildings in the world's most populous capital during the morning rush hour and causing widespread damage for hundreds of miles. Police said at least 170 were dead and thousands injured, and unofficial reports put fatalties much higher.

The government declared a national disaster emergency and placed the armed forces under maximum alert. Banks were ordered closed so the guards could help patrol Mexico City, 250 miles inland from the quake's center on the Pacific Coast.

"Unfortunately there appear to be many dead," President Miguel de la Madrid said on Mexican television. "All of the hospitals are on a state of alert to take care of the injured. The army is in a state of alert."

Telephone and most other communications remained cut off hours after the quake.

At least 60 were dead in Mexico City, a city of 17 million people, where schools, hotels, hospitals and high-rises were flattened and snapped gas and power lines touched off dozens of fires.

In the state of Jalisco 110 to 150 people were killed and about 1,500 persons were injured, Lt. Juan Manuel Sanchez said from the fire department's headquarters in the state capital of Guadalajara. Most of the dead were in the towns of Guzman and Atentique, Sanchez said in a telphone interview broadcast live by the Bogota radio station Caracol.

The U.S. State Department said damage in Acapulco was light. The Mexican Embassy in Washington reported damage in the states of Jalisco, Guerrero and Michoacan.

In Ixtapa, a resort just north of Acapulco, two tourists reported their 10-story hotel was shaken and "the damage was just massive."

"Huge chunks of cement and glass started crashing down and people ran out into open lobby," said Dale Zolnai, 45, a Defense Department staff specialist, who returned to Dallas on Thursday with his wife P.J.

State Department spokesman Bernard Kalb said the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City was undamaged and that communications with the embassy had been restored.

First reports of the quake, which occurred just before rush hour at 7:18 a.m. or 9:18 a.m. EDT, came from the U.S. Geological Survey, which said it measured 7.8 on the Richter scale of ground motion. The survey put the epicenter on the Pacific Coast, 150 miles northwest of Acapulco and about 250 miles southwest of Mexico City.

Radio station XEQ in Mexico City said it had confirmed reports of 250 dead, and the SIN television network said without attribution that deaths were estimated up to 300.

The center of the city appeared to be hardest hit. Dust clouds surrounded collapsed buildings; broken glass and concrete chunks littered the streets everywhere, and people gathered in crowds on the streets, many weeping and some fainting.

Interviews seen on government-owned Channel 13, monitored in Bogota, Colombia, were sometimes drowned as people screamed out the names of loved ones. Men, women and children could be heard crying and wailing as they wandered through rubble-strewn streets.

It said there had been 10 aftershocks by 4

Temperatures may cool off in buildings

By RICH HARRIS
Collegian Reporter

Air conditioning service may be restored by 7 a.m. today to 13 campus buildings affected by a break in an underground chilled water pipe discovered Sunday morning.

Jack Watson, general superintendent of physical plant shops, said temporary repairs on the pipe should be completed in time for the system to begin cooling this morning. Final repairs will not be completed until at least next week.

"We're in mud up to our eyeballs," Watson said.

The break is in a 90-degree bend in a pipe that connects the power plant chilling system with the main chilling plant. The pipes that connect the two are 21 years old, but the pipes in the rest of the system are new. The system was designed to operate at 47 pounds of pressure per square inch, but Watson said it now operates at between 87 and 100 pounds of pressure per square inch.

The current repairs involve securing the pipe to a section of underground tunnel and using wooden braces to absorb the shock as the water flows through the pipe.

Vincent Cool, director of Architectural/Planning services for the Division of University Facilities said any time there was a bend in a piping system, the pressure of fluid moving through that bend is "attempting to blow that corner apart." Normally, he said, a concrete plate several feet thick is poured at the bend to absorb the pressure. This was not done in the bend between the power plant and the chilling plant.

Cool said there was no way for the new chilling plant's design engineers to know that this had not been done, and that the pressure changes alone should not have been sufficient to break the pipe. The change in pressure coupled with the lack of an absorption device may have been the cause for the break.

The break in the water pipe was discovered Sunday. On Tuesday Watson estimated repairs would cost the University nearly $10,000, and said the funds would come from existing University Facilities' budget.

The buildings affected include Marlatt Hall, Goodnow Hall, Kramer Food Center, Ackert Hall, Cardwell Hall, Farrell Library, Durland Hall, the western section of Seaton Hall, Kedzie Hall, Lafene Student Health Center, the Union, Holtz Hall and the third floor of Eisenhower Hall.

Acker on list of 25 finalists at Iowa State

From Staff and Wire Reports

University President Duane Acker was included on a list of names released Wednesday of top applicants for the presidency of Iowa State University, officials said.

A list of 25 finalists for the job was released at the Iowa State Board of Regents meeting at the University of Iowa. Acker's name was among the finalists along with University of Nebraska President Ronald Roskens and University of Missouri Chancellor Barbara Uehling.

Acker was unavailable for comment, but Cy Wainscott, University Relations news editor, said Acker's position is that "he is not going to comment on that issue, (the ISU presidency)."

The list of applicants will now be forwarded to a search committee which includes ISU administrators, faculty, students and alumni. The committee is expected to trim the list to six names which will be presented to the Iowa regents by Nov. 1.

John McDonald, regents president, said the board will interview the six candidates before making a selection.

McDonald said he was disappointed there were not more than 50 applicants and added that publicity surrounding the search might have deterred some potential applicants.

William Tipping, of Heidrick and Struggles, Inc., Chicago, a firm hired to do the search, said more than 50 people nominated for the post did not apply. He said the public nature of the search was a main reason for declining.

"While I am pleased with the list of the top 25 prospects, I am very concerned that only 50 or so persons were in the pool of prospects for the position," McDonald said. "This is substantially less than the board had for the University of Northern Iowa and University of Iowa presidential searches where the process was not public until four or five semifinalists were presented to the board."

The ISU presidential post will become vacant after the school year when W. Robert Parks, current ISU president, reaches the state's mandatory retirement age of 70.

Acker, in his 11th year as president, held positions at ISU, University of Nebraska, South Dakota State University and Oklahoma State University before becoming president of the University.

He earned his bachelor's and master's degrees at ISU and hisdoctorate from OSU in animal nutrition.

Student recounts apartheid domination

Passbooks, curfews exemplify restraint

By J. SCOTT HOLT
Collegian Reporter

Kehla Medluli, freshman in business education, was born and raised under the grim auspices of "apartheid," the official segregation policy of the South African government.

Apartheid's literal translation is "separate" and the segregation of South Africa is so total and yet so discreet that even "freedom fighters" don't notice the complete domination it has on their lives, Medluli said.

Violence over racial segregation has been going on in South Africa for centuries, but has escalated since 1976. More than 20 million blacks and "coloreds" live in South Africa compared to 2.4 million whites.

Medluli said he believes revolution in South Africa is imminent and he is studying at K-State to prepare for the day he can return to help his country.

Medluli said he believes armed resistance is the only way to make the South African government change. All peaceful means of protest have been met with brutal force. The only thing that makes the whites superior is their guns, Medluli said.

Blacks are not allowed to have a firearm of any kind.

"The experience of other countries has shown armed reaction is the only way — specifically against security forces," Medluli said. "If we can show that we can get guns and show South African security police that we are capable of overriding them, then we should do that in order to facilitate our freedom."

Medluli deeply disagrees with several types of restraint imposed by the oppressive South African government and still cannot feel relaxed in the relative freedom of the white-majority atmosphere of Manhattan.

"It is difficult to realize you can share everything," Medluli said. "I'm still defensive and withdrawn and still have somewhat of an inferiority complex. It will take time to get used to (being in the United States)."

Medluli was born in Soweto, a sprawling all-black suburb of Johannesburg. If a black person is caught in the white-designated areas of Johannesburg after 6 p.m. without a special permit, that person is arrested, fined, or both. A black person is considered a non-citizen of South Africa with no voting rights.

Blacks must carry a "passbook" at all times. A passbook contains positive identification, an employment classification and a stamp that shows where the official designated homeland of the black is, as well as where the black is supposed to be.

Medluli said it is common to have passbooks checked 10 times during one day. The passbook law is one the three basic policies to which Medluli strenuously objects.

Student Senate votes to assist United Way

By MARY ROEHL

Student Senate approved legislation calling for support of the 1985 United Way fund-raising activities and a bill establishing the Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee at its weekly meeting Thursday in the Union Big Eight room.

The United Way resolution, sponsored by Sandi Schmidt, senior in political science, calls for senate support of the campus fund-raiser.

An amendment changing the wording of the legislation was proposed by Daniel Grubb, graduate in mathematics. Grubb suggested the bill read that senate support the campaign by donation of time or money "except for those programs promoting religious viewpoints."

"I don't believe it should be our position as a branch of state government to promote religion," Grubb said. "The Salvation Army's (member of the United Way organization) original charter was to promote Christianity."

Senate defeated the amendment.

The ad hoc committee legislation states the committee will consist of five student senators and three at-large student members. The committee will be selected by a committee consisting of the Families flee fighting in Tripoli

TRIPOLI, Lebanon — Syrian-backed fighters pushed ahead in house-to-house fighting Thursday between Moslem rivals seeking control of Lebanon's second largest city. Scores of people have been killed and nearly 300 wounded in five days.

Most of the victims were civilians, as is usual in the decade of civil war that has cost the lives of some 100,000 Lebanese.

Thousands of families have fled Tripoli. Those remaining behind huddled in bunkers or basements to escape the withering fire exchanged by militiamen battling through residential and commercial districts.

Police reported at least six people killed Thursday, three of them militiamen, and 83 wounded. The new casualties raised the known toll since fighting began Sunday to at least 82 dead and 294 wounded.

Fighting engulfed most of the city, which is 50 miles north of Beirut and has about 500,000 residents in normal times.

State radio said a committee of the army, Islamic Unification and the Syrian-backed Arabian Knights called a cease-fire for 3 p.m. It was the first time since Monday that the Arabian Knights leadership attended a eeting of the committee.

The Tripoli fighting has threatened to wreck peace efforts sponsored by Syria, which is trying to end the 10-year-old Moslem-Christian civil war and factional feuding among private Moslem armies.

Gas explosion draws convictions

PRAGUE, Czechoslovakia — Three construction company employees were convicted of negligence in connection with a June 1984 gas explosion in an apartment building that killed 15 people, the daily Svobodne Slovo reported Thursday.

The blast demolished a 12-apartment building at Trinec-Lyzbice, northern Moravia.

Svobodne Slovo reported that a gas line outside the building was uncovered by workers reconstructing a nearby hot-water pipe. The workers failed to secure the sides of the excavation properly, according to the paper. A mudslide following heavy rains caused a gas leak and explosion, the paper said.

Thai archaeologists find artifacts

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia — Archaeologists said Thursday they have found gold coins, jars and other artifacts believed to be remnants of a 15th-century Thai civilization.

The national news agency Bernama quoted Jaafar Mohamad Ali, assistant curator of the National Museum in Kuala Lumpur, as saying he and his team found coins and jars Wednesday near Kampung Limbungan near Besut, 240 miles northeast of the capital and about 60 miles south of the current Thai border.

The news agency quoted Jaafar as saying the find included 17 cone-shaped gold pieces, multicoloured pearls and a metal swordlike object.

Jaafar said Kampung Limbungan has been declared out of bounds to the public since area residents reported finding 18 jars there containing ancient weapons two months ago.

"Reagan's work on the Screen Actors Guild was excellent training for what he became," Grant said. "Our business, you know, involves a huge number of unions and he had to learn about them and a lot of other businesses."

He added, "What I really admire most about Ron and Nancy is their admiration for each other."

McKellen was in Athens for two performances of "Coriolanus" by Britain's National Theater at the 1,800-year-old Roman amphitheater of Herod Atticus beneath the Acropolis.

2 to stand trial for sexual abuse

CARSON CITY, Nev. — A former baby sitter and her nephew, charged with sexually abusing and taking pornographic pictures of 14 children in the woman's care, have been ordered to stand trial.

Carson Justice Court Judge John Ray ruled Wednesday in the case of Martha Felix, charged with 34 counts of child abuse, and Francisco "Paco" Ontiveros, facing eight counts.

Felix, 37, and Ontiveros, 33, are accused of performing sexual acts on children as young as 8 months old, of taking pictures of the naked children and of forcing the youngsters to have sex with each other while being photographed.

They also are charged with threatening the children with knives, guns and a cattle prod while the baby-sitting service operated from 1981 until late 1984.

Someone places cross by runway

GRAPEVINE, Texas — A white cross has been placed anonymously near a runway at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport in memory of crash victims of Delta Air Lines Flight 191 and a Japan Air Lines flight, airport officials said.

"Obviously, someone was moved to place the cross there in hopes that it would speak to many," said airport spokesman Joe Dealey Jr.

"It's regrettable that whoever or whatever group placed it there did not stay around long enough to be identified. It's a very touching thing," he said.

Dealey said the memorial, erected along a runway approach, would be allowed to remain for a "reasonable amount of time."

The Aug. 2 Delta crash claimed 136 lives. The JAL Boeing 747 crashed into a mountain on a domestic flight Aug. 12, killing 520 people.

Group files suit to review records

TOPEKA — The Lawrence-based Nuclear Awareness Network on Thursday filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court here to issue an injunction forcing the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission to produce records concerning the agency's review and inspection of the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington.

Stevi Stephens, nuclear awareness president, said in her lawsuit her group was improperly denied access to a variety of NRC records on Wolf Creek despite the requests under the Freedom of Information Act.

Stephens said in the suit the federal agency, which regulates the nuclear power industry in the United States, was withholding "secret documents from the public which are crucial to assuring that the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant has been safely constructed, thoroughly investigated and properly licensed."

The NRC refused to provide documents that Stephens said are not exempt from the Freedom of Information Act. The documents pertain to the controversial Quality First program established by Kansas Gas and Electric Co. of Wichita, the lead owner of Wolf Creek.

The program was aimed at assuring quality control at the project. It set up a procedure for employees or former workers at Wolf Creek to air grievances about management or anonymously report waste, poor work or safety problems.

Court delivers ruling on alcohol

TOPEKA — When an officer swears that a person arrested for suspicion of driving under the influence of alcohol refused to take a blood test he had better do it ceremoniously or it won't count, the Kansas Court of Appeals ruled Thursday.

The court affirmed a decision by Judge Herb Rohleder of Barton County District Court setting aside driver's license suspensions against Kenneth F. Yates and Kevin R. Burton because the officers who arrested them on suspicion of DUI failed to meet a statutory requirement that their chemical test refusal reports must be "verified on oath" before a notary public.

The appellate court agreed with Rohleder that such verification requires the officers either to place their right hands on a Bible or to raise them when swearing to the accuracy of their reports.

Accident kills construction worker

CHANUTE — A Missouri construction worker was killed in an accident on a paving project near Chanute in southeastern Kansas Wednesday, the Neosho County Sheriff's Department said.

The victim was identified as Melvin Campbell, 36, of Hatfield, Mo.

The sheriff's office said Campbell, who was working for an Iowa firm on the project, was sitting in the cab of a cement truck dumping a load of cment when a piece of pivot metal broke and sent the bed of the truck into the cab.

Economic 'plight' continues to change

Debt plagues third-world nations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The economic plight of many developing countries eased somewhat last year, but a growing tide of protectionist sentiment threatens to reverse the small gains, the World Bank said Thursday.

"By the dismal standards of the early 1980s, 1984 was a good year for developing countries," said the bank, the largest source of loans to poor nations.

The annual report said economic growth in developing countries averaged 3.8 percent last year, up substantially from the 2.1 percent growth rates in both 1982 and 1983. However, the bank said performance varied widely.

Many African nations, hit by drought and famine, suffered further declines in economic activity last year while Latin American nations, seeking to cope with severe debt problems, enjoyed a major turnaround.

Growth in Latin American countries averaged 2.8 percent last year following two years of decline, although the report noted that this advance barely kept ahead of the increase in population.

Much of the gain by developing countries came from a surge in sales of their products on overseas markets. A 7.5 percent rise in exports allowed the developing nations to post a $14.2 billion trade surplus last year, the first such trade surplus ever recorded by developing nations.

The United States, bolstered by a 6.8 percent rise in economic activity, was given much of the credit for the advance in sales by developing nations.

"The United States has provided the main stimulus — indeed, almost the only important stimulus — to the global recovery," the bank said.

However, the import flood, which continued this year, has left the United States facing a record $150 billion trade deficit, slashed U.S. growth and spawned growing demands for legislation to limit imports to save U.S. jobs.

The World Bank, which has 148 member nations, said the threat of protectionist measures in the United States and other industrial countries was a "major concern" since developing countries critically need export sales to pay off their debt burdens and promote further economic growth.

The report was pessimistic about whether the protectionist fever could be abated, noting that further erosion in free trade "would seem likely" given high levels of unemployment and stagnant growth in many industrial countries.

In addition to boosting exports, many developing countries embarked on successful programs to slash imports as part of financial adjustment programs adopted to meet demands of private banks for repayment of loans.

These gains were accomplished through currency devaluations and other efforts to hold down domestic demand.

Washburn students lobby to pull out of ASK

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

A student movement to persuade Washburn University to drop out of the Associated Students of Kansas program has begun on that campus, said Michael Brooks, senior in marketing at Washburn and student body president.

Brooks said Wednesday the movement began with a base of four students who were dissatisfied with ASK's efforts on Washburn's behalf.

"They feel that ASK has let students down," Brooks said, "Mostly with the issue of the drinking age, I guess. This group also feels ASK has been unduly taking their money and that students have no choice about this."

The group feels that the $8,500 Washburn allocates its ASK organization could be better spent on private lobbying efforts, Brooks said.

"They feel that since we're not a state institution and not part of the regents system we shouldn't be in ASK," he said.

Mark Groves, senior in accounting and finance at Washburn and ASK campus director, said students would have to pay a private lobbyist $4,000 to $5,000 for less representation than ASK provides for Washburn.

Washburn's ASK members wrote a list of things the organization had done specifically for the university, Brooks said, and estimated that their efforts had given students $126,000 of value in the last year.

Groves said ASK provides Washburn students with such advantages as the Board of Regents scholarship program, lobbying for student interests in the alcohol question and membership in the work study program, which ASK initiated.

Brooks said the opposing group on campus had done its own study of what ASK had done for Washburn in the last year and estimated the organization had provided $250 of actual goods to the students.

Brooks has been accused of "fence walking" on the issue by the students, he said.

"I don't know what students actually want," Brooks said. "That's what I'm trying to determine right now."

Brooks said there are two things hampering his investigation into students' opinions about ASK.

"One is that the students aren't informed enough about what ASK does, and the other is that people don't really know how good an organization is until it's gone, and by that time it's too late," Brooks said.

Brooks said he expects the issue to be presented to Washburn's senate soon, but would not guess as to whether legislation calling for Washburn's removal from the ASK system would be approved.

Brett Lambert, junior in political science and ASK state legislative assembly chairman, said he has no reason to believe Washburn has been dissatisfied with the ASK system.

National organization designates chairperson for sclerosis campaign

By ROBERT CLASEN
Collegian Reporter

Sally Traeger is starting a fight.

Traeger, junior in marketing, has been selected by the National Multiple Sclerosis Society to be the campus chairperson for Students Against Multiple Sclerosis and to head the February fund-raising campaign to fight MS.

"I was approached by Sally Routson (coordinator for student activities) and Barb Robel (adviser for greek affairs), after they received an information packet from NMSS," Traeger said. "I read through the material, became interested and sent in an application.

Students Against Multiple Sclerosis is a new college program designed to increase the public's awareness of MS and to establish long-term fund raising for programs and research to find the cause, more effective treatment, possible prevention procedures and a cure for multiple sclerosis. The college program was designed by Clifford Goldsmith, chairman of the board of directors of NMSS.

Multiple sclerosis is a degenerative disease of the central nervous system that attacks the myelin sheath (the coating or insulation around the message-carrying nerve fibers in the brain and spinal cord) and replaces it with hardened tissue (sclerosis). It can occur in 'multiple' places within the nervous system.

It most often strikes people between the ages of 18 and 34 and varies in its symptoms, severity and course. Symptoms vary according to the area of the nervous system affected. The symptoms range from weakness, tingling and impaired sensation to slurred speech, stiffness, and in severe cases, paralysis of the extremities.

To encourage students to get involved, NMSS declared February as national "Bust MS Month" and plans to have a fund-raising drive on 150 of the nation's campuses.

To help the cause, MTV — Music Television — developed a rock star look-alike contest called "Rock Alike," for the Students Against Multiple Sclerosis program.

"Students will dress up to raise money and increase awareness of MS, by impersonating their favorite rock stars in lip-synching contests," Traeger said.

MTV also put up the prize for the campus that raises the most money per capita — an MTV concert broadcast from their campus, by one of the nation's top artists.

Last spring the National Multiple Sclerosis Society tried out the program on a test market consisting of 12 Midwest colleges and raised $90,000.

Notre Dame, with a student population of less than 7,500, raised $23,000 and won the competition.

The Notre Dame MTV concert featured the Tommy Shaw band. Shaw, former lead guitarist for Styx, is now the lead singer for his own band.

"I've set a personal goal for our campus of $100,000," Traeger said. "I know without a doubt we can do it.

Applications for the board of directors positions are available in the SGS office, Union ground floor, and are to be turned in by 5 p.m. Monday.

Regents must consider University's future

MARK FOEHSE
Guest Columnist

This past Saturday, I had the pleasure of serving as a tour guide for members of the President's Club as they toured the newly renovated Nichols Hall. The President's Club is an organization of alumni, all distinguished in that they have each donate in excess of $10,000 to K-State.

My service as a guide was a pleasurable one because on this occasion, these alumni were quite happy. You see, this tour of Nichols Hall was, for many of them, a sentimental journey down memory lane.

As I stood in Nichols, I repeatedly heard statements such as: "This is really nice," "I'm glad they did this," "I remember having music lessons here," "I swam every day in the pool downstairs," "I played in the basketball pep band — we were up there in the rafters," "I saved some of the sheet music the night Nichols Gym burned," etc.

These alumni had a lot of fond memories associated with Nichols, and they were pleased to see the building again in use. Not once during the afternoon did I hear anyone criticize the renovation, or question whether it should have been done.

What is important about these alumni being pleased with the Nichols renovation? Recall that in 1979 the Acker administration requested funds from the Board of Regents to raze the burned out shell of Nichols Gym. The administration felt that the building could no longer serve any useful purpose.

The result — protest by the students of K-State. The Castle Crusaders was organized. A fund drive was initiated — Nickels for Nichols. A sit-in took place on President Acker's front lawn, and the regents came to a decision. Nichols would be saved. The pleased alumni on last Saturday's Nichols Hall tour are proof that the decision to save Nichols was correct. That is the important point.

In 1979 it was students who decided to save Nichols, not the Acker administration, and it is again the students who can make a long-reaching decision concerning buildings and tradition at K-State.

We have heard repeatedly from President Acker how we must build a new coliseum, abandoning Ahearn Field House as the varsity basketball facility. The primary reason why the administration must build Fred Bramlage Coliseum — in light of repeated warnings that the proposed facility was not properly planned, coupled with construction bids coming in an average of $4.2 million over budget — is just to prove it can be done.

The avoidance of embarrassment on the administration's behalf is not sufficient reason to spend $16 million. Neither is a gain of 1,500 seats over the present-day Ahearn (11,500 seats) sufficient reason to spend $16 million.

An expenditure appropriate at this time would be $10,000 to $20,000 to study the feasibility of renovating Ahearn. The 1977 study by the Campus Planning Office showed the renovation was possible, yielding 12,600 seats for under $4 million. Even with inflation, there would still be money to spare from the $16 million earmarked for the coliseum.

A new feasibility study could address the possibility of building a multi-level parking structure south of the Union in addition to an alumni/convention center at the Ramada Inn.

Some may not be aware that the Foundation has a financial interest the Ramada Inn. The Foundation owns the ground on which it is built. Fifteen years from now, the Ramada Inn will be owned by the Foundation, thus an alumni/convention center could be a financially rewarding option.

If the alumni were asked to consider the use of their donated funds for the renovation of Ahearn, I think the administration would receive not only their support, but also their enthusiastic help in making the renovation a reality. Nostalgia and tradition are strong motivators.

In times past, the Wildcats had what was called the "6th man" advantage at Ahearn; the team seemed unbeatable there. This tradition can be preserved by renovating Ahearn, and that home-court advantage could be a reality again.

The students can have at this time a very large role in deciding what will happen with the coliseum issue. Will the regents vote for what appears best for Duane Acker (soon to be gone), or will they vote for what appears best for K-State? The individual and the institution are not the same.

Editor's note: Mark Foehse is an instructor in the Department of Computer Science.

Campus alcohol policy set

New guidelines for alcohol consumption by people in campus organizations were unanimously approved by the Council on Student Affairs Sept. 13, when they drafted a policy on University Alcohol and Cereal Malt Beverage.

The new policy, although basically consistent with recent changes in state drinking laws, will give campus organizations more unity in regulations and enforcement procedure.

General information about possessing alcohol on campus, guidelines governing the consumption and possession of alcoholic beverages by student organizations, procedures for handling violations of the policy and matters relating to athletic facilities were addressed by the council.

The policy gives guidelines for precautionary measures to ensure that alcoholic beverages are not served or accessible to students under the legal drinking age.

In addition, the new policy requires that at any fuction where alcoholic beverages are served non-alcoholic beverages must also be available, and these NABs must also be advertised.

Drinking games will be illegal under the new policy which also states that only servers may prepare the alcoholic beverages.

The guidelines also include instructions for enforcement action to be taken by the campus group sponsoring the event where the violation occurred.

Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils, the Union Activities Board and the KSU Association of Residence Halls will all be affected by the policy. Each of these organizations had a say in the policy-making procedure.

Student leaders said they were pleased with the new policy and it will now go to President Duane Acker. If he approves the policy, it will go directly into effect.

While these new guidelines may require more responsibility from the campus organizations, it is encouraging that these groups sat down, discussed and unanimously agreed on the policy.

EPA monitors companies

Cherokee County, Kan., is considered one of the most polluted areas in the nation.

The Environmental Protection Agency is investigating nine out-of-state mining companies for contaminating the soil, water and air in Cherokee County. Located in the southeastern-most corner of the state, the contamination affects the water supply of 40,000 people in Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma.

This contaminated water supply could be the source of serious health problems in Cherokee County which has the highest mortality and cancer rate of any county in Kansas, according to a study in the early 1970s by the EPA and the University of Kansas Medical Center. The adjacent counties in Oklahoma and Missouri also tally the highest cancer and mortality rates in those states.

The companies linked to the pollution were at one time connected with the lead and zinc mining in a 200-square-mile area of Cherokee County including Treece, Crestline, Galena and Baxter Springs. The EPA's investigation began in July and is expected to last 18 months.

If the EPA finds the companies guilty of the contamination charges, those companies should slapped with the strongest sanctions possible — if not by the EPA, then by the residents of Cherokee County through every legal channel available in the U.S. judicial system.

To have lost friends and family to terminal disease is a cloud already dimming the lives of Cherokee County residents, but to cause fear of drinking the water and breathing the air is an unexcusable crime against society. Residents of the county should demand every penny of the millions it will take to clean up the wastes.

If the companies responsible for the contamination refuse to pay, the EPA will use Superfund money from federal taxes levied on chemical companies.

But the cleanup will be paid — one way or another.

It's too late to cure the terminally ill or bring back those who died of cancer, and much of the environmental damage to the area may be permanent, at least in this generation. But it's not too late to clean up Cherokee County with massive funding — not from the taxpayer's pockets, but from those of the companies which caused the contamination.

University 'security' measures not logical

KEVIN ELMORE
Collegian Columnist

Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of their country.

That's a rather strange way to start off a column that should be filled with tantalizing tidbits of innate wisdom, but I like to warm up the ol' Mycro-Comp Electronic Text Management System before I really get rolling.

Today, I feel like writing about the bureaucratic/physical things on campus — and there are plenty of 'em.

First off, the King Hall pizza steps. Student Body President Steve Brown, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, made this an issue during his campaign, and he spent some time this summer convincing Gene Cross, former vice president for University Facilities, that these stones were a lawsuit waiting to happen.

Brown talked to the original consulting architect and found out that the stones were originally closer together and the gaps were filled with sod — an effective design. At least until someone tried to clean the first winter snowfall off with a snowblower — or should I say "sodblower?"

Anyway, the resulting havoc was dug up and filled with inexpensive gravel. And they filled it up again the next year. And the next. And the next. It doesn't require a degree in finance to realize that cheap and inexpensive times four equals stupid, wasteful expense.

After a few weeks of pestering Cross to fill the gaps with concrete, Brown received a letter saying that the gaps would be filled with crushed limestone that will not wash out. I don't know anything about limestone, but I've already seen three people nearly stumble to their deaths because of gouges in this limestone filler. I just can't wait for the first schmuck to overrun it with a snowblower. Good ol' Gene — I'm really gonna miss that big galoot.

Let's hear it for that well-lit campus, huh? We really have a lot more campus lighting than you can see at night; the bulbs are just burnt out. A useful piece of information: If you report a burnt-out lamp, University Facilities promises to replace it in three days or less. Give them a call and see if they really can keep a promise.

Good lighting is helpful, but that's really not the issue. The issue is campus security and therefore should fall into the lap of the KSU Police. Have you ever seen a cop walking through campus? They must walk in the really dark areas.

The KSU Police Department claimed 4,539 hours of walking patrol in fiscal year 1984. Lights can help you feel secure, but I bet you'll never see a light jump down from a pole and chase a fugitive through the Quinlan Natural Area. We need a visible police presence on campus at night!

The last KSU police evaluation said, "Foot patrols can accomplish much while providing greater department visibility," and "perhaps foot patrol officers would be more visible throughout campus."

Perhaps since they've increased their parking permit/ticket revenue by 245 percent in the last four years ($459,312 in fiscal year 1984) and have reserves totalling $345,751, the department could afford a couple of guys to walk on campus after dark. The exercise and crisp night air would do them good.

And, to really scare the dickens out of you, the evaluation also included this quote: "Several employees indicated they felt the need to carry nightsticks while on campus patrol. The committee believes that neither nightsticks nor mace would be appropriate equipment for a campus-patrol force. Apparently, however, some officers perceive that the only option available to them is their sidearms." Go ahead, students — illegally park, argue and make my day.

Handicapped-accessibility is also a thorn in my side. I have a wheelchair-riding friend who tells me there are concrete islands around the University that have a ramp up — but no ramp down. Let's be serious, folks!

Out of all the buildings on campus that aren't accessible, why Anderson Hall? A handicapped student can't personally get a transcript or see the admission officers. This intense concern for student needs is sure to encourage an increase in retention.

Last year, we caught workers putting handrails on unused steps that led to brick walls. If they were worried about people falling down these stairs, wouldn't it be easier and cheaper to just lean a mattress against the offending wall?

It may seem that I'm overreacting, but I disagree. We pay approximately 25 percent of the costs of operating this University with our tuition, and I'm all for getting the most for my money.

Rifle team deserves recognition

Editor,

It is interesting. The football team lost to the University of Northern Iowa and the Collegian devoted an entire page of coverage to the game. The rifle team won the national championship and it only rated six sentences.

Is it true the media influences our choice of which sports we like and support? What would the Collegian's coverage be if the football or basketball team won the national championship?

Does the community have the right to know that K-State has a national champion team? Do the students have the right to know the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has nothing to do with K-State's only national champion team — and wants nothing to do with it either?

It is interesting.

Animals get elderly to smile

Pets program make visit to senior citizens

By ERIC RODENBAUGH
Collegian Reporter

The faces of the elderly find forgotten smiles when the Pets and People program arrives at their door.

The program, sponsored by the Riley County Humane Society, consists of volunteers taking their pet or any available pet to visit residents of area nursing homes.

Teresa Murray, senior in preveterinary medicine and coordinator of the program, said the volunteers plan to visit Wharton Manor, 2101 Claflin Road; College Hill Skilled Nursing Center, 2423 Kimball Ave.; and Meadowlark Hills, 2121 Meadowlark Road, once a month.

A visit to College Hill Skilled Nursing Center Thursday was the fourth visit of the program. The first visit, also to College Hill, was in August.

Linda George, activities coordinator at Meadowlark Hills, said reminiscing is therapeutic for many residents. The pets remind residents of pets they once had which opens the door to other memories.

"My grandmother had a big dog. She would come to visit us in the summer and one day a tramp walked into the house but he didn't see the dog. It jumped up behind him and he took off down the road," said Amy Meyer, Meadowlark Hills resident, after petting one of the dogs.

"We're tied in here," Meyer said. "The joys we have come to us from the outside. It's so nice to be remembered."

Donna McCallum, activities coordinator at College Hill, said it helps the residents to hold the animals and pet them.

"They don't get to love and cuddle things very often — it helps them, it really does," she said.

"Pets have a calming, soothing effect on our residents," George said. "You see the smiles when they touch them. They always brighten up when they have animals around."

Irene Shaw, Meadowlark Hills resident, summed up the feelings of residents with a simple, "I loved it."

Murray said more volunteers are needed.

"We can use all the people we can so we don't have to use the same people every time. We don't want it to become a burden for them," Murray said.

Helen Stover, resident of College Hill Skilled Nursing Center, holds a poodle during the Pets and People program sponsored by the humane society.

The goal is to have enough volunteers and pets to have one pet for each participating resident. This way the volunteers could carry on one-on-one conversations without interruption.

People who would like to donate their time, but don't have a pet, are encouraged to volunteer.

"Sometimes we have people with pets who can't make the session and we need people to take these pets," Murray said.

But Pets and People not only needs people, it also needs pets.

Any sociable animal is acceptable, however, cuddly animals such as rabbits, puppies and kittens are preferred. In order for the pet to qualify it must be sociable, licensed, completely vaccinated and on a leash, Murray said.

"We'll even take birds and snakes — sociable snakes that is," she said.

Former hostage tells of demands; captors want Kuwaitians' release

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Rev. Benjamin Weir said Thursday that he was let go to warn that his Lebanese kidnappers "are not willing to wait much longer" for the freedom of 17 men imprisoned in Kuwait — the terrorists' sole demand for releasing their six other American hostages.

He said he was given no timetable for action.

Weir said he saw four of the six Americans before he was freed Saturday after 16 months in captivity. He said the four — Terry Anderson, David Jacobsen, the Rev. Lawrence Jenco and Thomas Sutherland — all appeared well. But he said he knows nothing about the other two, Peter Kilburn and William Buckley.

After the news conference, Weir met privately with the families of the hostages. Wearing a yellow ribbon on his left lapel, the 61-year-old Presbyterian minister comfortably answered questions from reporters at a 50-minute news conference.

"A window of opportunity has been opened at least a crack and the opportunity for negotiations should be seized," he said, adding: "I fear that opportunity may not last long."

The 17 were convicted in Kuwait of a series of bombings on Dec. 12, 1983, that included an attack on the U.S. embassy. Three have been condemned to death by hanging, seven others have a life sentence, the others have terms ranging from 15 years to two.

The Kuwaiti government has refused to submit to pressure by Lebanon-based Islamic fundamentalists to release them.

The captors "have released me as a sign of their good intentions," Weir said.

He said he conveyed the message to President Reagan in a telephone call on Wednesday and that "he did not respond in any specific way."

At the White House and State Department, spokesmen issued virtually the same statement: "We will review Rev. Weir's suggestions carefully and will continue to do everything possible consistent with U.S. policy to obtain the expeditious release of the remaining six hostages."

Board denies tax exemption

KU alumni fighting decision

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The attorney for the University of Kansas Alumni Association said Thursday he will challenge in court a decision by the state Board of Tax Appeals which denies the association an exemption from paying personal and real property taxes in Douglas County.

"The association strongly disagrees with the decision of the majority opinion and will seek rehearing and, if necessary, will appeal the decision to the courts," said Brad Smoot of Lawrence, the association's lawyer.

The board's vote was 3-2, with Chairman Fred Weaver of Baxter Springs and member Robert Henry of Atchison dissenting from the majority opinion. The order was dated Wednesday but was not made public until Thursday.

The alumni association, which has owned property in Douglas County for a century, never paid any taxes until it was billed in 1984 for $63,842.78 — $49,344.78 for the Adams Alumni Center, the only real property it owns, and $14,498 in personal property taxes for the furnishings and equipment it owns.

Smoot said the association paid the first half of those taxes last December under protest, but has not paid the second half, which were due in June, because it had its application for tax exemption pending with the state board. He said the association may have to pay the second half soon.

The lawyer said the first step is for the association to seek a rehearing before the Board of Tax Appeals. The board has 30 days to decide whether to grant a rehearing. If it denies that request, Smoot said, he will challenge the decision by filing suit in Shawnee County District Court.

Voting in favor of the denial were Dallas Crable of Hutchison, John Bennett of Overland Park and Keith Farrar of Hugoton.

Groups to hold leadership seminar

By The Collegian Staff

Students will have an opportunity to develop leadership skills through a workshop sponsored by Student Governing Association, Union Activities Board and Blue Key Honor Society.

The workshop, "Take the Steps to Leadership," will be Saturday from 8:30 to 11 a.m. in Union 208.

"A student doesn't need to be in a leadership position at the moment, but some time in their life they might find themselves in a position of authority and this workshop could be helpful," said Sally Routson, SGA adviser.

Topics include the new student and involvement, goal setting and effective goal accomplishment, time management, communication skills and student organization.

The welcome and opening remarks will be given by William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services.

Representatives of the Department of Housing, Greek Affairs, SGA and U-LearN will speak.

Arabian Art:

Artist mixes pottery business with show horse involvement

Kathy Bartholomew, K-State graduate with a bachelor's degree in fine arts, paints a landscape on a piece of stoneware in her studio.

Throwing a plate in only minutes, Bartholomew smooths out the edges.

Two months from graduation, potter Kathy Bartholomew was still a painting major.

Enjoying different facets of art, Bartholomew enrolled in a beginner's pottery class. After her instructor watched her complete assignments faster and as good as the others, he took her aside and said, "You should be a potter."

"Do something you know about, you care about and that will mean something to you," was advice Bartholomew received from her instructor, Angelo Garzio, professor of art. While trying to discover this "something," Bartholomew recalls watching a classmate draw a landscape.

"I knew right then that was what I wanted to do," she said, "incorporate landscape drawing with my pottery."

"I enjoy doing the 'Kansas-y' thing," Bartholomew said. "I'm Kansas all the way, I have to be in the plains, I have to see grass on the ground."

Continuing school then as a potter, Bartholomew graduated a year later with a bachelor's degree in fine arts. Bartholomew had her first post-graduation show in May. "From then on it's supported itself," she said.

Bartholomew said every piece sold at her first craft sale and her second show was no different.

During the next several years the pottery business began to take off and she established Thunderhill Pottery. An avid interest in raising and owning Arabian horses, however, started taking time she had spent attending and exhibiting at art fairs.

With her husband Eric, Bartholomew said their work with Arabian horses became a separate business entity. They raise, train and show horses themselves.

Although throwing, drawing and painting a 12-inch plate takes all of 10 minutes — not including drying and firing time, Bartholomew said she was too busy.

"Marketing pots at art fairs and attending horse shows were in conflict. I thought I needed to combine," she said.

The Arabian Horse Breeders Industry was giving a lot of silver for trophies and then silver got more expensive. They were open for something new, something permanent that the people could take home, Bartholomew said.

"I advertised in an Arabian horse magazine for decorative plates, vases or mugs. Things just really got going quickly."

Bartholomew now produces 60 to 300 pieces per show, averaging three shows a year.

This combination effort allows Bartholomew to continue her pottery and to enjoy her horses. One sort of helps the other along, she said.

On a typical day Bartholomew will throw pots all day, and another day she'll draw or paint. Delivery days are even seen as a trip to her.

"I've been known to travel 250 miles just to deliver a lamp," she said. "I love to get away, but I also love to come home."

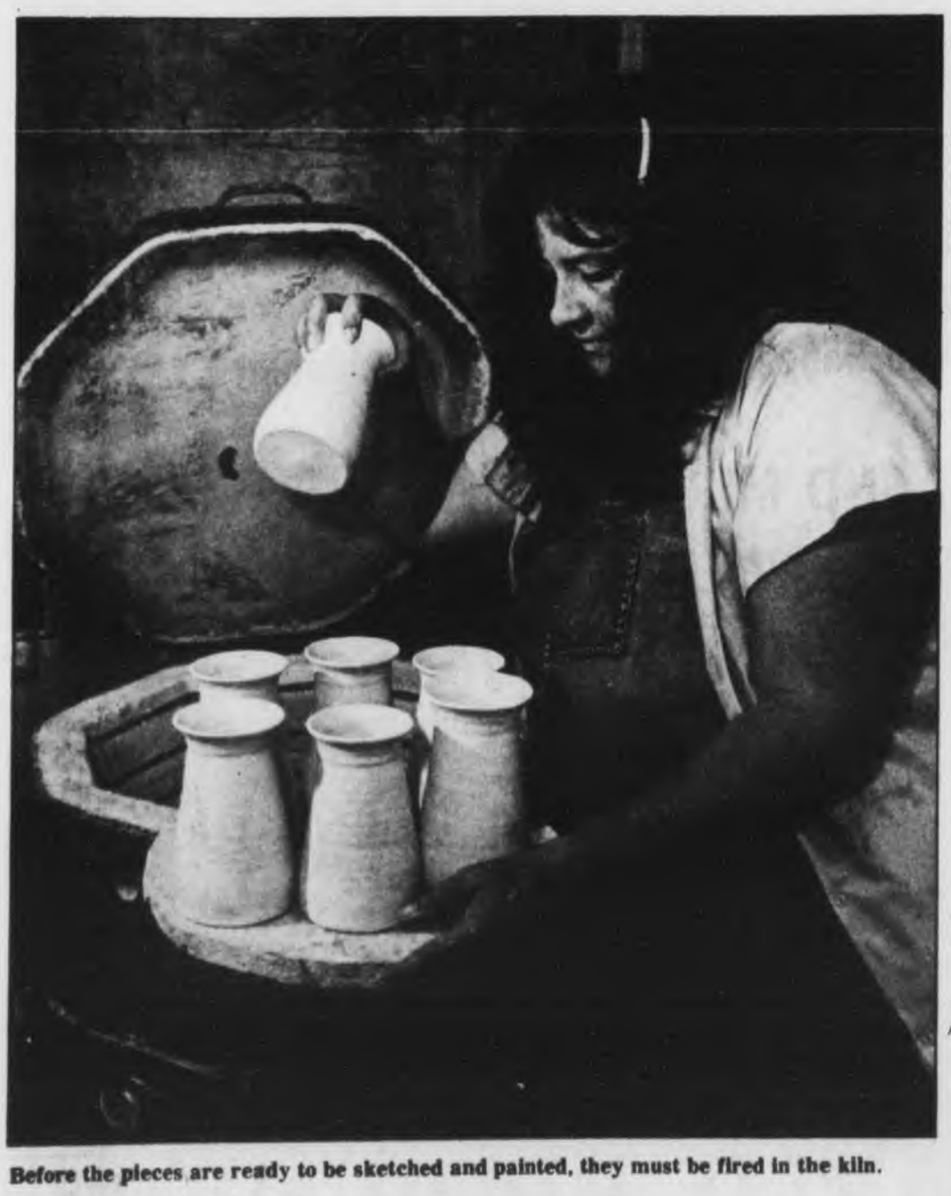
With geese, kittens and other farm animals minding the property, Bartholomew has a built-in getaway.

"I take little vacations during the day," Bartholomew said. "Like if I get real tired of potting I go out and walk through the animals, pet the horses or go riding. I take care of myself that way."

Custom plate orders of a hot-air balloon, a locomotive and a Corvette — in addition to those for with Western or English class horses — have rolled off Bartholomew's potter's wheel.

"This veterinarian ordered 12 place settings once and said, 'try to get a different animal on each piece,'" Bartholomew said. There were six or seven pieces in each place settings.

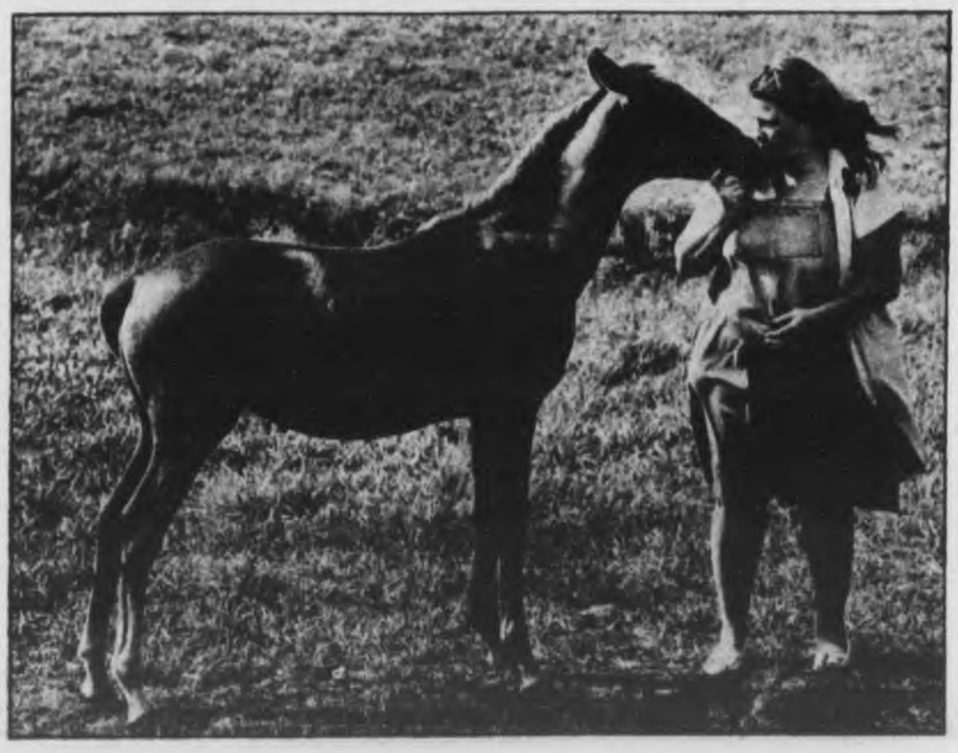
"So I got an animal encyclopedia and went through it page by page. I'm not sure he knows what all the animals are," she said.



Combining horse trophies, custom pieces and random pieces, Bartholomew's business is at the point where she has to turn down orders, she said.

"There's a lot of excellent potters with functional pottery in the state, but what does it for me is the scenery," she said. She smiled bashfully and said, "God loves me."

Two months before Christmas, Bartholomew said she works 16- to 18-hour days filling holiday orders. Holidays pass by like any other day when she's filling an order, she said.



While in the Army, her husband remembered a letter he received from her with four weeks left in the semester. Kathy had three or four pots to make within the last four weeks of the semester and she "hoped she could get it done." She wrote, "I think that a person could make money at this, but I'm not sure."

"Oh, how things change," she said.

Before the pieces are ready to be sketched and painted, they must be fired in the kiln.

ABOVE: Arabian horses are commonly Bartholomew's subjects for paintings and stoneware. Such plates are often trophies at horse shows. LEFT: Taking a break, Bartholomew wanders across a pasture and gives a colt some attention.

Land price 'endangers' project

Officials may scrap turnpike plans

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The Kansas Turnpike Authority will decide in October whether to scrap plans for a proposed interchange at the turnpike's junction with U.S. 77 near the El Dorado State Lake, a KTA official said Thursday.

R.D. Fogo, manager of the turnpike, said a dispute over the price of land for the proposed interchange may endanger the entire project. An appraiser's report submitted in Butler County District Court on Wednesday valued the 27.8 acres of land in dispute at $60,490.

Fogo said the KTA earlier had offered to buy the land for $400 per acre but the owner, former state Sen. Charles Joseph of Potwin, wanted $2,000 per acre. He said the appraiser's report, which was required under the KTA's condemnation procedings for the land, valued the ground at about $2,100 per acre.

The decision would add about $50,000 to the $2.6 million project and Fogo said the five-member KTA board could decide at its Oct. 3 meeting to pay the amount the appraiser suggested, appeal the decision, or to abandon plans for the interchange.

Bids for construction of the turnpike entrance are scheduled to be opened on Sept. 25, Fogo said. The amount bid for construction may turn out to be the deciding factor, he said.

The proposed entrance, like the rest of the 236-mile four-lane divided highway, will be financed through bonds that will be paid off through toll income, Fogo said.

Plans call for the completion of the interchange in 1986. The KTA opened two other interchanges earlier this year near Wichita — at Mulvale and Andover — which were the first new entrances on the turnpike since it opened in the late 1950s.

The crossing of U.S. 77 and the turnpike, which is designated Interstate 35 in southern Kansas, is one of the few points in the nation where there is no access to the interstate from a U.S. highway, Fogo said.

The appraiser estimated that the 286-acre tract of grass land, from which the interchange ground would be taken, is worth $143,000, Fogo said.

Synthetic pop band gives clean, lively performance

By BEN PEASE
Collegian Reviewer

Its playbill boasts a "crisp, synthetic sound" and that is what Limited Warranty delivered. Wednesday night at Mannequin's Ltd. was the time and setting for this Bloomington, Minn., band's Manhattan debut.

The band, which recently won the $100,000 first place prize on the nationally syndicated television program, "Star Search," presented an act that was both polished and professional to the core.

With the exception of a few cover songs — notably, an exciting version of The Four Tops' "Reach Out" — the boys from Bloomington hit the audience with a barrage of original tunes, each worthy of praise.

"Burglary of Love," "Exclusively," and "Sensations" were just a few of the band's original tunes that also appear on its first album.

Limited Warranty — with its superior sound, stunning vocals, polished show and contagiously "party" stage personality — made for a great evening of pop-rock.

Mexico

p.m.

The Hotel Regis in downtown Mexico City had split in two and was still burning Thursday afternoon. Firemen, the Red Cross and volunteers had pulled 14 bodies from the building, said Channel 13.

A spokesman for the Mexico City police said on Channel 13 that at least 100 multistory buildings were destroyed or heavily damaged.

A woman ham radio buff in Mexico described outlying parts of Mexico City as "like a war," in addition to the damage in the business district, reported Jim White, a talk show host with KMOX radio in St. Louis.

"At first I heard a tremendous noise and I grabbed my daughter and jumped out the window. I had no chance to help my wife, who was killed when she was buried by rubble," said a young man shown on Mexican television, his voice choked with emotion and tears streaming down his dust-covered cheeks.

Charles Young, a 26-year-old freelance reporter from Madison, Wis., and Andy Daitsman, 26, a historian from Milwaukee said they saw the 12-story Principiado Hotel collapse a block from the monument to the Mexican Revolution.

"I saw rescue workers drag out about 15 people from the top of the mount of rubble. They were covered with dust and I don't know if they were dead or alive," said Daitsman.

The airport was closed for several hours as officials checked the runways for damage. Flights from the United States were canceled, one airline official said, "because we didn't know what we would find when we got there."

The earthquake appeared to be Mexico's worst since September 1973, when more than 700 people were killed and more than 300 miles of southeastern Mexico were left a shambles by a quake measured at 6.5 on the Richter scale.

'Cats to look for first win under new coach

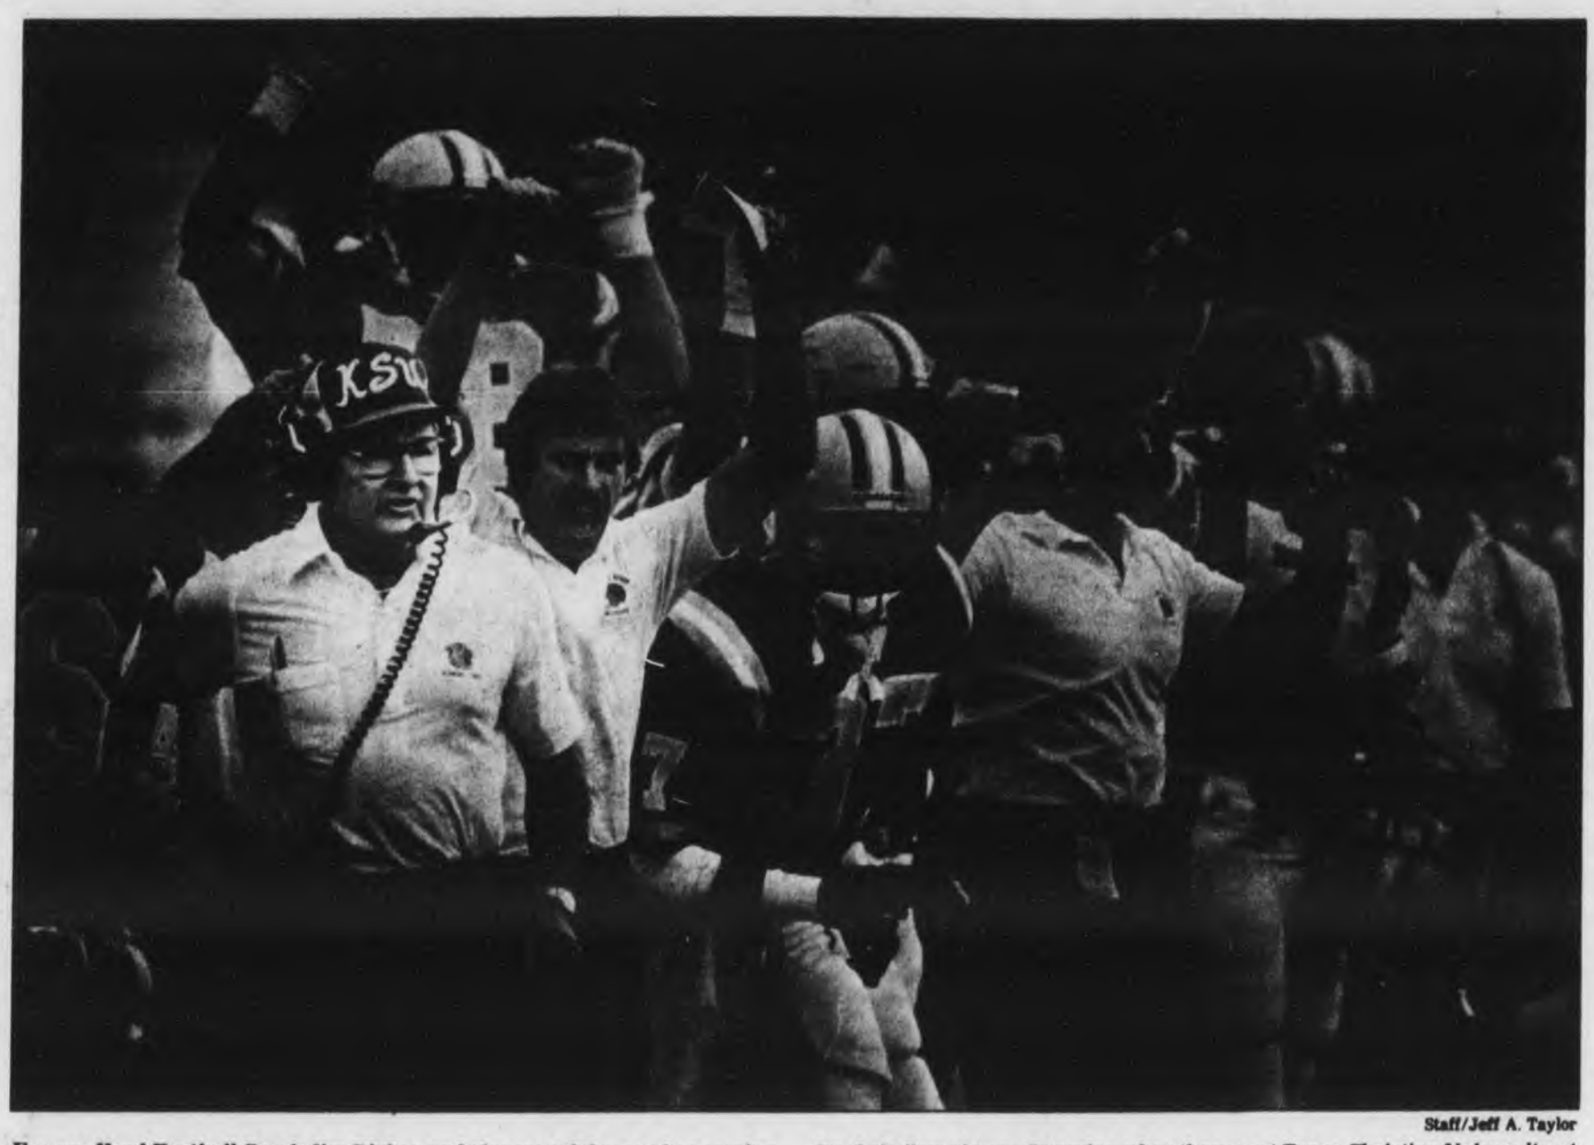
Horned Frogs not taking 'Cats lightly

By TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

Facing a K-State team that has a new interim head coach and has lost consecutive games to two lightly regarded opponents, Texas Christian University Coach Jim Wacker isn't taking the Wildcats for granted.

Wacker has used a simple plan of action in TCU's practices this week to prevent overconfidence from setting in.

The plan: "Screaming and yelling," quipped Wacker.



On a more serious note, Wacker pointed out that his Horned Frog team, which played 24 freshmen in last week's season-opening 30-13 win over Tulane University, couldn't afford to look past K-State, which has lost to Wichita State University and the University of Northern Iowa on the past two Saturdays.

"We don't like to be overconfident with anybody," Wacker said. "We're young and inexperienced."

New interim K-State Head Coach Lee Moon will make his debut in KSU Stadium against TCU. Moon, also an assistant athletic director, was asked to take over after the forced resignation of Jim Dickey.

Moon looks at TCU with respect, but still believes K-State can play well against the Horned Frogs, who were listed as a top-20 team by some

See TCU, Page 9

Staff/Jeff A. Taylor

Former Head Football Coach Jim Dickey and players celebrate after scoring during last week's upset loss to Northern Iowa. The Wildcats will be looking for their first victory Saturday when they meet Texas Christian University at KSU Stadium under the guidance of interim Head Football Coach Lee Moon.

Game plan kept secret from TCU

Lee Moon is teasing Texas Christian University's football team and is loving every minute of it.

Moon, named interim head football coach after the forced resignation of Jim Dickey Sunday, inherited a team that started the season with two consecutive losses against supposedly lesser teams — Wichita State University and the University of Northern Iowa.

Todd Nighswonger
Sports Editor

While these two upsets would be enough for any new coach to reorganize the player personnel from top to bottom, Moon is not admitting there will be any major changes in store for the Wildcats Saturday against TCU in KSU Stadium. But he's not denying it either.

If Moon can help it, the Horned Frogs will come into Saturday's game confused about what the Wildcats might do. And he's tried several ploys this week to see that TCU is as clueless as possible.

For starters, Moon announced on Monday that this week's practices would be closed to the public and media. Closed to the media? When I heard that I thought, "Who does he think he is?"

Moon's announcement, to say the least, left me a little bit perturbed. What does he think the local journalists are going to do, let the cat out of the bag?

But Moon has been more than happy to explain why he's keeping everything so private. While I don't agree to closing practices to the media, I do understand his reasoning.

Keeping spectators and the press out of practices would give the players a chance to concentrate on football, Moon said. And because the Horned Frogs are heavy favorites going into the 11:40 a.m. kickoff Saturday, Moon wants to give the 'Cats every chance to give TCU all it can handle.

That means keeping mum about

Spikers to risk perfect mark in Northwestern Invitational

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State women's volleyball team improved its record to 5-0 Thursday with a victory over St. Louis University in St. Louis, Mo.

The Wildcats won the match in three games, 15-4, 15-8 and 15-6. The leading attacker for K-State was senior co-captain, Donna Lee. She had 17 kills on 26 attempts for an attacking percentage of 65 percent.

Helen Bundy also had a good performance for the day. She was successful on five of six attacks for a percentage of 83 percent.

The team had an overall attacking percentage of 47 percent. The Wildcats also had 10 serving aces, five of which were by senior co-captain Renee Whitney.

"We really controlled the tempo of the entire match," said Scott Nelson, head volleyball coach. "Even with freshman setter Mary Mignano in the game — it was a good experience for her."

The Wildcat's stop in St. Louis is part of a road trip that will take them to Evanston, Ill., to compete in the Northwestern Invitational today and Saturday.

Besides Northwestern University, the Wildcats will also face Northern Illinois University and Southern Illinois University.

Northwestern is coming off its second consecutive Big Ten title and a fourth straight NCAA tournament appearance. Southern Illinois had an overall mark of 22-9 last season. Both are ranked among the top 10 in the Mideast Region.

The Wildcats will open up against the Huskies from Northern Illinois at 6 tonight. They then face the Salukis from Southern Illinois in a 1 p.m. contest Saturday, followed by the Northwestern Wildcats at 8 p.m.

"Northern Illinois is big and physical," Nelson said. "We have to control the tempo to beat them, if we do, we will match up well."

This is the first road tournament of the season for K-State.

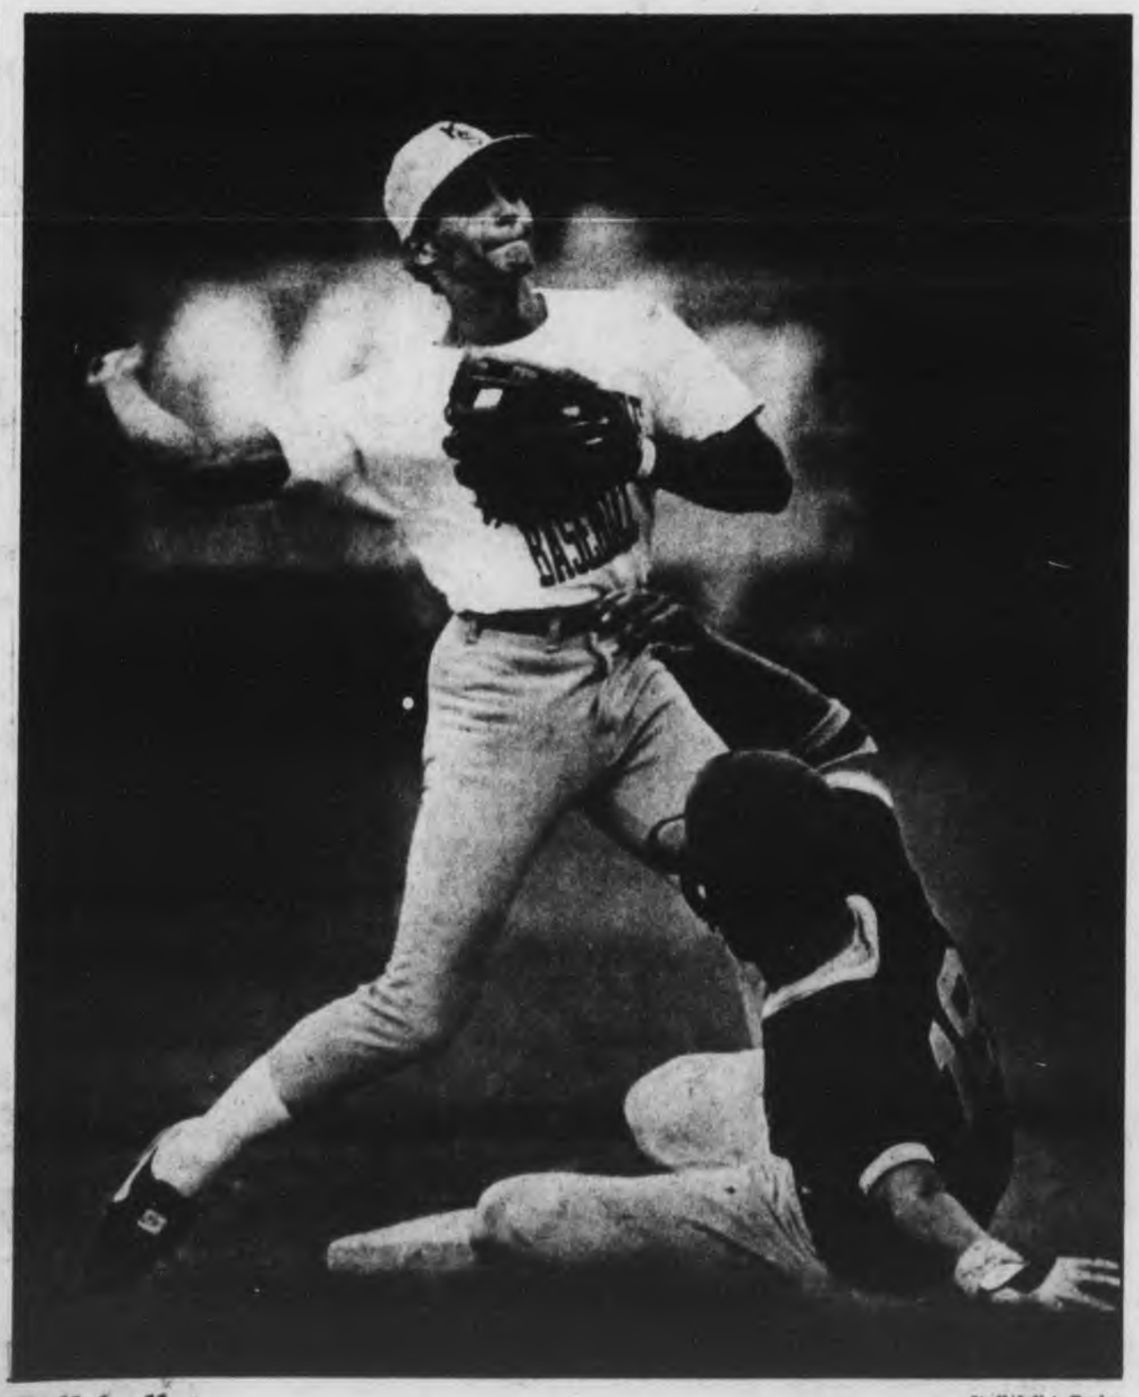
"This will be our toughest competition to date this season. I'm looking forward to having a test like this for the squad to see at what level they are capable of playing," Nelson said.

Harriers hope strong start carries over to MU meet

By The Collegian Staff

The men's and women's cross country teams travel to Columbia, Mo., Saturday to compete in the four-team Missouri Invitational.

The harriers hope to continue the strong running that carried them to a first- and second-place finish last weekend at the Nebraska Invitational.



"We're off to a good start," Head Coach Steve Miller said. "We need to realize that that's just what it is — a start. We have got to keep setting our goals high and look forward to improving our performance."

Teams besides K-State competing in the Missouri meet will be the University of Missouri, the University of Colorado and Oklahoma State University.

"Missouri will be the site of the Big Eight meet, so it's a chance for our kids to run on the course," Miller said. "It's also important for our freshman, as it gives them another chance to compete."

The top K-State freshmen last week were Lisa Wakem, who placed ninth, and David Pulford, who finished 15th.

Leading the way for the first-place men's team at Nebraska were juniors Ron Stahl and Jim Knudsen, who finished first and second, respectively.

Kenney recalls early days at Miami

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Kansas City Chiefs quarterback Bill Kenney never will forget how he left the Miami Dolphins bloodied and on bended knee on his first trip here.

The only problem was that Kenney, at the time, was a member of the Dolphins. As the team's 12th-round choice, the next-to-last player chosen in the National Football League draft in 1978, Kenney was nothing more than training camp fodder.

Two teams and seven years later, Kenney returns to Miami Sunday as one of the best quarterbacks in the league and the offensive leader of the unbeaten Chiefs. Even he has to marvel at how things have changed.

"I really wasn't a quarterback in 1978," Kenney said Thursday during a conference call from Kansas City. "I can remember going there and Coach (Don) Shula telling me that my chances of making the team were very slim because he already had Bob Griese and Don Strock and they had drafted a quarterback in the second round, Guy Benjamin.

"He said if there was an injury or something I might have a chance and if I looked good he would try to trade me."

The rookie from Northern Colorado looked bad, and he knew it.

"I was terrible," he recalled. "I was just a training camp quarterback — one of the guys that you know aren't going to make it."

But Kenney said one play during practice clinched his fate. In a passing drill, he zipped a pass over the middle and hit defensive coach Bill Arnsparger, now the head coach at Louisiana State University, in the head.

"I drilled him and dropped him to his knees," Kenney said. "He got up sort of slow and blood was trickling down his ear. I remember they told me the last guy who did that was cut the next day, and I was traded the next day."

Kenney was only kidding about that. He said he feels the Dolphins treated him very well, especially considering how poorly he had performed in practice.

"Matter of fact," he said, "I think (Arnsparger) was the only person I hit in camp. It was the hardest pass I threw all camp and I think it was one of the few spirals."

Shula remembers Kenney much the same way. "What we saw was a big, raw-boned young guy with a strong arm and intelligence, but he was was a long way from being able to compete at that point," the veteran coach said.

The day after beaning Arnsparger, Kenney inadvertently missed a team meeting. When he showed up just as the other players were leaving, Shula approached him.

"He said 'You missed a meeting, you're fired,'" Kenney remembered. "Then he laughed a little about it and said 'No, I'm not kidding. We really did trade you to Washington.' "

Kenney didn't have much of a chance with the Redskins either because Joe Theismann and Billy Kilmer were secure at the quarterback position. He was cut and immediately went to work as a stock broker.

But the Chiefs called later that year and asked him to come to Kansas City that spring and try to make the team.

"They said you can move out here at the end of March," he said. "You can work out here April, May and June and just learn how to play quarterback. You have a strong arm and you're smart — we'll work on the rest."

The rest is history. Kenney broke into the staring lineup in 1981. Last year, he passed for 2,098 yards and 15 touchdowns despite playing only nine games because of a broken thumb. After two games this season, he ranks second behind San Diego's Dan Fouts in total passing yards with 656.

"First off, I think I can throw the ball a lot better (than in 1978)," he said. "But I think the No. 1 thing is that I have improved my ability to read defenses and understand what defense is doing to distract an offense."

Mariners sweep series from Royals

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Ninth-inning doubles by Alvin Davis and Dave Henderson gave Seattle a 6-4 victory over Kansas City Thursday night as the Royals fell into a tie with California for the American League West lead after their fourth straight loss to the Mariners.

Davis led off the ninth against Dan Quisenberry, who relieved starter Bret Saberhagen with one out in the eighth. Pinch runner Ricky Nelson moved to third on a sacrifice bunt by Gorman Thomas and scored when Henderson doubled down the left-field line. Henderson then scored on a single to center by John Moses.

Saberhagen, failing in his effort to win his 19th game, gave up 11 hits and walked one before leaving for Quisenberry, 9-7.

The Royals managed only three hits off six Seattle pitchers. The winner was Ed Nunez, 7-2, who pitched to just one batter in the eighth. Dave Tobik earned his first save.

The victory was the Mariners' 10th in 13 games and their ninth in 10 games with the Royals this season.

Darryl Motley had given the Royals a 4-2 lead with his bases-loaded single in the seventh off Jack Lazorko.

The Royals tied a club record by going scoreless for 30 innings until Smith hit a two-run homer off Langston with two out in the fifth. That matched a string dating back to May of 1981.

TCU

preseason polls.

"You never want to step on the field without thinking you can compete," Moon said. "They're excellent on both offense and defense. If they weren't, they wouldn't be in the top 20."

Moon, who closed K-State practices to the media this week, said he has stressed proper execution of defensive fundamentals for the Wildcats' attempt to stop a potent Horned Frog veer offense.

TCU running back Kenneth Davis, a Heisman Trophy candidate who gained 1,611 yards rushing last season including 239 against K-State, is one player that Wildcat defenders will need to watch. Davis rushed for 156 yards on 24 carries last week against Tulane.

Moon cautioned, though, that while Davis is "a great tailback," K-State couldn't concentrate exclusively on Davis.

"You can't zero in on one person," Moon said.

TCU quarterback Scott Ankrom, in his first game as a starter last week, gained 122 yards on 21 carries.

"He's (Ankrom) as fine a quarterback as we'll face all year," Moon said.

TCU has yet another talented runner in the starting backfield, Tony Jeffery. Jeffery ran through K-State's defense for 112 yards in last season's game and totaled 840 yards for the 1984 season. Jeffery said he believes the Horned Frogs can duplicate last season's success against the Wildcats.

"I'm confident enough to think that we could repeat last season's performance against Kansas State," Jeffery said. "We have a great quarterback in Scott Ankrom, and Kenneth Davis and I provide a pretty decent running attack. With a lot of hard work this week, I don't see why we can't do well."

With Davis, Ankrom and Jeffery, TCU is most noted for its running game. But Wacker would like the Horned Frogs to have an effective passing game as well.

"We want balance in our attack," Wacker said. "We want to run it and throw it and do a decent job at both."

Wacker indicated respect for K-State's defense, which has allowed just 26 points in two games.

"Somebody said that they returned two or three defensive players who gained all-conference honors last season," Wacker said. "I remember a couple of them. That free safety (Barton Hundley) was all over the field (in last year's game against K-State). So was (Grady) Newton, one of their defensive ends."

Moon has kept K-State's offensive game plan for the TCU game under wraps with the week of closed practices. However, Moon did reveal that John Kendrick, who was one of the few bright spots in last week's loss to Northern Iowa with 142 yards rushing, would be the Wildcats' starting tailback.

Moon also said he hopes K-State's blockers, both linemen and backs, will give Wildcat quarterback Randy Williams ample opportunity to pass the ball.

TCU should be at 100 percent in the injury department. Strong safety Tommy Sharp, linebacker Kevin Dean and defensive tackle Darron Turner all suffered minor injuries in the Tulane game but are expected to be at full speed on Saturday.

Gametime at KSU Stadium is set for 11:40 a.m. to accommodate a regional television audience.

PITTSBURGH — The fate of a Philadelphia caterer, characterized by a federal prosecutor as "a traveling salesman of cocaine," Thursday was handed to a jury of nine women and three men who must decide if he dealt drugs to major league baseball players on 14 occasions.

Curtis Strong, 39, briefly the clubhouse cook for the Philadelphia Phillies, had "the best clientele you could have, major league baseball players with the time and the money to use drugs," said U.S. Attorney J. Alan Johnson.

what K-State might or might not have up its sleeve.

"The first time I rattle out of the box, I'd rather be unknown," Moon said Wednesday. "Coaches are a funny breed. I could sit here and tell you that we're going to run the exact same thing as last week. But to think that I closed practice and I'm a new coach, it's going to make their minds wonder."

Moon's philosophy is a good one. If indeed K-State has made some changes, no one outside of the team knows about them — not even the press.

"If they (opponents) have to take 10 minutes of their practice time to prepare for something they think I might run or change to run, then that's 10 minutes they can't work on something else I'm going to run," he said. "And that's going to give us an advantage."

Still, it doesn't make sense to close practices for an entire week without throwing in some kind of new play. In addition, Moon has a few special plays available from Dickey's playbook that he could use, like the shuffle pass and shotgun.

The shuffle pass is when the quarterback drops back to pass and "pushes" or shuffles the ball to a running back. The shotgun is an offensive formation primarily used for passing in which the quarterback stands a few yards behind the center to receive a direct snap.

Both the shuffle pass and shotgun were used against Wichita State but were nowhere to be found last Saturday against Northern Iowa.

"There is always the possibility that you can put in a play or two," Moon said. "But you can't change the whole offense. I'm just planting a seed — playing with their minds."

Moon has kept this week's proceedings such a secret, in fact, that he won't even tell the media about injured players.

When Moon met with the media following Wednesday's practice, he reported that players had been injured during or since last week's game. However, he would not reveal the names of the players, explaining that reporting the injuries would let TCU know too much about the 'Cats personnel.

This was a bad move on his part. He might as well have told the press because if we want to, we'll find out anyway. Such was the case when a fellow journalist talked to another member of the team who gladly gave him an injury report.

But Moon is not a bad guy. He got placed in a no-win situation of picking up a football team going nowhere and is trying to make the best of the situation.

He isn't, though, just filling in until a new coach is named following the season. And he's making sure the players know that.

"I get in among them (players) and I get excited both ways," Moon said. "I get excited when they do things good and I get excited when they do things bad. They know which end I'm coming from."

Moon hopes that on Saturday TCU will have no idea where he's coming from.

known as the "bantustans," the supposed homelands of more than 80 percent of the black population. The bantustans comprise only 13 percent of South Africa's land area and are almost entirely undeveloped.

Failure to stay employed or to keep the passbooks updated can result in a 24-hour pass to literally "get out of town," to the appropriate bantustan. Chances are no relatives still live in the bantustan and a person knows no one in the area.

Medluli's bantustan is Zululand, a territory about 620 miles from Johannesburg, but he has never visited his bantustan.

The other policy Medluli objects to is the Influx Control Act which makes blacks permanent residents of areas such as Soweto. It is difficult to obtain an exit permit, Medluli said, because of government restrictions.

Medluli left South Africa in 1976, fleeing from a certain jail term for distributing pamphlets denouncing a government drive to recruit blacks for the South African army. In 1976, unemployment was widespread in South Africa and the army was promising high pay and free accommodations for those who enlisted.

Medluli was a member of the South African Student Organization, which distributed pamphlets stating the army promises were a trick to induce people to enlist. One of the SASO members was caught with the pamphlet and arrested by the South African security police.

After interrogation, the man identified Medluli as the author of the pamphlet. Medluli was arrested, interrogated and detained for about 30 days. A SASO lawyer arranged bail and Medluli, certain that he would receive a five-year sentence for sedition, fled the country and settled in Gaborone, Botswana.

The All-American African Institute offered Medluli a scholarship and he decided to take the scholarship to prepare for when his country would need him. The AAAI assigned him to the University, and he arrived in Manhattan a week after registration.

'Stars Wars' system could modify talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's refusal to offer his "Star Wars" missile defense plan as a bargaining chip and a slowdown in U.S.-Soviet relations could mean his November meeting with Mikhail Gorbachev will be more of a "get-acquainted" session than the problem-solver some optimists had hoped for.

The Soviets apparently have no higher priority than stopping, or at least slowing down the futuristic research program on a shield against nuclear attack. Gorbachev hinted in an interview with Time magazine before Labor Day that he would look the other way as far as "research in fundamental science" was concerned.

But the Soviet leader proposed limiting "field tests" of the developing technology through a verifiable agreement with the United States. resumably this could be tied to reductions in big, land-based Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The top U.S. goal in the arms control talks that re-opened this week in Geneva, Switzerland, is cutting back those missiles and the threat they pose to the American arsenal. The basis for a tradeoff — American concessions on Star Wars in exchange for Soviet concessions on offensive missiles — seemed a distinct possibility.

But Reagan vowed in his news conference this week not to give up testing or development for the Strategic Defense Initiative — popularly known as Star Wars — in exchange for deep Soviet reductions. And the State Department on Wednesday declared "certain kinds" of tests were permissible under the 1972 U.S.-Soviet Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

"Technology moves along," a senior department official told reporters. He said the drafters of the treaty, which was signed at the 1972 summit by former president Richard Nixon and the late Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev were aware of science's relentless course.

The $26 billion research phase of SDI anticipates about a dozen "demonstrations," or field tests. Critics have warned that the treaty and the entire arms control process might unravel. But supporters of the Strategic Defense Initiative insist the United States would live up to its restrictions on anti-missile defenses.

There are still two months before Reagan and Gorbachev sit down in Geneva. The rough outline of their agenda has already been prepared, but an arms control agreement appears highly unlikely with the two sides so far apart.

Even the cultural, scientific, consular and air safety agreements that top U.S. officials said appeared in the bag in July have not been completed. They are small stuff in comparison to the arms control treaties signed at the 1972 and 1979 summit meetings, but were seen as contributing to an easing of superpower tensions.

The senior State Department official, who gave reporters a somewhat downbeat summit assessment, acknowledged he wished there was "more in the bin" for Reagan and Gorbachev to ratify in Geneva. But, he said, the agreements were not ready. Besides, he said, there was no point in preparing meaningless agreements to be signed by the leaders just for the sake of appearances.

Ever since Reagan proposed a summit in a letter to Gorbachev last March.

senate chairman, the senate vice chairman, coordinator of finances and the personnel selections chairman. The committee will report its recommendations for the use of the $700,000 to senate by Oct. 24.

Virgil Wiebe, senior in political science, proposed an amendment to the legislation stating that Mark Jones, senior in management and senate chairman, serve as an ex officio, non-voting member rather than the committee chairman and that the committee select its own chairman from among its members at its first meeting.

"I think this should be as much a student committee as possible," Wiebe said. "Mark has his fingers in a lot of pies."

Marita Peak, graduate in computer science, proposed a friendly amendment deleting the non-voting clause. Wiebe accepted the suggestion and senate approved the amendment.

Peak proposed an amendment changing the wording of the bill to read "the committee shall report to senate recommendations for the disposition of the $700,000" rather than "for the use of the $700,000."

Senate defeated the amendment.

General strike leads to state of siege in Bolivia

By The Associated Press

LA PAZ, Bolivia — The government declared a state of siege Thursday and arrested labor leaders who refused to end a 16-day-old general strike against a wage freeze intended to fight inflation of 14,000 percent.

Tanks and hundreds of troops took up positions before dawn in this Andean capital, in other cities and on highways. Violence was reported in some parts of La Paz.

President Victor Paz Estenssoro's conservative government told tens of thousands of strikers they would be fired unless they returned to work, but many stayed home.

Riot police raided the Congress building, five union halls, a radio station, San Andres University and the state mining company offices in La Paz during the night, according to union activists who escaped.

The Interior Ministry said 150 labor activists, including the 18 executive committee members of the Bolivian Workers Central, the leftist national labor federation, were sent into internal exile.

The ministry said they were flown in four air force jets to four towns in the country's subtropical north.

The ministry said others were arrested in the predawn raids but did not say how many. Unofficial estimates of the total arrests ranged up to 600. Twenty labor activists took refuge in the Mexican Embassy.

Soldiers raided a textile factory in La Paz and fired on striking workers who had beaten up four policemen, witnesses said. They said two strikers were wounded by the police gunfire.

National guard troopers used tear gas to scatter hundreds of student demonstrators in downtown La Paz.

The strike leaders had begun a hunger strike Tuesday against the government austerity program.

Reporters later saw Juan Lechin, 72, the labor federation's founder and executive secretary, put into a car by policemen at the Interior Ministry and driven away.

Paz Estenssoro declared a 90-day state of siege throughout the country, empowering police to hold people without charge for 48 hours or move them to internal exile in remote areas.

Governments provide relief after quakes

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Mexicans buried their dead Sunday and prayed there were more living as rescue teams, bolstered by aid from around the world, worked to remove the devastation left by twin earthquakes.

Mayor Ramon Aguirre said 1,641 bodies were recovered and 2,000 more remained trapped under collapsed buildings and were feared dead.

Other officials said 6,000 people were injured in the jolts Thursday and Friday that left center of the city in shambles.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Dan Lawler said the Mexican government had raised the official death toll to 3,461.

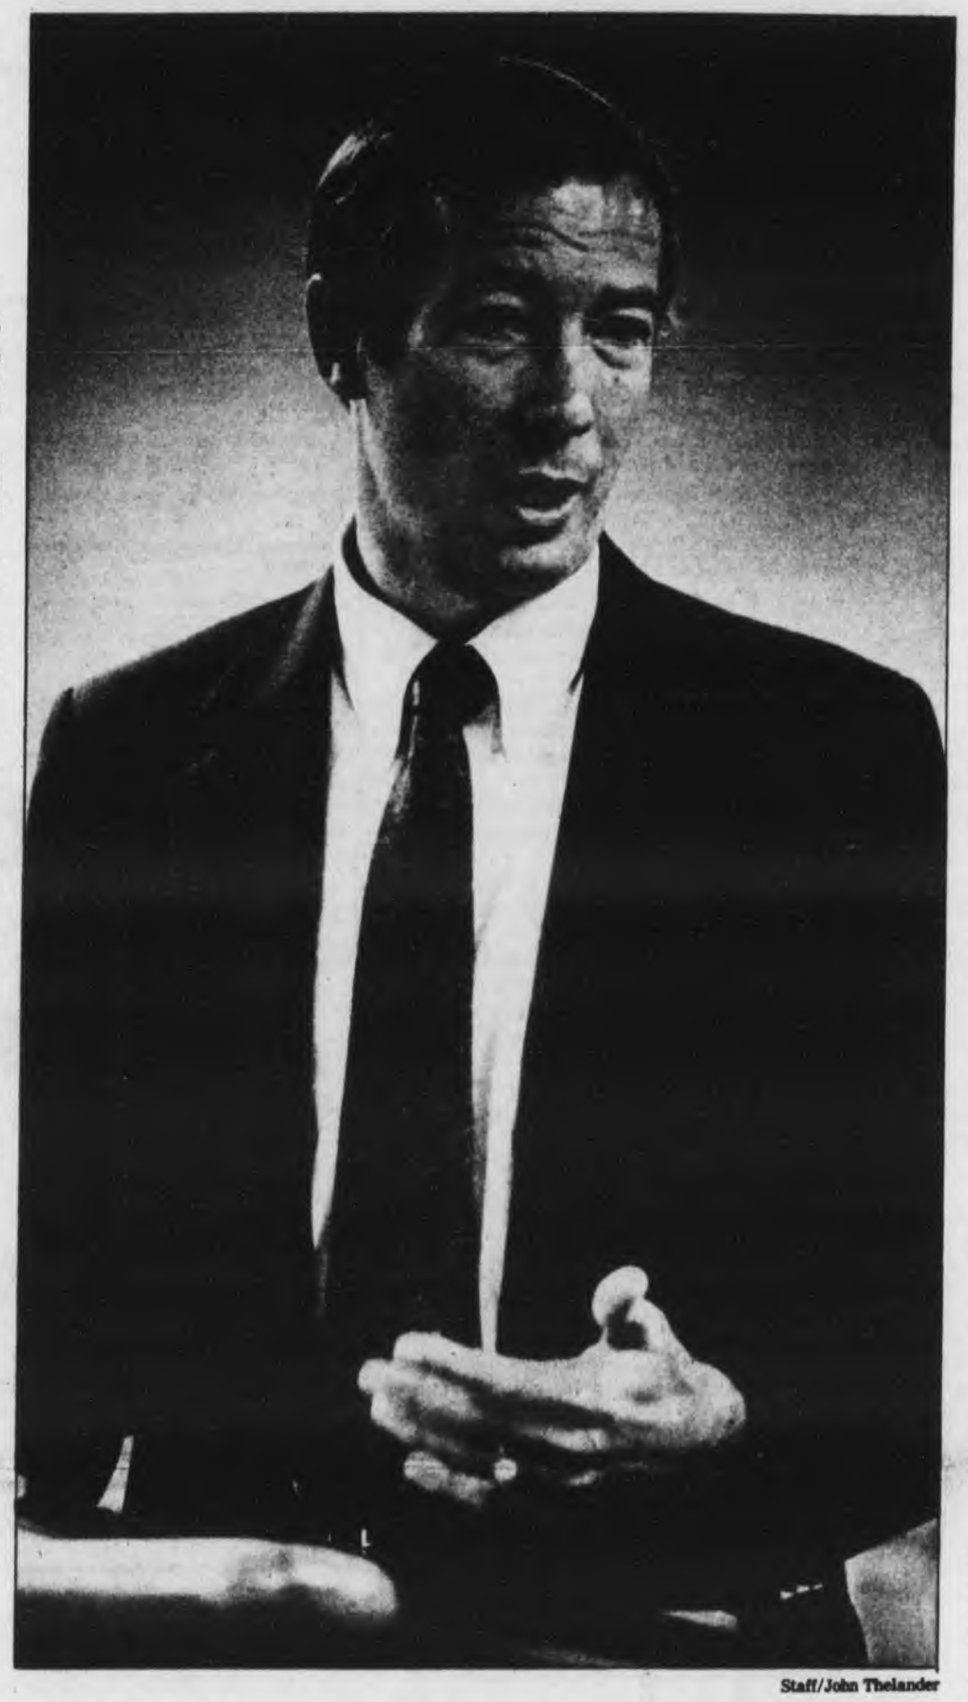
Four Americans have been confirmed killed, Lawler said. The death of a fifth U.S. citizen, in Acapulco, was unrelated to the quake, Lawler said.

Thousands of people, many wearing masks against the smell, passed slowly through makeshift morgues, looking for familiar faces among decomposing bodies.

Authorities, worried about the threat of disease, said bodies unclaimed after 48 hours would be buried in mass graves.

"Most of them are unidentified," said Red Cross Lt. Uri Fridman at the Old Seguro baseball park, which was turned into a morgue.

Thousands gathered to hear Roman Catholic Mass at the Basilica of our Lady of Guadalupe, the city's largest church. Some crawled on their knees across the church's plaza as they traditionally do to show thankfulness or do penance.



The first quake rocked the city Thursday morning. It measured 7.8 on the Richter scale. The temblor Friday measured 7.3 on the scale.

Airplanes from around the world shuttled aid to the stricken capital, the world's largest with about 18 million people.

A C-141 arrived from Kelly Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas, carrying a 19-member team organized by two construction companies, Spirit Construction of Baton Rouge, La., and the H.B. Zachary company of San Antonio. They plan to evaluate structures for demolition.

Cuba sent its Foreign Minister Isidoro Malmierca and Health Minister Sergio del Valle aboard a jet that Del Valle, a doctor, said carried medical supplies.

Architect Bill Livingston of Gossen Livingston Associates, of Wichita, answers a question about the Fred Bramlage Coliseum during Friday's Board of Regents meeting in Topeka.

Board of Regents approves new construction program for scaled-down Coliseum

By TIM CARPENTER
Editor

TOPEKA — The Board of Regents voted 7-1 Friday to accept a revised program of construction for the controversial Fred Bramlage Coliseum, permitting architects to redesign the $16.1 million facility and eliminate at least 2,500 seats.

Coliseum architect Bill Livingston, a partner in Gossen Livingston Associates of Wichita, told the regents redesigning will allow construction of a quality building although he admitted the budget for the 13,500-seat coliseum remains "really tight."

Regent Norman Brandeberry, of Russell, told Livingston and the seven-member Facilities Committee: "You (Livingston) said it would be very tight the last time and we went $2 million over. Now you're saying we're very tight again and that scares the heck out of me."

Livingston said that by reducing the coliseum's size by 2,500 to 3,000 seats and trimming an additional $500,000 in "unnecessary items — materials that aren't needed any longer due to the size reduction" — his firm should be able to deliver plans for a coliseum that would come in under budget.

Redesign of the structure — which was to originally contain 16,000 seats at a total cost of $16.1 million — became necessary Aug. 20 after the lowest construction bid of $17.9 million, from Martin K. Eby Construction Co. of Wichita, came in $1.8 million above the architect's and University's estimates.

The construction cost of the facility will remain frozen at $14.5 million and the additional $1.6 million allotted for the completion of the coliseum's interior will not be changed.

Plans for the scaled-down coliseum should be finished in one month, Livingston said, and bids for the project should be opened by February 1986. Livingston, who is contractually obligated to redesign the coliseum for free, said it is "certainly a possibility" the rebiding process will produce construction bids that will be in excess of the budget.

Two votes on the coliseum revision took place Friday. The first followed the Facilities Committee discussion in the morning and the second came during the meeting of the full board in the afternoon.

When the nine-member board voted to approve the redesign Friday afternoon, regent Patricia Caruthers of Kansas City, Kan., opposed the scaled-down coliseum and Chairman Lawrence Jones, Wichita, abstained because he was chairing the meeting.

"I still don't know what we are doing," Caruthers said. "I've never seen such foolishness in all my life. I don't want to be connected with something I don't know about."

Jones, joining Caruthers to vote against continuation of the project after two hours of committee testimony Friday morning, said he was leary about continuing the project without reviewing alternatives.

Pushing a project without examining all the possibilities, such as renovation of Ahearn Field House, is not in the best interests of the University, Jones said, "because I am not satisified we have a project we should go on."

Both said they believe the coliseum, if reduced in size, would be a "single-purpose facility" that would serve only varsity athletics and not be the multi-purpose facility to which students committed $7 million in November 1981.

Several regents supporting the measure were also concerned about the quality of the coliseum and are dissatisfied with the quality of professional advice solicited by the University.

Junction City regent John Montgomery said he believes the University "must have the coliseum," but is troubled by rumors that the coliseum will lack the plushness that was promised several years ago.

Regent Dr. Bill Roy, of Topeka, said he was concerned the regents were "giving a second or third blank check to Kansas State and ending up with a lousy building."

Wendell Lady, an Overland Park regent and architectural engineer, supported the redesign proposal but expressed reservations about the quality of the project's planning.

"The planning has given me concern throughout the whole thing. We are cutting the size to fit the amount of money, rather than sizing to fit need."

Lady chastized President Duane Acker for not consulting the "professional" architects and engineers available at the University.

Gene Cross, former vice president for University facilities, was in charge of the coliseum project for the University until his departure in August, but Acker — vowing to "devote more time" to the coliseum — told the regents that George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, will be in charge.

Premier confirms reports of Greenpeace bombings

By The Associated Press

PARIS — French secret service agents sank the Greenpeace flagship Rainbow Warrior in New Zealand on orders from their superiors, Premier Laurent Fabius said Sunday, confirming press reports on the bombing that killed one crewman.

But he did not say specifically who issued the order.

The Rainbow Warrior was sunk July 10 while docked in Auckland, New Zealand, by two mines attached to its hull. A Greenpeace photographer was killed by the blast.

The ship had been scheduled to sail for French Polynesia to protest France's testing of nuclear weapons there.

Fabius, in a statement to reporters at his office, said secret service officials had lied to Bernard Tricot, who carried out the government's initial investigation of the bombing and absolved the government of responsibility.

French newspapers had attacked the report, saying the General Directorate for External Security (DGSE), France's main espionage agency, carried out the bombing.

"It was agents of the DGSE who sank the Rainbow Warrior," Fabius said. "They acted on orders."

Defense Minister Charles Hernu, who was in overall charge of the DGSE,

Regents select screening committee

By LAURIE FAIRBURN
Chief Copy Editor

Presidential search screening committee members were named Friday by the Kansas Board of Regents at its monthly meeting.

The function of the committee is to aid the regents in the search for a replacement for President Duane Acker, who will step down from his position June 30, 1986, the end of this fiscal year.

The 13-member committee comprises representatives of the student body, alumni, faculty, University administration, the community and the regents. Their primary responsibility is to screen applicants, select semifinalists and recommend candidates to be interviewed by the regents.

The committee was originally thought to be 11 members: two representatives each of students, faculty and alumni and two non-voting, ex officio members. The panel was expanded to 13 to give it a broader base, said Regent Norman Brandeberry Friday.

Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents, said Sunday that although the screening committee is larger than the regents have utilized in the past, there is no mandated committee size. The board added two members, Koplick said, because there was a significant amount of written interest by people not connected directly with the University.

With the addition of Jan Ray, Manhattan businesswoman, and Frank Lowman, a Wichita bank president and former regent, the number of alumni on the screening committee increased to six. Lowman expressed interest personally in being on the committee. Ray was suggested as a possible member by others, based on her involvement in state, University and community affairs.

Representatives of the student body are Steve Brown, student body president and junior in pre-veterinary medicine; Tamara Barham, junior in social sciences; and Jill Hummels, graduate in journalism and mass communications.

Faculty will be represented by Charles Reagan, Faculty Senate president and professor of philosophy; Jerome Frieman, former president of Faculty Senate and pro-

County attorney quits job to take marketing position

By The Collegian Staff

Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson announced his resignation Friday morning, to take effect Oct. 4.

In making the announcement, Knutson said he was going to work in marketing for his father's farm machinery company, the Harrold Organization, Newton, which will require him to travel to Australia this fall. Knutson said he would not be moving from Manhattan at this time.

Due to his Democratic Party affiliation, naming nominees for his successor will be the responsibility of the Riley County Democratic Central Committee. Committee Chairperson Ruth Schrum was not available for comment on nominees Sunday, but in his resignation letter to Gov. John Carlin, Knutson reportedly suggested the position go to one of his current assistants, Greg Keiffer or Bill Kennedy.

Kennedy, who said he had no prior notice of Knutson's action, added he "would be interested" in becoming the next county attorney.

"We (the county attorney's office) have a good program in place," Kennedy said. "We were very disappointed to hear he was leaving."

Veterans meet with former Nazis

FRANKFURT, West Germany — Former Nazi SS soldiers Sunday welcomed a group of U.S. World War II veterans to a controversial reunion and agreed to continue their decade-long friendship despite criticism from Jewish leaders.

As television cameras whirred, 25 veterans of the U.S. 70th Infantry Division and their wives hugged and shook hands at Frankport airport with three veterans of the 6th SS Mountain Division. The two divisions fought each other in the Battle of the Bulge in France near the end of the war.

"This is no official joint reunion or celebration; we're not trying to create a precedent or a confrontation," said Floyd Freeman, a U.S. veteran who organized the Americans' two-week visit to Germany and France.

"We are just meeting our friends by choice as individuals," Freeman said.

The veterans have been meeting annually in the United States and Europe since 1976, but Jewish leaders urged cancellation of this year's meeting on the grounds that SS units were involved in Nazi atrocities.

In response, the U.S. group called off its traditional get-together with the German veterans at a French cemetery but said they still planned to meet informally in the small Bavarian spa town of Bad Windsheim later this week.

"This is the only year a fuss has been raised. Maybe it's the 40th anniversary (of World War II's end), the memory's fading and some people want to jog it," said Delyle Omholt, president of the 70th Infantry Association.

"We're here to check out old battlefields, meet friends. We do respect criticism, and that's why we're now going to the cemetery alone. We of course do not condone Nazi atrocities."

Pope expresses sorrow for Mexico

GENOA, Italy — Pope John Paul II on Sunday expressed "immense sorrow" over the deaths of thousands of earthquake victims in Mexico and urged people worldwide to aid the survivors.

Recalling the fervent religious devotion he witnessed during his 1979 Mexican visit, the pope said he prayed the quake victims would have the "comfort, hope and above all, the strength to pick themselves up and rebuild."

The 65-year-old Polish-born pontiff, speaking in Italian to about 10,000 young people at a Genoa sports arena, said he "encouraged every suitable initiative to meet the need for help that urgently appeals to the human solidarity of all people and all nations in such a tragic moment."

"I am particularly close in thoughts, heart and prayer to the people of Mexico, joining intensely in the immense sorrow," he said.

4-year-old girl dies in car accident

Three people died in weekend traffic accidents in including a 4-year-old Independence girl who was struck by a car in front of her home.

Police Chief Lee Bynum said April Dawn York ran into the path of car about 6 p.m. Friday. She died about an hour later at a hospital.

A 37-year-old Olathe man died early Saturday after his car slammed into a light pole on the west side of Lenexa. The victim was identified as Carl Davis Jr.

Police said they were called to the accident scene about 2:15 a.m. and Davis died at a hospital about 4:30 a.m.

A 22-year-old Topeka man was killed Friday night in a two-vehicle accident on a Douglas County road near the small community of Stull.

Officials discover drowning victim

MOUNTAIN HOME, Ark. — The body of a Missouri man who disappeared on Lake Norfork in northern Arkansas was recovered Sunday afternoon after a two-day search.

Baxter County Sheriff Joe Edmonds said the body of Harold Miller, 60, of Peace Valley, Mo., was pulled from the lake about 4:20 p.m. Miller was reported missing from his boat about 4:30 p.m. Friday, Edmonds said.

The sheriff said Miller's body had floated to the top of the lake and was found about 150 yards from shore in water 22 feet deep.

Witnesses on Friday reported an empty boat moving in circles on the lake. Earlier a man who appeared to be checking trot lines had been observed in the boat. Witnesses said they heard the boat's motor rev and when they turned to look, the boat was empty.

Edmonds said although Miller had heart condition, the drowning has been ruled an accident.

Senate resumes 'Superfund' debate

WASHINGTON — With eight days remaining before America's toxic waste cleanup program expires, the Senate resumes debate Monday on its "Superfund" renewal bill as House members scurry to get their bill ready for the floor.

The Senate, in sporadic floor work last week, has settled only one major question: the size of a new five-year program to replace the first five-year effort that expires at midnight Sept. 30.

Still to be confronted by the Senate in a work week shortened by the Yom Kippur holiday are how to pay for a greatly expanded Superfund and how to apportion cleanup cost liability among people responsible for creating toxic dumps.

Other issues before Congress this week are a farm bill that will set long-term agricultural policy and an anti-abortion amendment which is part of a District of Columbia spending bill.

In addition, the Senate fight over Superfund could be interrupted by controversy over trade legislation designed to protect the domestic textile and shoe industries.

Neither side of Congress is worried about the clock running out on Superfund. Leaders concede they will miss the deadline, which will result in a drying up of revenues flowing into Superfund, principally from a tax on petroleum and basic petrochemicals.

Anticipating the law's expiration, the Environmental Protection Agency last month ordered a halt to work at 57 dump sites. Lawmakers say that while they can recover the lost money, they can't regain the time lost by the temporary halt in cleanup activity.

Burford jailed for drunkenness

WASHINGTON — Former Environmental Protection Agency chief Anne M. Burford was charged with public drunkenness after police said she cursed and yelled at authorities booking her husband on a drunken driving charge.

Burford was arrested and detained four hours early Saturday at the Arlington County, Va., jail where her husband, Robert Burford, a top Interior Department official, was being booked, said Sheriff James A. Gondles.

Gondles, quoting reports by jail officials, said Sunday that Burford was arrested after she allegedly yelled and cursed at a magistrate and desk clerk in the lobby.

The sheriff said Burford demanded to be let into the jail offices to see her husband and repeatedly rang a buzzer to gain entrance after being told she could not enter the facility.

"She kept saying, 'I'm a lawyer and I know my rights and I know my husband's rights,'" Gondles said in a telephone interview.

"My understanding is that she was cussing and the magistrate was pretty annoyed and finally called an officer to come down and arrest her."

In keeping with jailhouse procedures, Burford handed over her valuables and the cloth belt she was wearing and was placed in a cell for four hours, Gondles said.

LOS ANGELES — The red, white and blue 1955 Buick in which singer-satirist Randy Newman cruised through his hit video "I Love L.A." has been bought by another City of Angels lover.

Richard Ardie, 28, of Northridge, paid $7,000 Saturday for the vintage roadster at the Spectrum Vehicle Auction on the California State University campus in Northridge.

Ardie, a self-proclaimed speculator in cars, stock and real estate, said he intends to remake the "I Love L.A." video, starring himself and his friends in the Buick.

ATLANTA — Mozambique President Samora Machel placed a wreath at the grave of Martin Luther King Jr. and said South Africa is the only nation in his region which still opposes the cause of racial equality for which King fought.

Flanked by a delegation that included his wife and a number of government ministers, Machel placed the wreath, bearing the red, green, yellow and black stripes of Mozambique's flag, in front of King's crypt Saturday.

Machel, the 51-year-old Marxist who is the only man to lead Mozambique since its independence in 1975, met with Mayor Andrew Young and King's widow, Coretta Scott King, during the second stop of his weeklong, four-city tour of the United States.

He discussed southern African issues with President Reagan, Secretary of State George Shultz and Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger earlier in the week and is to address the U.N. General Assembly on Wednesday.

75 join sorority house; pledges begin activities

By POLLY COLIP
Staff Writer

Alpha Gamma Delta sorority is on its feet, after last week's pledging of 75 new colony members.

"We are all starting out together and will be learning everything as we go," said Kim Elliott, junior in elementary education and activities chairperson for Alpha Gam. "Because we are the first ones (members), we hope to make the right decisions in setting the rules and guidelines."

Interest in the idea of a "new situation" is what attracted many upperclassmen to join Alpha Gam, said Shelly Sutton, graduate in journalism and mass communications and graduate counselor for Alpha Gam. Of the colony members, there are 13 seniors, 23 juniors, 19 sophomores and 20 freshmen.

Elliot, along with Kelli Carr, senior in journalism and mass communications and colony president for Alpha Gam, said they were attracted because they would be the first members.

"I went through Alpha Gam rush just to see what it was about," Carr said. "I was attracted because of the great opportunity to be part of the founding colony — a way to really leave my mark on campus."

Carr will be president during the colonization period. She and the other officers were appointed by Sutton.

Colonization is the organizing period of a new charter, Sutton said. Members will function as a colony until January or February when they will be installed as a chapter.

"To establish Alpha Gam, we have taken a group of girls who have never even seen each other before, but they are now creating the nucleus (of Alpha Gam)," Sutton said. "There is a lot of work entailed in a new chapter, because there is no base. Panhellenic Council and Greek Affairs have done the groundwork and helped us head in the right direction."

During the pledgeship, Sutton said the girls will learn fraternal education along with understanding sisterhood.

"We will have a 'special sister' program, similar to a pledge mom-daughter program," Sutton said. "New girls will get to know each other along with helping each other."

Besides working with the new members, Sutton said she believes greek interaction will boost campus involvement of Alpha Gam. Activities they have planned include parties, functions and participating in Homecoming with the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity.

"The Alpha Gam members at the University of Kansas, who helped with rush, have invited us to the KU vs. K-State football game," Elliot said.

Alpha Gam members plan to have their house built and ready for occupancy by the fall of 1987. Funding will be through the Alpha Gam national foundation.

"We have an option on land which is next to the Tri-Sigma house (1545 Denison Ave.)," Sutton said.

Needy children receive volunteers' care

Big Brothers/Big Sisters provide time

By LESLIE STOKES
Collegian Reporter

Those who have grown up with older brothers and sisters may know what it's like to have someone take them shopping or to a football game. However, some children never have the opportunity.

The Big Brothers/Big Sisters organization fills that void by providing companionship for children needing friendship and guidance from an older person.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters are 18 years or older and give approximately three hours each week to a needy child. Some of the young people may be having trouble adjusting to school, while some are handicapped or are being raised by a single parent.

In 1903, Ervin Westheimer, a Cincinnati stockbroker, saw a young boy rummaging through trash cans and befriended him. Other businessmen followed his example and adopted boys who wandered the streets. The boys began referring to their new-found friends as "Big Brothers."

Big Sisters was founded by the Vanderbilt family in 1908. The two services merged in 1977.

There are about 110 "matches" — Big Brother-Little Brother — in the Manhattan area and students are involved in about half of them, Winnie Endicott, executive director for Big Brothers/Big Sisters, said. According to Endicott, about 75 percent of the 50 to 60 children waiting for a "match" are boys.

The Big Brother or Sister decides how much money they want to spend on their little brother or sister. However, the organization encourages doing everyday activities such as playing ball, taking walks, going to the park or zoo or baking cookies. Many of the places in Manhattan offer discounts for Big Brother and Big Sister matches. For example, most movie theaters offer two-for-one tickets, Endicott said.

Beth Lambert, senior in dietetics and institutional management and a Big Sister, said a trip to Rock Springs 4-H Ranch was her favorite time spent with her Little Sister.

"We worked as a team and we got to know each other a lot better," Lambert said. "You can really tell the kids are proud of their Big Brothers and Sisters. You'll hear them yell to each other 'that's my big brother over there.'"

Lambert's daughter, Elise, 6, is a Little Sister. When asked what she wanted to be when she grew up, Elise said, "I want to do what (her Big Sister) Joselle does."

Joselle Edwards, instructor in physical education, dance and leisure studies, said, "I like doing things, just the two of us."

Edwards keeps to her schedule when she is with Elise. They grocery shop, make dinner or tend the garden. Edwards likes doing everyday sorts of things because "it's important Elise doesn't think Santa Claus comes every week," she said.

Frank Gilliam, Big Brother and research associate in the biology department, said his involvement with the organization is more of an interaction than a service. "You learn a lot about yourself and how you were as a child," Gilliam said.

"Meeting a match is the ultimate blind date, but once you get to know your match, the relationship becomes easier."

Because Big Brothers/Big Sisters is a non-profit agency, the program depends on funding from other organizations. The majority of funding comes from Manhattan city revenue sharing funds and the United Way. It also receives generous fundings from campus organizations such as Spurs, Chimes and Alpha Phi Omega service organizations, as well as the fraternal organizations on campus.

'Cosby Show' at top of Emmy award list

By The Associated Press

PASADENA, Calif. — "The Cosby Show," the warm and loving series about a black family that has sparked NBC's drive for top ratings, won three awards, including outstanding comedy series, at the 37th annual Emmys Sunday.

The show, new last season, won best comedy writing for Ed Weinberg and Michael Leeson and best direction for Jay Sandrich. Bill Cosby, the star and driving force behind the show, rejected a nomination, saying he didn't believe in competing against other performers, and boycotted the ceremony at the Pasadena Civic Auditorium.

"So much of my work is shaped by Bill Cosby's wit and philosophy of what a family could be," Sandrich said in accepting his honor at a faster-paced, restructed awards show televised live on ABC.

NBC, which has topped the ratings for 16 of the past 17 weeks, dominated the early awards with five out of the first nine announced. It led the nominations with 125, more than double the totals for both CBS and ABC.

John Addison's music for CBS's "Murder, She Wrote" beat Jan Hammer's "Miami Vice" score and Karen Arthur won the dramatic directing Emmy for a "Cagney & Lacey" episode.

Robert Guillaume, the star of ABC's "Benson," whose character has progressed from manservant to lieutenant governor, won the award as best comedy actor.

"I know you can't tell, but I just lost my color," the black performer joked. "This certainly beats going home empty-handed for a sixth time, and I'd like to thank Bill Cosby for not being here."

John Larroquette, who plays Dan Fielding, on NBC's "Night Court," won best supporting actor on a comedy series.

Beef program may add pounds, profit

By SHELLY DICKEN
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas "green tag" pre-conditioning program for beef cattle can add more pounds of beef and increase the producer's profit, said Homer Caley, state leader in extension veterinary medicine.

"The objective of the program is to establish reasonably healthy calves that a buyer can buy with confidence," Caley said. "The buyer will know the calves have had the necessary things done so they are ready to go to a feedlot and perform."

The program is named green tag pre-conditioning because each calf is identified with a round, metal green tag, Caley said. In pre-conditioning, the producer and the local veterinarian decide what part of the program each will do.

About three weeks before the calf is weaned from its mother, a series of vaccinations is given to the calf.During this time and for approximately one month after weaning, the calf will be taught to eat from a feedbunk and drink from a water trough.

In the program, the calves are also dehorned, treated for grubs or lice, implanted with a growth hormone and the bull calves are castrated.

Once these management procedures have been completed, the producer works with a local sale barn in organizing a pre-conditioned calf sale, Caley said.

"If the calves have gone through the green tag pre-conditioning program, the producer provides a certificate of proof for the buyer. The veterinarian and the producer have to both sign the paper before the calf is certified," Caley said.

The pre-conditioned calves are different from normal calves because they have had a more thorough health program than many other calves. This can be an asset in disease prevention as the calves grow older, Caley said.

The calves are also bunk-broke, allowing them to gain weight sooner without having to go through the process of learning how to eat once they're in the feedlot.

"As far as I am concerned, being broke to the feedbunk is as important as the vaccinations," Caley said. "It keeps the nutritional plane up and the calf can do better."

Caley said there are three factors that make the pre-conditioning program a success: the auction market and the initial promotion of the sale, the producers working with the veterinarians and the buyers who are willing to pay a little extra for pre-conditioned calves.

"It just won't work without any of these three," Caley said.

The pre-conditioning program is co-sponsored by the Kansas Veterinary Medicine Association and the Kansas Livestock Association.

Approximately 20,000 calves were in the green tag program in 1984, Caley said.

Gerry Kuhl, extension specialist in beef cattle nutrition and management, sees the value of the pre-conditioning program, but has changed the procedure somewhat, calling his different approach "progressive pre-conditioning."

"The progressive program stairsteps the procedures over a longer period of time. Instead of the basic stand-by philosophy of condensing all of the management procedures into 30 days, we recommend 45 to 60 days.

"By weaning, these calves will be fairly self-sufficient," Kuhl said. "The program can just about guarantee the producer will make money. He has to have that economic gain. Without that, the management and time are not really worth his effort."

Regents' vote disturbing

The University is going to build a brand new $16.1 million barn.

Just when it appeared some sanity was creeping into the issue of the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum, the Board of Regents gave the go-ahead on the project with a 7-1 vote.

To meet the $16.1 million budget for the project, at least 2,500 seats must be removed from the original design of 16,000 seats. At maximum, the coliseum will contain 13,500 seats, only 900 seats larger than Ahearn Field House would be if renovated.

However, it is unlikely the budget will allow more than 13,000 seats, only 400 more than Ahearn would contain. Coliseum architect Bill Livingston, a partner in Gossen Livingston Associates of Wichita, told the regents the budget for a 13,500 seat coliseum remains "really tight."

After spending two hours in committee, the regents were mad — mad at the architecture firm, mad about the delay and mad at the University administration. But apparently they weren't mad enough.

Regent Norman Brandeberry, Russell, said the tight budget "scares the heck out of me." But he voted for redesign anyway, as did six other regents.

Only Regent Patricia Caruthers, Kansas City, Kan., used common sense and refused to back a project which would fail to meet the needs and wants of students and alumni, saying "I've never seen such foolishness in all my life."

If the size of the coliseum is reduced, it will be a single-purpose facility which will serve only varsity athletics. In November of 1981, students committed $7 million for a multi-purpose facility.

Hand railings, acoustical equipment, a sound stage and light fixtures will be eliminated. The multitude of uses for which the coliseum was intended — including concerts, speeches, graduation ceremonies and open houses — will not be possible with the downgraded design.

K-State wanted a showcase for the University — a coliseum which would draw talented recruits and enthusiastic fans.

Students should call for a referendum demanding a coliseum of quality or no coliseum at all. If President Duane Acker vetoes the referendum, then students can pass a second referendum and a third. Someone might finally get the message.

University shows progress

To imagine the immensity of a billion hungry people and the smallness of a single electron in the same setting takes a modern mind.

To dream about the possibilities for greatness, though, characterizes the minds of mavericks throughout the centuries. Issac Goodnow, who was instrumental in the development of the University in early Manhattan, was no exception.

Writing from the East, where in 1859 he had gone to solicit funds for higher education, Goodnow envisioned success: "It strikes my mind that we can, if we will it, lay the foundation for as noble an institution as Old Yale or Harvard."

Goodnow's dream, in a modern way unfathomable to him, may be coming true, if last Wednesday's events are any indication.

At one end of the scale, five leaders from the People's Republic of China were visiting Schellenberger Hall, the only milling school in the nation. The five are responsible for all of the milling and most of the baking in China. Their decisions, and thus the extent of their knowledge, affect the health of one quarter of the global population.

K-State, through its willingness to exchange ideas, has now had a hand in ensuring the well-being of over a billion persons.

At the other end of the scale, those concerned with single electrons were making their own mark Wednesday at the ground breaking of the new expansion of the James R. MacDonald Laboratory. The new $6.9 million ion lab will be the only one of its capability in the nation and is sure to advance the understanding of the structure of the atom.

The milling school and the ion laboratory may not be "Old Yale," but no doubt Goodnow would recognize the two as unique marks of excellence that make K-State stand out among the nation's universities.

And to Goodnow, who understood the importance of intellectual diversity, excellence in these two unrelated areas would lend all the more credit to the notion that K-State is truly a University.

Senate leader fails to represent students

TIM CARPENTER
Editor

The process whereby the interests of the governed are "represented" to those who govern them is crucial to any type of democratic government. Relations between an official and an electorate who has no power over the official other than that provided by an election are delicate.

Leaders of K-State's student government — if they are to remain effective — must respect the diverse, and often dissident, interests of their constituents.

The responsibilities of a conscientious student leader of a large university like K-State are enormous. When individuals accept positions in Student Senate — the sole forum for expression of student opinion — they must maintain the trust and respect of their peers.

When student leaders lose their constituents' respect they also lose their effectiveness. Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones, senior in management, exemplifies the manner in which a student leader can lose his effectiveness.

During the Friday Board of Regents meeting Jones was granted permission, along with President Duane Acker; Bill Livingston, architect for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum; State Architect John Hipp; Mark Foehse, instructor in computer science; and Steve Scott, senior in architectural engineering; an opportunity to comment on a proposal to reduce the size of the coliseum.

When he approached the podium to address the regents he said he represented the "students at K-State" and proceeded to inform the regents that "students are still behind" the project.

Jones spoke of a referendum, which took place May 7, that served to gauge student opinion of the coliseum project. According to Jones, the referendum showed that students still support the project.

This puzzled Overland Park regent Wendell Lady. He interrupted Jones to clarify whether or not the referendum took place before or after the April 19 regents' meeting in which Jones also said students' support for the coliseum was strong. At the April meeting, Jones said "those opposed to the coliseum are only speaking for a few students."

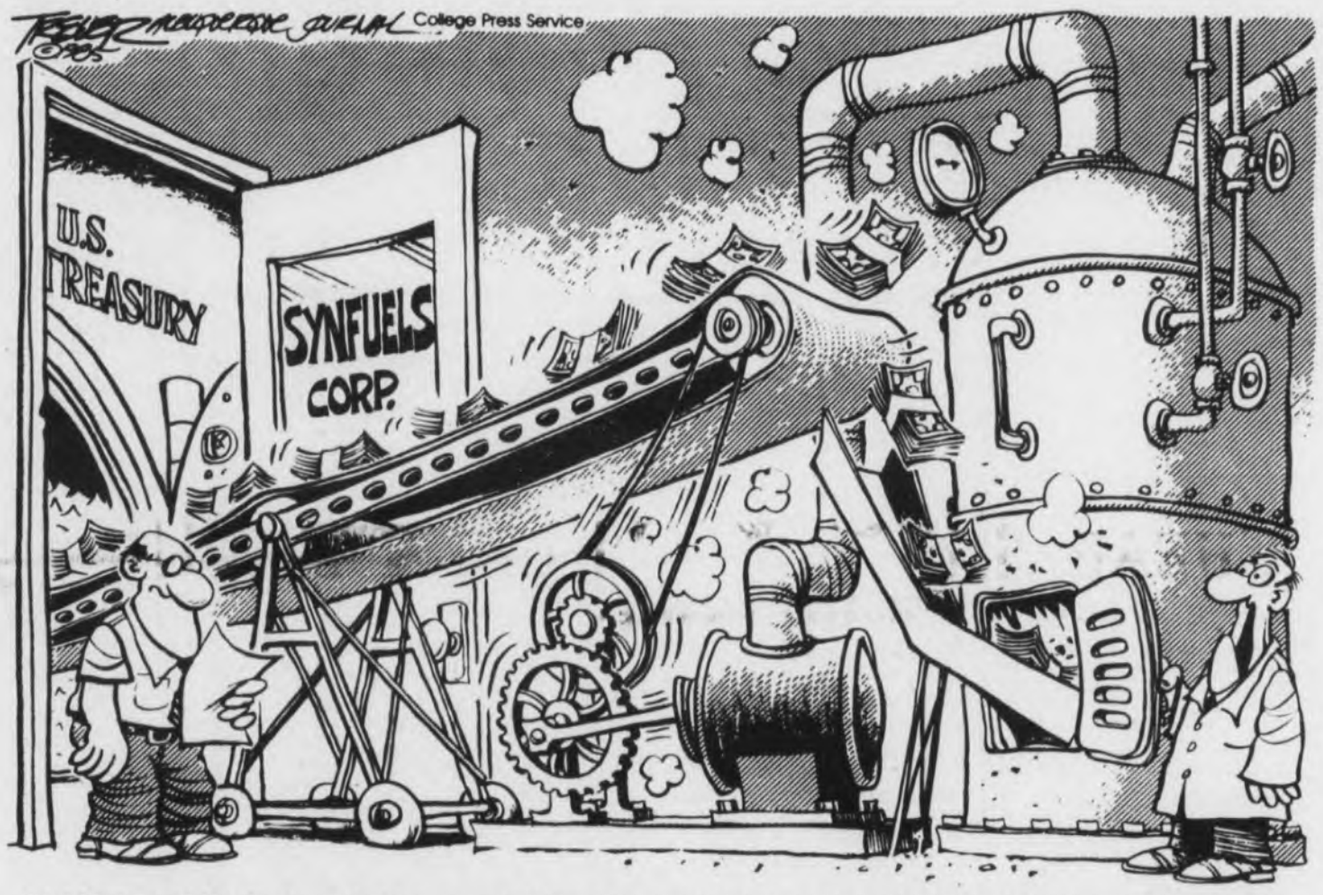
However, on Friday, Jones could not remember which month the student referendum was held. He turned in vain to the 50 people in the audience for an answer. He searched for Student Body President Steve Brown, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, but he was not present.

In desperation, Jones informed Lady he was "sure" the referendum took place before the April meeting of the board.

Jones' answer did not satisfy Lady. At this point Foehse spoke up and clarified the matter. Foehse said, "The regents met on April 19 and the referendum was in May."

The senate chairman's inability to answer simple questions is not the type of leadership the Senate, nor the students of K-State, deserve or need. When the official who presides over all senate meetings, oversees the allocation of nearly $800,000 in student fees and appoints chairpersons to senate committees cannot remember events as significant as a student referendum — we are in trouble.

The referendum that Jones forgot about was, in part, an attempt to gauge student opinion about the allocation of $7 million in student fees. It took place May 7 and students voted 1,302 to 716 in favor of delaying the coliseum project until several studies could be completed.



The referendum needed a two-thirds majority to pass, but fell approximately 50 votes shy of that figure.

Jones, in his capacity as a "student leader," did the student body a disservice Friday. He neglected to do his homework and prepare for the meeting. He let the students down.

Some cynics might suggest that the nature of politics will lead politicians — senate leaders in this case — to conduct public affairs for private advantage. If Jones is using his position to further personal interests at the expense of his constituents, he should resign.

The Watergate scandal and the deceit surrounding U.S. involvement in the Vietnam conflict illustrate the damage that can be done by politicians who believe politics is "the art of governing mankind through deceiving them."

Jones' charge is to control and reconcile the diverse interests of his constituents. To accomplish that goal he must be aware of events such as the referendum. Perhaps Jones learned a lesson Friday. For the sake of students at K-State, he best have.

"WHAT? THEY'RE GOING TO SHUT US DOWN?! JUST WHEN WE'VE DEVELOPED A MAJOR NEW SOURCE OF FUEL?..."

Motives, not actions of heroes important

RICH HARRIS
Collegian Columnist

Who's your hero? James Bond? Alan Alda? Margaret Thatcher? Mother Teresa?

When I was younger, my heroes, like most children's, were action figures — pilots of fighter planes and bombers, spies, detectives, starship captains and so on. Nowadays, though, I have some newer heroes.

Before I changed my major, I was in premed, and changing was one of the hardest decisions I've ever made. I'd always wanted to be a doctor, and I thought nothing could change that. Because I wanted to be good at what I did, I chose heroes like Hawkeye Pierce, Charles Emerson Winchester III and BJ Honeycutt. I was a M A S H man all the way.

But there was more to the choice than the fact these men were physicians. There was a subtle but important change in the way I selected my heroes.

When I was younger I chose my heroes because of what they did. It was natural. But now I choose my heroes because of why they did what they did. There is an important difference.

My heroes today? Still some old ones, Captain Kirk and James Bond, but now others too, like Stephen King, David Ogilvy and Dan Rather. The whys and hows of what they do are now their prime credentials.

I still have James T. Kirk of the starship Enterprise as a hero because of why he does what he does. Book after book has been written about Jimmy, depicting him as everything from a galactic Kissinger to a 23rd-century Captain Bligh.

But if you set aside most of the gobbledygook, Jim Kirk comes across as a man with a deep-rooted sense of idealism. His "human weaknesses" are the graces that set man apart from the animals. It is little wonder that the millions who associate Kirk and the Enterprise with mankind's greatest values fought so long and hard to have the latest great step into space named after their fantasy captain's ship. The Enterprise might serve as a symbol of our aspirations.

James Bond, in the books by Ian Fleming, is a ruthless "blunt instrument" (M's words, in The Man With the Golden Gun). He is a professional assassin, a killer.

But Ian Fleming salvages 007's conscience, and that of his readers, by one neat trick of deus ex machina: James Bond, in all the books and in all the short stories, never once killed in cold blood. He may have been sent with orders to that effect, but the villian always took a potshot at 007 first, and usually tortured him in the bargain.

The point, however, is that James Bond frequently wrestled with his own conscience (in the books, mind you). In book after book — Casino Royale, Moonraker, For Your Eyes Only and The Man With the Golden Gun — Bond argued with his conscience about the game of "Red Indians" he played for England.

And always, his love of King and country won out over his fear, his anger and his desire. And in the situations Bond in which Bond found himself, that is something of which he can be proud. Could I — could you — be so determined in the face of death?

What about Stephen King, the novelist? Personally, I enjoy his choice of milieu, but not everyone likes modern American horror fiction. Still, King's style of writing is what impresses me the most. King is the most readable author I have ever read.

Read King. If you are turned off by horror, read "Different Seasons." It's King's style without the macabre themes. It proves he can write well without the crutch of a constantly repeated topic. And if for no other reason than that, I admire him.

David Ogilvy, the advertising genius, made a mint and went on to write several books telling of his experiences and describing techniques he used to become the expert he is today. I encourage anyone in marketing, advertising, sales, communications, public relations or with an interest in discovering what makes ad men tick to read his books.

Dan Rather's camera "never blinks." He is the most respected television news anchor today. His style and journalistic ethics have made him America's news voice. Those who would question his professionalism do so at the risk of their own reputation. Rather is an excellent newsman.

Heroes are personal things. My criteria won't always be yours. But we need heroes for the sake of our own lives. Without a goal and a model, we will drift aimlessly. There is an urge in all of us to be everything within our potential. Heroes give us something to shoot for, a mountain to climb and a level to which we can and must strive.

Players, not Dickey, responsible

Editor,

I think it is incredible that Head Coach Jim Dickey resigned after our recent loss to Northern Iowa. Dickey didn't play against Northern Iowa, the guys on our football team did. How is it that Dickey can blame himself for us losing?

Football is supposed to help develop leadership in students, not in the head coach. Where are the leaders of our football team? Somebody has to call the play, somebody has to assess the weak and strong points of the opposition, somebody has to determine the training regimen. In other words, somebody has to be in charge.

That somebody should be a quarterback, not a coach. The coaches must relegate themselves to an advisory role. The ability of a coach has absolutely nothing to do with our team winning games. If people would realize this, everybody would be more relaxed and we might win some games.

Money should go for scholarships

Editor,

I realize there are going to be several different groups requesting that the money available from the bond refinancing be used to fund their interests. Obviously there are many very good causes to which this money could be allocated and the final decisions should be carefully considered.

Since this is a substantial amount of money, I feel that it would be possible to fund a number of the requests that are going to be made. If this approach is taken, I think it would be well worth the while of those making the decisions to consider allotting a portion of the money to set up a fund for financial aid to those persons who have chosen to resist registering with the Selective Service.

It's a well-known fact that in accordance with the Solomon Amendment, these individuals are denied any form of federal aid. This is truly an injustice and an unfair burden to those who, for whatever reason, have found it against their principles to register for the draft. Some of these people consider registration to be a moral wrong and an aggressive strike at humanity.

They should not be denied the right to further their education, or be excessively burdened with financial stress just because their beliefs don't coincide with the policies of the U.S. government. They are American citizens and as such should be treated with the same respect as those who see no harm in the registration process.

I think it should be noted that such a fund has been allocated by student government at the University of Iowa and as a member of that student government reasoned, it is not an issue of draft registration, but is rather an issue concerning the freedom of education.

I can't stress enough the importance of this issue, and I feel that the student government of this University should give careful consideration to providing financial aid to those students who have been denied this aid by the federal government — a government which represents a country that, in its constitution, has pledged to respect the rights and principles of its citizens.

Americans, Soviets violate rights

Editor,

Re: Douglas Dickey's letter, "Protesters of apartheid promote 'selective morality'" in the Sept. 19 Collegian:

Columnist Mike Riley started it, now Douglas Dickey has picked it up too. It may be right to call it the "Jerry Falwell syndrome" going on on this campus.

What is going on in South Africa is not just a violation of human rights that one can equate to the problem the United States sees as human rights violations in the Soviet Union. Apartheid can only be compared to slavery and the Jewish life under Hitler, nothing else. While those two are gone, apartheid is still breathing strongly and promises to go on and on.

Human rights violations Riley and Dickey are trying to match up to apartheid fall far short. Depending on who is calling the shots, I would be right to say that both the United States and the Soviet Union have an equal share of human rights violations. Just to list a few away from home, what is the United States doing in Central America, Chile, the Middle East and to the Native American Indians? Are those not violations — and are they different from those the Soviets are said to be committing?

Apartheid is more than a human rights violation alone. It justifies the enslavement of 23 million people, making them non-citizens, extending rights and other liberties to only those who are not black in skin color. The United States is actively doing business with the minority government and it's this business that helps the government to cling onto power by use of force.

Americans should stand up to support the freedom of the oppressed people of South Africa in their demand for majority rule. Remember the Soviets are not yet in South Africa but America is there on the side of those violating human rights. Americans should protest and bring their nation to the right side.

World peace requires social order

Editor,

Racial prejudice in South Africa, hunger problems in Ethiopia, "holy wars" in the Middle East and the threat of nuclear war — the time has come for us to realize that world peace cannot be attained until individuals' inner beings and every aspect of the social order have been improved. I have nine basic principles to be considered for a new world order and world peace.

1) Oneness of humankind — A harm to one part of the world is a harm to the whole, just as a harm to one organ is a harm to the whole body's function.

2) Equality of men and women — Humankind is as a bird. It cannot fly with only one wing.

3) Elimination of prejudice — We must eliminate all prejudices, whether racial, national, political, sexual, class, economic or religious.

4) Harmony of science and religion — Religion must regulate the excessive use/abuse of science (e.g. nuclear weapons) and the scientific reasoning must prevent religion's superstitions and fanaticism.

5) Elimination of extreme wealth and poverty — Every nation and individual must be provided with necessary wealth, comfort and education.

6) Education for all — All the children and people must be given beneficial academic, moral and spiritual education.

7) Independent investigation of truth — Everyone must investigate the truth of reality on his/her own, not by blind imitation.

8) A universal auxiliary language must be adopted, either an existing language or invented one, to provide a means for universal communication (preserving one's own tongue).

9) The common foundation of all religions — All the world religions agree in essence. The purpose of religion is peace and unity, not war and disunity.

Wildcat pride

Editor,

For the sake of purple pride, let me take you all aside and suggest you look at home: Cover with a plastic dome your fine and dandy stadium. It can service basketball when football's over in the fall. 'Twould cost less, service more. What else do you need? For such a plan needs no excuse — you'd join the fine University of Syracuse! If you call it a house of cards, maybe Hallmark would pay the bards. That's us.

Social life important for retention

Editor,

I would support Professor Schell to encourage K-State to emphasize the social life on campus to help retain student numbers.

Many students enjoy their social life as much as the academic life. (What a surprise!)

Offering trips to concerts and other places of interest at reasonable rates would be a big plus for K-State. Many universities have ticket offices allowing students to purchase tickets for events external to the university. Providing any availability to such tickets and providing the service for a bus load of people may sound like peanuts, but it would make many of us very happy to have that opportunity.

Exchange visits, between K-State and the University of Kansas may also be worthwhile to integrate the two campuses' social affairs and allow both to take advantage of the entertainment available.

Belts save lives

Editor,

The Safety Belt Office in Extension Home Economics would like to recognize the men and women who took time before the Sept. 7 football game and during halftime to help convince their peers on campus that the best protection against death and injury in a car is the safety belt.

Members of Alpha Gamma Rho, Alpha Tau Omega, Alpha Chi Omega and Alpha Xi Delta rode the Seat Belt Convincer through simulated 5 mph car crashes in the stadium parking lot.

Thanks for caring. We hope those who rode and those who watched are convinced that safety belts do save lives.

Ad unacceptable

Editor,

I find the picture which accompanied the "Beverly Hills Exposed" ad in the Sept. 19 Collegian objectionable. It is another example of how media images can desensitize the public.

I have no doubt that if the picture was reversed and the figure in the tub was a man, legs akimbo, with his arm positioned in a similar fashion the general public would perceive the image as somewhat demeaning and humiliating to men. However, I fear when it is a female figure we think nothing of it.

Making the private sexuality of women a public advertising gimmick is as American as corn flakes. I objected two years ago to an ad in the Collegian for another "late night movie" which showed male hands holding a fork and a knife about to cut a nipple off a breast. I postulated that if the image was a female hand holding a knife about to sever a penis, the ad would not have been used, or if used would have been extremely offensive to many. My letter was never printed.

A country desensitized to images like these and their dehumanizing effect on the way women are perceived goes fist- in-fist with a country where violence against women continues to thrive.

Horned Frogs hold off 'Cats, 24-22

K-State safety Don Cliggett (42) wrestles down TCU running back Tony Jeffrey (27) after a 13-yard gain in the third quarter. Jeffrey led the Horned Frogs with 66 yards rushing in the 24-22 win over the Wildcats.

By TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

A new beginning.

In one respect the result was the same: Another loss for K-State's football team.

In other respects, though, K-State's 24-22 loss to Texas Christian University Saturday afternoon was like a victory to the players.

"It hurts like hell right now, but we got better and that's all you can ask," free safety and team captain Barton Hundley said. "A win would be nice. We lost 24-22, but we had a lot of winners out there today."

"I'm just sorry they didn't have a chance to win, because that would have been great for them," said K-State interim head coach Lee Moon. "It's got to hurt (emotionally), but that's what I want. I want them to hurt because next week they'll play twice as hard to win. Now they know they have the ability to win."

The improvement in the Wildcats' play from the first two losses caught the attention of TCU Head Coach Jim Wacker.

"Kansas State has to be awfully proud of their kids. Boy, did they fight their hearts out," Wacker said. "If they continue playing like they did today, then I am satisfied they will win their share of games down the road."

While K-State wasn't able to beat TCU, an inspired Wildcat team gave their fans hope the team could indeed play good football. Unlike the past two K-State games, losses to the University of Northern Iowa and Wichita State University, the Wildcats seemed proud of their performance.

"We had a really sound game plan, offensively and defensively," Moon said. "I thought we played well all over the football field. They (TCU) have a heckuva football team."

K-State's defense kept the Wildcats in the contest by recovering three TCU fumbles and holding the Horned Frogs powerful running game to just 143 yards rushing. Pressure from the Wildcat defensive line, including six tackles for 26 yards in losses by defensive end Kevin Humphrey, limited the TCU passing attack to 143 yards.

After admitting to receiving payoffs from boosters, five TCU players, including running back Kenneth Davis, a Heisman Trophy candidate, were suspended Friday by Wacker.

After falling behind TCU 24-16 with 4 minutes, 10 seconds left in the fourth quarter, K-State had seemingly run out of chances. K-State was unable to move the ball after TCU's final touchdown and was forced to punt.

After TCU took over, K-State defensive back Kenneth Anderson, on a safety blitz, hit TCU quarterback Troy Ankrom, causing a fumble which the Wildcats' Troy Adams recovered just 16 yards from the Horned Frog end zone.

Five plays later, K-State running back Tony Jordan scored a touchdown to pull the Wildcats within two at 24-22. K-State elected to go for two, but quarterback John Welch's pass to Todd Moody fell in-

K-State interim coach Lee Moon shows emotion during the last few seconds of Saturday's loss to TCU.

Welch's debut sparks team to near-upset

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

As Texas Christian took possession of the ball with just over nine minutes remaining in their 24-22 win Saturday over K-State, a former defensive end took the offensive headphones from a team trainer and began talking to offensive coordinator Al Sandahl in the press box.

No, K-State hadn't become so desperate that they had resorted to playing a defensive player at quarterback. Rather, Coach Lee Moon had decided that it was time for a change to be made at quarterback in an attempt to spark the team in its final three possessions of the contest. It was time for former defensive end John Welch to avoid sacks rather than to record them.

Welch came to K-State last year after one successful season at Southwestern College in Winfield, where he led the NAIA school to a 10-1 record and a bowl bid as the team's starting quarterback.

But upon his arrival at K-State, Welch was moved to defensive end. He played as a backup to left end Grady Newton in all 11 games in 1984, recording 19 tackles and one quarterback sack.

This spring, however, K-State coaches decided that it was time for Welch to make the move back to the position he had played so well at Cedar Vale Memorial High School, where he led his team to three championships in three seasons. It was time for Welch to be a quarterback again.

And Saturday afternoon, after receiving Coach Sandahl's instructions from the press box, Welch made his first appearance at quarterback in a major college game.

It was a game Welch won't soon forget, but not for the obvious reasons.

His statistics — three passes completed on six attempts for 27 yards — were fairly impressive for a quarterback coming off the bench on a cold day with his team down by eight points (24-16) and in need of a quick score. Yet, Welch wasn't satisified.

"I'm never satisfied unless I win," said Welch of his efforts, which included an important 12-yard throw to split end Gerald Alphin to set up K-State's final touchdown of the day. Moon, however, was pleased — particularly with the throw to Alphin.

"He made a great throw on the curl route to Gerald," Moon said. "It was a big-league throw. He's got a fine arm."

It wasn't his arm, however, that concerned Welch as he was readying himself to enter the game. The butterflies in his stomach were the real problem, he said.

"I was excited, nervous. I also knew what I had to do, too," Welch said. "I couldn't be so uptight that I couldn't perform. I had to go out there and try to make something happen. And that's what I did my best to do."

Welch couldn't move the team on his first possession behind the center, but a key fumble recovery by defensive end Troy Adams gave K-State and Welch another scoring opportunity.

Five plays later the 'Cats were in the end zone and were down by just two, 24-22. An attempted two-point conversion pass from Welch to tailback Todd Moody was knocked away by a TCU defensive back. It appeared as if Welch's work for the day was done.

An onside kick recovered by K-State's Scott Wentzel on the next play changed all of that.

With 48 seconds showing on the scoreboard clock and K-State in possession of the ball on the TCU 49-yard line, Welch took control.

His first pass attempt of the series was complete to Alphin for a first down at the TCU 37-yard line, and K-State was but seven yards from being within range for a field goal attempt that would win the ballgame. It was as close as Welch could get them, however.

Welch's incomplete pass to flanker Mark Wentzel was sandwiched between two sacks by TCU defensive ends, and Welch was forced into throwing a bomb into the end zone with no time remaining on the clock. The pass fell incomplete, and K-State's hopes for a comeback were denied.

Welch blamed himself for the sacks.

"I just took too long because the receivers had longer routes," he said. "The linemen can't win every battle, and we can't expect them to. They played their hearts out today. I'll take the blame for the sacks."

Although Welch was unhappy with his performance on the last drive of the game, Moon was impressed enough with his efforts to say Welch would be given a chance to earn more playing time in the coming weeks.

"I think John deserves more playing time after today's (Saturday's) effort," Moon said.

The coach wouldn't, however, say that Welch was now the No. 1 quarterback. "It's too early to make a decision at this point," the interim coach said.

Welch wouldn't want it any other way.

"All I want is a chance to prove to the coaches, my teammates and myself that I can make things happen here," he said. "I'm a competitor, and I want to do anything I can to help us win."

complete.

The Wildcats still had a chance to pull out a win when they recovered an onside kick. The TCU defense, after yielding one first down, used two quarterback sacks to stop the K-State offense and clinch the victory.

"When they got that last touchdown, we could have shut down," Moon said. "When we went for two and didn't get it, they didn't quit then. They made the play and got the onside kick." TCU began the scoring in the first quarter, with a 69-yard drive, culminating in a 1-yard touchdown run by running back Tony Jeffery.

K-State came back to drive from their own 21-yard line to the TCU 28, as Danny Helmer was successful on a 45-yard field goal attempt.

On the ensuing kickoff, Horned Frog returner Wayne Waddy fumbled and K-State's Jim Oehm recovered on the TCU 22. K-State went on to score a touchdown on a 5-yard scramble by quarterback Randy Williams. Mark Porter then missed the extra point to leave the score at 9-7 in favor of the 'Cats.

Hundley scored another K-State touchdown, his first ever at K-State, on a 25-yard interception return off a pass from TCU quarterback Troy Ankrom.

Royals fall, 7-3; Angels take lead

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Frank Viola scattered eight hits for his 16th victory and Mark Funderburk drove in three runs Sunday to lead the Minnesota Twins past the Kansas City Royals, 7-3.

The Royals, who lost for the sixth time in nine games, fell one game behind the California Angels for first place in the American League West. The Angels defeated Cleveland 10-9 in 12 innings.

Cross country squads finish 1st, 2nd at MU

By BUTCH LACY
Collegian Reporter

For the second week in a row, the men's and women's cross country teams finished in the top two spots in their divisions.

The women finished first Saturday at the Missouri Invitational in Columbia, Mo., with the men placing second.

In the opening meet at Nebraska, the men finished first and the women finished second.

"We're probably ahead of where we thought we would be," said Terry Drake, graduate assistant coach. "The pivotal people are ahead of where we expected them to be."

K-State's women's team took first Saturday with 74 points. The University of Illinois was second with 78 points, followed by the University of Arkansas with 86.

Jacque Struckhoff paced the 'Cats to victory in the 5,000-meter women's race with a sixth-place time of 17 minutes, 41 seconds. Alysun Deckert finished right behind Struckhoff in seventh-place in 17:47. Anne Stadler was 10th in 17:56, followed by Lisa Wakem and Nancy Hoffman at 17th and 35th, respectively.

Winning the men's title was Colorado with 41 points. K-State finished second with 74 points. Oklahoma State was third with 81 points.

A foot infection didn't stop Bryan Carroll from leading K-State in the 8,000-meter race with a seventh-place finish of 24:59. Jim Knudsen took ninth with a time of 25:01. Bryon Lopez finished 13th in 25:21 and Mike Rogers, who is recovering from the stomach flu, and Dave Pulford placed 17th and 28th, respectively.

'Cats' Jones dismissed for academic reasons

By The Collegian Staff

Senior forward Jennifer Jones, the leading scorer last year for K-State's women's basketball team, has been dismissed from the team for a lack of academic effort, according to Head Coach Matilda Mossman.

Mossman said Jones was dismissed from the squad for not following team requirements regarding class attendance and "academic expectations."

"I think everyone is aware of the problems last year in getting her to class," Mossman said. "It's something we expect of everybody on the team, not just Jennifer."

Jones, along with guard Cassandra Jones, led K-State in scoring last year with a 17.1 average. The 6-foot-1-inch forward earned second-team All-Big Eight honors and had the highest field goal (.568) and free throw (.800) percentages on the team.

The senior started 18 of the 21 games she played in last year. Jones missed the last seven games of the season with a broken jaw.

"We felt that as a senior she should be setting an example," Mossman said.

Jones was unavailable for comment Sunday night.

Jones' dismissal had nothing to do with her grades, Mossman said. Jones is still academically eligible and will keep her basketball scholarship.

"Our concern right now is that she still have an opportunity to get an education," Mossman said.

Expected to pick up the slack for Jones on the front line will be senior forwards Shelia Hubert and Cindy Durham, Mossman said.

Dolphins rout Chiefs, 31-0

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Dan Marino tossed touchdown passes of 9 and 27 yards to Bruce Hardy and Woody Bennett, respectively, Sunday as the Miami Dolphins broke away from a scoreless halftime tie to roll to a 31-0 National Football League victory over the Kansas City Chiefs.

Marino, who completed 23 of 35 passes for 258 yards, directed scoring drives on five of Miami's seven offensive possessions in the second half while the Dolphins defense held the league's highest scoring team without a point.

The NFL's most valuable player in 1984 snapped the 0-0 deadlock with his TD pass to Hardy 3:06 into third quarter, and then found Bennett open down the middle of the field for a 14-0 lead with 3:16 left in the period.

Rookie fullback Ron Davenport also scored on runs of 1 and 4 yards in the fourth quarter as Miami put the contest away before an Orange Bowl crowd of 69,791.

A Glenn Blackwood interception of Kansas City quarterback Bill Kenney set up Davenport's first TD. The other completed a four-play drive after Mike Kozlowski returned a punt 17 yards to the Chiefs' 42.

Kansas City, which started the day averaging a NFL-leading 41.5 points per game, lost for the first time in three outings.

Dual meanings typify poetry of Dickinson

By JANET MATTHIAS
Collegian Reporter

The literary world has long recognized that Emily Dickinson often stated two ideas at one time in her poetry, said Suzanne Juhasz, professor of English at the University of Colorado in Boulder.

Explaining Dickinson's double-meaning style was the topic of the Friday Focus on Women lecture, "Writing Doubly: Emily Dickinson and Women Writers," which was attended by more than 100 people.

Dickinson was a 19th century poet who lived a quiet life in Amherst, Mass. She began writing poetry in the early 1860s, but none of her works were published during her lifetime.

"In trying to describe women's literature, contemporary feminists have consistently been aware of a doubleness — two things going on at once," Juhasz said.

Juhasz said this doubleness is caused by a female poet's experiences as a woman in a male-dominated society.

"Even as we can understand that a woman, at every moment, is living in a world of women and in a world of men, so it should follow that the same condition can form the writing of women," she said.

"We recognize that Dickinson's poems about herself texturalized the experience of living doubly, expressing the discouragements between the two worlds (of men and women), and sometimes a way of altering it," Juhasz said.

Juhasz said the reason for these "discouragements" is the contrast between societal expectations for women and their own grander ambitions for themselves.

In defining a woman's role in the world of writing, Juhasz said, "Women constitute a muted group, the boundaries of whose culture and realities overlap, but are not wholly contained by the dominant male group."

Juhasz called the area not contained by the male group the "wild zone," an area of female consciousness with no male counterpart. The wild zone is the only place female experiences can exist untouched by male culture, Juhasz said.

If women's culture is defined by doubleness, she said, the wild zone may be viewed as the memory of oneness such as a daughter's early identification with the mother.

"One cannot write in silence, the only authentic mode available to women. Yet writing in patriarchal (male-dominated) language, is writing in the patriarch," Juhasz said. "Dickinson speaks of places beyond the very patriarch itself, and speaks from the only experience she knows — female experience."

Festival to entertain families

Junction City site of event

By JACK MORRIS
Copy Editor

Four days of family entertainment are planned for Junction City as citizens prepare for the second annual Family Fun Festival set for Thursday through Sunday.

Last year's festival attracted about 10,000 people in spite of rain, competing regional events and the fact that it was a first for the community, said Norm Childs, director of the Geary County Convention and Tourism Bureau, 425 N. Washington St.

Beginning at 6 p.m. Thursday, this year's festival will feature arts, crafts, food, musicians, dancers, hay wagon rides, children's games, a German Oktoberfest, parade, pet show, barbecue, homes tour, health fair, volksmarch and softball tournament. The festival area at 900 E. Sixth St. will include two market tents, a show tent, outdoor vendors and a gamefield, Childs said.

The Family Fun Festival Parade will begin at 11 a.m. Saturday, near Eisenhower and West Sixth streets. Featuring floats, bands, unusual vehicles, clowns and "the family of the year," the parade will proceed east on Sixth Street to downtown Junction City. The Junction City-Fort Riley Shrine Club is sponsoring the parade and the Geary County Ministerial Association is organizing the "Family of the Year" event.

The health fair, sponsored by Geary County Hospital, will be from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday, at the Municipal Auditorium, Seventh and Jefferson streets.

Volunteer professionals at the fair examine blood sugar, hemoglobin, vision, hearing, mouth, lungs, posture and test for colon-rectal, sickel cell, speech and language problems. In addition, a $7 blood test detects diabetes, liver disease, cardiovascular disease, high cholesterol, iron deficiencies, kidney disease, gout and triglycerides.

For those who enjoy interior decorating, the Geary County Historical Society will sponsor a tour of five homes and one recently remodeled business. A tour brochure and guide are included in the festival programs, which are available from the Geary County Convention and Tourism Bureau.

Area teen-agers can meet Kansas City Chiefs running back Theotis Brown at a Teen Rap at 6 p.m. Friday in the show tent. Brown will discuss teen-age social problems with the youths, who will then have the option of attending the Oktoberfest at the Eagles Hall or the Teen Boogie dance at the festival area.

Other groups sponsoring the four-day festival include the Junction City Recreation Department, Junction City Little Theater, German-American Club, Armed Services YMCA, Fort Riley Main Post Recreation Center, the Junction City Recreation-Flint Hills Shared Education Program, Happy Wanderer Volksmarching Club, Geary County Young Farmers and Ranchers and Plaza Speedway.

Free courses offer faculty new language

By The Collegian Staff

Interested faculty members have the opportunity to learn Spanish and French free of charge, thanks to a federal grant.

Non-credit Spanish and French courses are open to faculty and staff members on Monday, Wednesday and Thursday from 3:45 to 5 p.m. in Eisenhower 101 for French lessons and in Eisenhower 112 for Spanish.

The courses are funded by a grant from the United States Agency for International Development in Washington, D.C.

This grant was obtained by request of the office of the Dean of Agriculture. The grant is renewable yearly and varies in amount from year to year, said Jim Jorns, assistant director of International Agricultural Programs. This year's grant is for $125,000 a year, he said.

"The grant serves a number of purposes, one of which is these classes. A couple of language instructors in the language department teach the classes, which have been going on now for about six years. They are to help prepare our faculty for going overseas, if they choose to do that some time," Jorns said.

Unlike most classes, these classes last one full academic year. And the classes are composed of two sessions, each session lasting two semesters.

The Spanish class this year is equivalent to Spanish II and is called Intermediate Spanish. The French class this year is equivalent to French I and is called Beginning French.

Police hook up phones to aid campus security

By The Collegian Staff

Three emergency telephones are being installed on campus by the KSU Police Department as part of an ongoing program to improve security for students and faculty.

Two of the telephones are already installed: one at the West Stadium parking lot, and one at the north end of campus at parking lot B3 near the Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center. Another telephone will be working by mid-October at parking lot A2 behind the president's residence.

"This phone will serve a dual function for emergencies. They are also something that will mark and try to attract attention to visitors so they can obtain information there," said Charles Beckom, captain of campus police.

"To use the phones all (that) is needed for help is to pick up the receiver and the phone automatically rings in our dispatch room. Our dispatch is required to send a vehicle to the phone to check it out," Beckom said.

There is also an emergency telephone in the library which can be used in the same manner as the other phones on campus, Beckom said.

"Eventually I would like to see a phone in every major parking lot and (in) more buildings," Beckom said.

Coliseum

"That disturbs me," Lady said. "That's part of the problem. You got advice (during Cross' tenure) from someone other than professionals. You have professionals on staff that are on the taxpayers' payroll. Use them."

Lady was also referring to allegations by Robert Jackson, associate professor of architecture and former University planner, that the Acker administration's planning process for the coliseum was flawed from the start.

The University permitted general contractors Gilbert Johnson, Colorado Springs, Colo., and Herchel Phelps, Greeley, Colo., — both alumni who volunteered their services to the University — to monitor the budget estimates instead of hiring consultants to track the anticipated cost of the facility.

Both contractors told the University that the architect's budget estimates were on target, however neither chose to submit a bid on the project in August.

State Architect John Hipp said Friday that the two Colorado contractors "let us down 150 percent" by erring on the budget projections.

Asked by Brandeberry if the Gossen Livingston firm will rely on the advice of Johnson and Phelps in the future, Livingston said with an "unqualified and absolute no" that he would not consult the two contractors.

Livingston said if the regents were to wait six months to a year to decide whether or not to proceed "we would be in trouble" because the cost of the coliseum would increase.

The redesign will include slicing 2,500 to 3,000 seats and deleting offices of the athletic director and all varsity athletic coaches except those of the men's and women's basketball teams; installation of a less expensive air conditioning system; alteration of the roof design; and elimination of hand railings, acoustical equipment, a sound stage and light fixtures.

During the facilities committee meeting testimony was taken from Livingston; Acker; Hipp; Mark Foehse, instructor in computer science; Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones, senior in management; and Steve Scott, senior in architectural engineering.

Mark Jones supported the proposal to reduce the size of the coliseum, but Foehse and Scott expressed reservations about the "unprofessional" planning process used by the University.

Warren Corman, director of facilities for the regents, was instructed by the board to monitor the project until its completion.

The coliseum is to be named for Fred Bramlage Sr., a Junction City businessman, who donated a reported $1.7 million to the project. The coliseum is designed to replace Ahearn, which seats 11,500 and was built in 1951.

University officials hoped to finish construction by August 1987, but the project will not be finished before the start of the '87 basketball season — assuming there are no more delays.

The coliseum will be located at the northwest corner of campus at the south end of KSU Stadium. The coliseum will be paid for with $2 million from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, $7.1 million in private gifts guaranteed by the KSU Foundation. The remaining $7 million is covered by student fees.

fessor of psychology; and David Schafer, Faculty Senate president-elect and professor of animal sciences and industry. Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, represents the college deans.

Non-voting members of the committee are Owen Koeppe, University provost, and Koplik, who will also be a liaison between the regents and the screening committee.

When asked if he thought there was an unbalanced representation on the committee, Koplik said, "I don't think the committee is stacked in favor of the alumni. The board has only one goal: To have the best committee possible, and I think they've done that."

In a June 28 meeting, the regents gave authorization to ask the Legislature for a $25,000 appropriation to fund the selection of a successor to Acker. The funds support the committee and its activities, including advertising, telephone and correspondence, bringing semi-finalists to Manhattan, and interviewing of the finalists by the regents.

The allocation has not yet been appropriated by the Legislature, Koplik said.

Koplik said he plans to hold the first committee meeting in the next two or three weeks. The meetings will take place in Manhattan.

Comedian Tim Cavanagh, of Chicago, begins the country portion of his show Friday night as he entertains students in the Union Catskeller. The production was sponsored by the Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

Performer combines song, dance in act

By J. SCOTT HOLT
Collegian Reporter

Complete with rubber gloves, hairnet and Raymond, his rubber snake-bodyguard — comedian Tim Cavanagh performed a song and dance routine Friday in the Union Catskeller. The show was sponsored by Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

Cavanagh gave away several prizes during his act, including macaroni and cheese packages, a bag of toy soldiers and a book of stain-removing procedures.

"He came over to our table and gave us a bag of toy soldiers and said we were having too much fun sitting behind a fern," said Erin Eicher, junior in journalism and mass communications. "He was really funny."

The Catskeller was nearly full as the crowd was treated to several of Cavanagh's song parodies as well as a stand-up routine. Two of the songs Cavanagh performed — "I Want to Kiss Her but She Won't Let Me," and "99 Dead Baboons," — have been a top hits in the "Funny Five" countdown on the syndicated "Dr. Demento" radio show.

"It was a nice crowd, very intelligent," Cavanagh said.

Cavanagh has played the college circuit for two years, but has been in the comedy business for six years. He got his start at a comedy club called Zanies in his hometown of Chicago. Cavanagh said he plays between 220 and 260 "gigs" a year, dividing his time evenly between clubs and college crowds. Cavanagh's wife, Chris, usually travels with him as his personal manager.

"Chris is my harshest critic and my strongest supporter," Cavanagh said. "We're two people sharing the same brain."

During Cavanagh's show he made several references to dead monkeys and baboons. Cavanagh said he has nothing against monkeys and, in fact, dead monkeys have helped his career. "99 Dead Baboons" has been his biggest hit to date. Cavanagh refers to dead animals frequently in his comedy routines, which he describes as wordplay cleverly disguised so the audience knows how bad his puns really are.

Cavanagh said he would rather be known as a "facilitator of fun" than as a comedian. A facilitator of fun gets the audience involved in the show and allows the crowd to have fun. Several times during his act Cavanagh went into the crowd and improvised with various members of the audience. This relaxes the crowd, he said.

"It's hard to sustain an audience. You can't just keep them rolling in the aisles for an hour," Cavanagh said. "You have to learn when to slow the crowd and bring (it) back up again."

Cavanagh said he uses the "Scheke White 20-minute comedy workout" to prepare himself for the crowd. The workout involves "50 set-ups, 20 jumping-jokes, 10 minutes of running gags and the all-important stretching exercises that allow you to put 20 minutes into four minutes of real material."

'Barefoot' refreshing for theater audience

By LISA BOOTHE
Collegian Reviewer

In a college town of take-home pizza and vcr rentals, it's refreshing to dine on salmon, swiss steak and live comedy in the front room of Gregov's dinner theater.

Play Review

The Kansas Actors' performance of Neil Simon's "Barefoot in the Park" is pure delight. The play runs through September and is the first production for the newly formed playhouse.

This 1966 Broadway hit, starring Robert Redford and Elizabeth Ashley, was Simon's second play, yet it was a tony-award nominee. When Simon adapted the script for television, the version starred Redford and Jane Fonda.

Sound like a tough act to follow? Not for Randy Baughman and Linda Haynes Uthoff. As newlyweds Paul and Corie Bratter, they are cogent and professional.

Uthoff, who has the same tonal quality as Fonda, is engaging as the perky, fun-loving and quite sexy housewife. When Corie is assigned the task of finding an apartment for herself and her husband after their six-day hotel honeymoon, she mindlessly chooses a low-rent flat at a high-rent price.

Paul is a budding attorney but was probably born saying, "Gotta get to bed. I've got a case in court in the morning." Though he doesn't share Corie's knack for wringing fun out of every other moment, he is still likable, particularly since he has the best lines.

When the two decide the only solution to their incompatibility is divorce, Paul does the sensible thing. He gets full-blown drunk.

Then the audience realizes what a fine actor Baughman is, for his powerfully understated and focused performance becomes hilarious. Yet, he never totters too far toward slapstick — evidence of careful directing by Pat Foltz.

Jo Richards and Shel Edelman are convincing as Corie's mother and Victor Velasco, a relationship which serves as a shadow-in-reverse of the newlywed's. In scene 2, though the energy is high, the conversation doesn't flow and the timing seems quirky. But Act 3 rose above any little bugs.

In dinner theater, atmosphere is sometimes everything. At Gregov's, there is a kind of warm attachment with the other audience members. Although the buffet is perhaps not lavish, it is for the price very tasty. And there's a simple feeling of family hospitality there. Rest assured, you will leave with a light heart and a big smile.

Quake

Brazilian President Jose Sarney, enroute to the opening session of the United Nations in New York, stopped with relief aid. Other Latin American officials also were expected to stop here.

Nancy Reagan, wife of President Reagan, was arriving today.

Governments of more than 20 countries and international organizations sent tons of food, medicine and other provisions.

Foreign relief teams, some aided by dogs, fanned out to help rescue workers, many of whom had not slept since the first quake.

More than 400 buildings were partially or totally destroyed, said Aguirre. He said 149 were on the verge of collapse.

"We are not cleaning up. What is essential is to get the bodies out and, if possible, someone alive," said Miguel Figueroa, who had been working at the site of a five-story apartment building since Thursday. As many as 10 people were believed still under the rubble of plaster and concrete.

Occasionally, the crews pulled out a child or an adult, still alive, after more than three days. Aguirre said that since rescue operations began, 1,011 people had been pulled alive from the rubble.

Mexico earthquake death toll reaches 2,800

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Rescue workers said Monday they tunneled into the ruins of a government technical school and found 26 survivors of Mexico's two killer earthquakes. They said more people might be alive under the debris.

At a collapsed apartment building, a German shepherd rescue dog named Bobby sniffed and pawed at a spot in the ruins. An hour's digging freed 20-month-old Patricia Aguirres, dehydrated but otherwise unhurt despite being entombed since the quakes Thursday and Friday.

Police and the attorney general's office said the death toll in Mexico City stood at 2,822 on Monday and the president's office said about 100 people were killed elsewhere in Mexico. Police said 4,180 people were missing.

The State Department said in Washington, D.C., that 3,461 were known dead throughout the area struck by the quakes, including five Americans. There was no immediate explanation of the discrepancy. The State Department said it based its figure on information from Mexican authorities.

Mexico's federal health department said at least 11,000 people were injured by the quakes, which smashed the heart of this city of 18 million people. The number of people left homeless was estimated at 300,000.

President Reagan's wife, Nancy, came on a brief mission of inspection and sympathy, bringing a U.S. government check for $1 million to help in relief efforts.

She toured the city for 3½ hours, visiting survivors at refugee centers and a Red Cross hospital in the company of Paloma Cordero de la Madrid, wife of President Miguel de la Madrid.

Pope John Paul II said a special Mass for the quake victims at his summer palace at Castel Gandolfo, in the Alban hills south of Rome.

Dozens of flights arrived from abroad with with rescue squads, demolition experts, medicine, temporary shelters, food and clothing.

Dr. German Oropewz Gonzalez, coordinator of the rescue effort at the Conalep technical school, said there were hopes of finding more survivors.

"We think there are more people trapped alive inside," he said. "A dog was brought in and detected something. We are going to dig another tunnel. We heard some noises, but we could not determine the location."

More than 50 specially trained dogs were sent from France, Italy, Switzerland, West Germany, and the United States.

At the ruins of the Juarez hospital, where at least 900 doctors, other medical personnel and patients were believed trapped, an intern crawled through a tunnel to safety at 5:30 a.m. Monday.

Other rescuers found 18-month-old Jessica Alonso on Sunday. She had been buried for 80 hours next to the body of her mother, and started crying when one of her saviors picked her up.

Residents of the capital began returning to work Monday. Banks were open, but officials said schools would remain closed until at least Wednesday.

The government solicited private and corporate donations to a national rebuilding fund. The quakes are estimated to have caused billions of dollars in damage to Mexico, whose economy is in recession and laboring under a $96 billion foreign debt.

Demolition work on the estimated 450 damaged buildings continued, but cautiously because of hope that more survivors might be found.

City officials said hundreds of bodies still unclaimed in temporary morgues would be buried or cremated to reduce the risk of disease.

Public services were being restored. Presidential spokesman Ricardo Ampudia said Sunday that 5 percent of the city remained without electricity and 20 percent did not have drinkable water.

'Lifeline' program challenges athletes

By DONNA COPE
Collegian Reporter

Group exercise allows a person to sweat with friends while getting a good workout, but being involved in the Recreational Services Lifeline program gives an individual the chance to obtain a personal goal and sweat for himself.

The Lifeline program helps students, faculty and staff members set a goal and attain points by running, playing racquetball or participating in other aerobic activities.

Joyce Halverson, assistant director of Recreational Services, said the program has been in existence about five years. The program was created by staff member Steve Martini and former staff member Pam Johnson.

The challenge is open to any student, faculty or staff member. Participants pay a $3 fee to enter the challenge. The money helps pay for a certificate and a T-shirt, awarded to those reaching their predetermined goal. A 25 cent entry fee is available to participants not wanting a shirt.

Athletes set a goal according to their own level of fitness. The program is designed so a person can set his or her own type and level of physical activity and earn the required points.

Participants use a point system booklet available at the Rec Complex. The booklet is an adaption from Kenneth H. Cooper's book "The Aerobic Way."

The program is designed so participants can earn points in a variety of ways. For example, four points can be earned for playing one hour of volleyball. Three points are earned when a participant jumps rope for 10 minutes.

"It's really a bet with yourself to earn a shirt," Halverson said.

The challenge lasts 13 weeks during fall and spring semesters. Par-

Faculty shows concern about regents' decision

By LILLIAN ZIER
Campus Editor

Dissatisfaction with the composition of the University presidential search committee has led Faculty Senate to call a special meeting to discuss the matter.

The function of the search committee — which was named by the Board of Regents Friday — is to aid the regents in the search for a University president to replace Duane Acker. Acker will step down June 30, 1986.

The Faculty Senate meeting will be Oct. 1, instead of the regularly scheduled meeting Oct. 8. The meeting was rescheduled to make a proposal to the regents before the first search committee meeting Oct. 7, said Charles Reagan, professor of philosophy and Faculty Senate president.

Faculty are expressing concern about unequal composition of the search committee and plan to ask the Board of Regents to appoint three additional faculty members to the committee, Reagan said.

Currently, the committee is composed of alumni representatives C.Q. Chandler, Wichita; Nelson Galle, Moundridge; Gilbert E. Johnson, Colorado Springs, Colo.; Frank Lowman, Wichita; Elizabeth Oswald, Hutchinson; and Jan Ray, Manhattan.

Student representatives are Tamara Barham, junior in social sciences; Steve Brown, student body president and junior in preveterinary medicine; and Jill Hummels, graduate in journalism and mass communications.

States' school network may require solidarity

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas' various higher learning institutions should improve the way they work together as a statewide team, a national education official told a conference of state lawmakers and education officials Monday.

Aims McGuinness, the assistant director for higher education of the Education Commission of the States, said universities, junior colleges and vocational schools often are judged only on how they perform individually while little attention is paid to how they work together.

McGuiness, whose organization is composed of state education officials from every section of the United States, spoke to about 70 people at the Kansas Conference on Post-Secondary Education.

The annual conference is sponsored by the Legislative Educational Planning Committee for representatives of all private and public higher education schools in the state.

McGuinness said examples of how the state's higher education programs aren't working together are the varying entrance requirements among institutions and the inability of students to transfer credits from one instutition to another.

"But that isn't solved by mandating that everyone has the same first two years of college," McGuiness said.

Mark Tallman, director of communications for the Kansas Independent College Association and a former director of Associated Students of Kansas, told the conference that educators need to develop a better understanding of what knowledge students should receive while earning bachelor's degrees.

"In far too many cases, particularly in general education classes, a professor just reads out facts, hurls out knowledge, and at some point students recite these facts on a test,"

New school installs system to computerize card catalog

By KAREN MEIS
Collegian Reporter

Some Manhattan elementary school students no longer have to search through stacks of library books to find an attention-catching title, nor do they have to thumb through piles of index cards to find an interesting subject.

Instead, selecting a book is as easy as pressing a button.

Amanda Arnold Elementary School, 1435 Hudson Ave., which opened this fall, is the first school in Unified School District 383 to install a computerized card catalog system in its library.

"Librarians are interested in computer management, and we decided this was a unique opportunity to try something new," said Aileen Graham, director of Library Media Services for the school.

Graham said the cost of the computerized system, which uses the Apple IIe computer, is approximately $800 higher than the standard card catalog system, but with a cabinet for storing traditional card systems costing $3,000 and a set of cards for each book costing 55 cents, the long-run costs may be less for the computer system.

Graham estimated the cost of the hard disc drive used at $1,800 and about $900 for each of the two Apple IIe's used in the system.

"The money adds up after a library has purchased an additional 2,000 books over the course of a school year," Graham said. "Therefore, the computerized system is less expensive in the long run."

In addition to cost-savings for materials, the computerized system can also result in increased productivity for the library staff. Graham said a good typist can catalog 40 to 50 books into the computer per hour, while typing information on index cards can take hours for only a few books. And, each com-

Reagan overhauls trade policy

Shift could open export markets

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, declaring "we do not want a trade war with other nations," Monday outlined a refurbished administration trade policy that focuses on opening foreign markets to American goods rather than protecting domestic industries battered by imports.

The president said he would ask Congress to establish a $300 million warchest to help provide low-cost loans to selected exports. He also announced formation of a government "strike force" to devise strategies for dealing with unfair trading practices against U.S. products.

"I will not stand by and watch American businesses fail because of unfair trading practices abroad. I will not stand by and watch American workers lose their jobs because other nations do not play by the rules."

Reagan reiterated his frequently expressed commitment to "free and fair trade" and opposition to "protectionist" import restraints.

"Above all else, free trade is, by definition, fair trade. When domestic markets are closed to the exports of others, it is no longer free trade," Reagan said in an East Room speech to the Export Council, an industry group.

Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., an author of major trade legislation, said after the speech that it didn't go far enough to quiet protectionist pressures in Congress. Legislation to impose quotas on imported textiles "is going to be passed by the House and the Senate regardless of what the president says," Danforth said.

Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia said the address came "too late."

Other than the proposed "warchest," there was little in the way of major new legislation, a move that seemed likely to provoke fresh criticism in Congress.

Reagan did offer to work with Congress "to put into place any necessary legislation that would help us promote free and fair trade and secure jobs for American workers."

Such legislation, Reagan said, could include bills that would strengthen existing trade laws and offer more protection against "dumping" of foreign products in U.S. markets.

But he said he would continued to "strongly oppose and will veto measures that I believe will harm economic growth, cause loss of jobs and diminish international trade."

U.S. critical of arms talks response

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary of State George P. Shultz accused the Soviet Union Monday of failing to respond to what he described as "far-reaching proposals" by the United States for a nuclear arms agreement in Geneva.

"We have offered trade-offs and made clear our readiness to take account of legitimate Soviet concerns to obtain an agreement that would enhance strategic stability and strengthen deterrents," Shultz said.

But said Shultz, "thus far the Soviet Union has not negotiated with a responsiveness that the talks require."

Among U.S. proposals at Geneva, he said, are a reduction by almost one-half of strategic ballistic missile warheads and "elimination of the whole class of U.S. and Soviet" intermediate-range missiles.

Shultz' remarks were made in an address to the opening session of the 40th U.N. General Assembly.

Shultz will meet here later this week with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze.

Soviets, Syria to discuss relations

DAMASCUS, Syria — A Soviet expert on Middle Eastern affairs will visit Damascus later this month to discuss bilateral relations and the Palestinian problem, diplomatic sources said Monday.

Karen Brutents, deputy chairman of the Middle East institute in Moscow, visited Damascus in 1983 and 1984.

The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, gave no other details.

Syria is the Soviet Union's main ally in the Middle East, and Moscow is Syria's major arms supplier.

The two countries signed a 20-year cooperation and friendship agreement Oct. 6, 1980.

4 enter pleas in Culture Farms case

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Four defendants in the Culture Farms case pleaded innocent Monday during their first appearance in federal court.

Pleading innocent were Kristine Gunn, 23, of Palm Springs, Calif., president of a firm which was to market cosmetics that promotors said would be made from cultures; Christopher Mancuso, 27, of Las Vegas, Nev., vice president for marketing for Culture Farms; Larry Huff, 43, of Canoga Park, Calif.; and Ron Rakow, 47, of Los Angeles.

The four were charged with 12 others in a federal indictment which alleged they and several companies controlled by them had misrepresented to investors the commercial demand for milk culture growing kits that were sold nationwide.

The indictment alleged the so-called pyramid scheme netted the defendants $80 million in investors funds since early 1984. Investors were required to purchase a minimum of $350 worth of culture kits. They were told they could expect to receive about $900 after growing the cultures at home and reselling the substance for use in a cosmetic product.

The indictment also charged that about $10 million was diverted by the defendants for their personal use.

Former Miss Kansas' trial reset

WICHITA — A jury trial was waived Monday in Sedgwick County District Court for a former Miss Kansas charged with transporting an open container of liquor in a new silver convertible that she crashed into a bridge.

District Judge Keith Anderson reset the case for a bench trial Oct. 31, a court spokesman said.

Miss Kansas 1984 Nancy Lynn Cobb was charged with carrying an open container of alcohol at the time of the May 3 accident that left her with a broken neck.

She pleaded innocent and began recuperating at her parents home in Wichita. She had to wear a 35-pound neck brace instead of a rhinestone crown in July at the Miss Kansas pageant in Pratt.

Cobb was driving a new car loaned to her during her year's reign as Miss Kansas when the accident occurred near Derby. The car was destroyed. She contended that she apparently fell asleep at the wheel after leaving a friend's home.

Cobb won the Miss Lawrence title in November 1983 and went on to win the Miss Kansas crown in July 1984. She represented Kansas at Atlantic City's Miss America pageant in September 1984.

Flight team to visit Latin America

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — The Air Force Thunderbirds precision flight team will visit Latin America for a series of performances next month, officials at Nellis Air Force Base announced Monday.

It will be the team's first deployment to that area of the world since 1973.

The trip, Oct. 3-16, includes stops in Panama, Ecuador, Peru, Brazil, Venezuela and Mexico.

Making the trip will be the eight Thunderbird F-16 fighters and their pilots as well as 70 team members from Nellis. The Military Airlift Command will provide airlift support and the Strategic Air Command will provide air refueling support.

Police arrest kidnapping suspect

CHEYENNE, Wyo. — Lohman Mays Jr., one of the FBI's 10 most wanted criminals and a suspect in the August abduction of a Kansas state trooper, was arrested Monday after he was found hiding in a maintenance shed at a golf course, police said.

Capt. Don Pierson said three officers went to the Airport Golf Course about 2 p.m. to check out a report of a suspicious person and found Mays, 42, "hiding on a shelf."

Mays made an initial appearance before U.S. District Judge Clarence Brimmer Monday afternoon and was ordered held without bond.

Local, state and federal authorities had launched a search shortly after 3 a.m. Monday when two officers on patrol stopped a van with stolen license plates in a central city neighborhood.

Mays and a companion, Patricia Barrett, 28, ran out of the van, according to Lt. Roy Pack. He said she fell down and was arrested, while Mays escaped down an alley. Barrett was armed with an automatic rifle, and a pursuing officer saw that Mays had a handgun.

Pierson said Mays was unarmed when he was arrested, and police haven't found the gun he was seen carrying.

A golf course maintenance foreman, Dale Bjerke, said Mays had just "kind of meandered into the shop, looking for a job." Bjerke said Mays talked to the maintenance people and one of the bosses, who told him there were no jobs available.

Carnegie honors 13 for heroism

PITTSBURGH — Thirteen people who risked their lives rescuing or trying to save others were honored Monday by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission.

Two of the heroes died performing their deeds. The honors bring to 6,933 the number of Canadians and Americans who have been noted by the commission since it was founded by industrialist Andrew Carnegie in 1904.

The winners or their heirs each receive $2,500 and a medal.

They are:

— Scott Allen Berner, 26, a meat packer from Waukesha, Wis., who saved four people from a burning truck in Milwaukee on June 21, 1984. Berner received minor injuries.

— The late Warren Crane Crunden, 53, a banker from Cedarhurst, N.Y., who died trying to save a fellow sailor who fell overboard in the Atlantic Ocean off Brant Beach, N.J., on April 16, 1984. The other man was not found.

— Terrence Allan Dixon, 33, a helicopter pilot of Mount Lehman, British Columbia, who helped save three people from exposure after their light airplane crashed and they were trapped near a 6,450-foot peak on April 2, 1983.

— The late Geraldine T. McBride, 67, a school crossing guard from Hartford, Conn., who saved two schoolboys from being hit by a truck on July 3, 1984. One boy received minor injuries. McBride was killed.

— Kenneth R. Nicolle, 36, and Buddy J. Osborne, 47, both fishermen of Murray Harbor, Prince Edward Island, who saved four people from drowning in a swamped fishing boat in the Atlantic Ocean on July 22, 1983.

— Mark Warren Price, 27, a contractor from Crown Point, N.Y., who saved a woman from her burning mobile home on July 8, 1984.

— Glenn F. Rodgers, 47, a machine operator from Jacksonville, Fla., who saved a man from his burning house on Jan. 3.

— Sidney R. Snarr, 57, a truck driver from Cobalt, Ontario, and William P. Yonev, 40, a lodge owner from Winona, Ontario, who rescued a man from his overturned and burning van on June 8, 1984.

— Andres Torres, 19, unemployed, from New York, who saved a 4-year-old boy from drowning in the East River on Dec. 21, 1984.

— Maynard G.R. Webber, 27, a mechanic from Kirkland Lake, Ontario, who saved three people from an overturned and burning car on Nov. 1, 1983.

— Anthony E. Wiles, 22, a municipal worker of Bear River East, Nova Scotia, who saved a man from drowning when his car plunged into Digby Harbor on Nov. 30, 1982.

Tallman said.

In addition, Tallman attacked the "woefully inadequate" system of advising students at Kansas universities. He said student orientation sessions are too superficial and hardly ever explain what knowledge students should receive from the classes in which they enroll.

"So it really isn't surprising that there is such a high drop-out rate and that so few actually enter degree programs," Tallman said.

Cuts in governmental funding for higher education have hurt economically disadvantaged students, who now must pay for at least 25 percent of the cost of their educations, he said.

"There is also increasing concern about the debt load that students have to carry after they leave school and this serves as a further disincentive particularly among education students," Tallman said.

Correction

Due to a reporter's error in Monday's Collegian story "Regents select screening committee," the make-up of the original presidential search screening committee was incorrect. Three students, three alumni, three faculty and two ex officio members made up the 11-member committee. Also, the Hesston Corp. is located in Hesston.

Coalition to issue grades on Congress' ag legislation

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — A Farmer's Political Report Card will be used to grade members of Congress and other politicians on their efforts in the fight to ease the farm crisis, a bipartisan group of legislator-farmers announced Monday.

"We plan to make the 1986 election in the farm belt a referendum on the American farmer," Nebraska State Sen. Tom Vickers told a news conference after the inaugural meeting of a new farm group.

Vickers, a Democrat, said he organized the new Midwest Emergency Action League, or MEAL, to work for passage of a "good" federal Farm Bill and to reform agricultural policy in a bid to ease pressure on the farm economy.

The state lawmakers who make up the group plan to meet next Monday in Washington, D.C., with Farm Credit Administrator Donald Wilkinson, congressional leaders and officials of the Reagan administration, Vickers said.

Members of MEAL — most of them both legislators and farmers — could be a vital link between the family farmer and Congress because they understand the workings of both politics and agriculture, said South Dakota state Rep. Scott Heidepriem, a Republican.

Vickers said the report cards, grading individual members of Congress and governors on their handling of the farm crisis, will be made public during the 1986 election.

Nelson not disappointed by $9 million

FarmAid falls short of pledge goal

By The Associated Press

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — At $9 million so far, proceeds from the all-star FarmAid benefit concert appeared to be running short of the goal Monday but organizers said they would be happy if the event triggered new interest in farmers' problems.

By the time the 14-hour concert ended and 50 stars of country, rock and blues had left the stage early Monday, FarmAid had raised more than $9 million. That was way below singer Willie Nelson's prediction of raising $50 million.

Nelson, who organized Sunday's show, said FarmAid received about $4 million from corporate donations and ticket sales, and roughly $5 million in pledges from television viewers and radio listeners.

But tabulation of the pledges was incomplete.

"We don't know yet how much we raised," said spokeswoman Linda Lounsberry for the Howard Bloom Agency of New York, which handled promotion and publicity for the event.

The FarmAid money will be used for cash grants to needy farmers, legal aid, counseling and job training, a nationwide information hotline and a campaign to increase awareness of farm problems.

"You can spend it quick or spend it right," Nelson told reporters. "So we're not going to rush into anything."

He said he was not disappointed with the pledges because raising money was only one FarmAid goal. The other objective was reminding city dwellers of their links to the nation's food producers.

Jim Skilbeck, special events coordinator for Gov. James Thompson, who helped line up University of Illinois Memorial Stadium football field for Sunday's concert, said he was confident the show will have lasting impact.

"People are reading and thinking and talking about farm issues now, and that's a long-term thing," Skilbeck said.

Twelve hours of the concert were broadcast live by The Nashville Network cable system to a potential audience of 25 million subscribing households, and were carried by more than 300 radio stations.

More people watched a three-hour, prime-time syndicated segment of the program carried by 156 television stations, but results of a ratings survey conducted Sunday night would not be available for several days.

TNN's coverage ended at midnight, but the concert continued nearly an hour longer, ending with a spectacular fireworks display that had the live audience cheering before heading home.

Teachers practice 'wholistic' education

By MARIBETH GOTTSCHALK
Collegian Reporter

Because of the combined efforts of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction and Manhattan's Unified School District 383, there is a new educational movement in Manhattan.

The Whole Language Literacy Program is based on the philosophy that teachers combine the language arts of reading, writing, spelling, listening and talking, rather than teaching all of the subjects separately. All of these elements are integrated in the instruction of students in kindergarten through sixth grade at Eugene Field, Green Valley, Lee, Marlatt, Northview, Ogden, Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson Elementary Schools.

JoBeth Allen, assistant professor of curriculum and instruction, said the teachers emphasize teaching as a process-oriented activity, rather than a product-oriented activity.

"Product orientation means that teachers look at what students do, grade them, and offer suggestions and corrections based on the product. A product might be a written theme, a spelling paper, reading aloud or answering workbook papers," Allen said.

By emphasizing the process, as the Whole Language program does, the teacher will listen to the misuses students make when performing an activity such as reading aloud.

"For example, let's say when a child misses a word they substitute another real word there. It might not make sense, but they have substituted a real word. That tells the teacher that they're not looking at the letters of the word they missed, they're just putting in any word," Allen said.

She said it is also possible for the student to substitute a word which would still make sense in the context of the sentence.

"For instance, a student might say, 'she went to her home' instead of, 'she went to her house.' That still makes sense. That tells you that the child still isn't looking at and processing all the letters, but that they are paying attention to the sense of the sentence and to the grammatical structure of the sentence," Allen said.

From this point the teacher would determine the type of instruction needed based on the process the child has gone through, rather than just looking at the mistake the student has made.

Writing, as a part of this philosophy, is not taught through the traditional separate periods of teaching handwriting, spelling, grammar or copying from the chalkboard. Students now have a designated time every day just for writing.

During this time the teacher emphasizes the importance of writing for communication. Aspects such as spelling, grammar and sentence structure will be developed later in the context of communicative writing.

"In traditional classrooms, children's only audience is the teacher, their purpose for writing is to get a high grade. But in the real writing situations that we create in these classrooms, students are writing for a real audience, other than the teacher, their peers. They are going to be sharing everything they write with their peers and getting feedback from them and hoping that they will enjoy it or that they will learn from it, Allen said.

"So their purpose is to either inform or entertain this specific audience of peers. It really makes a difference in the way they write rather than if they were just writing to teachers."

Doyle Barnes, principal of Roosevelt Elementary School, has been supportive of the program and instrumental in its implementation.

"Very few times do I recall Kansas State University and public schools in the state of Kansas getting a group involved to get a program going in which students are directly involved," Barnes said. "Through the class the teacher learns to be practical and able to implement what the student learns to be very effective. It is a very special program."

Plane crashes into mountainside

By The Associated Press

WEYERS CAVE, Va. — A commuter airplane carrying 14 people crashed into a cloud-shrouded mountainside in Shenandoah National Park on Monday, and there were no signs of survivors, state police said.

The crew of a Marine helicopter sighted the downed Henson Airlines Beech 99 around 7 p.m. about five miles east of the Shenandoah Valley Airport, which the plane was approaching on an instrument landing, officials said.

The twin-engine propeller-driven craft, which had left Baltimore-Washington International Airport as Flight 1517, was last contacted by radar at 10:20 a.m., said Dick Stafford, a Federal Aviation Administration spokesman.

The plane, with 12 passengers and a crew of two, "disappeared off radar while on approach to the airport," said Stafford. "The visibility was 2 miles in fog and the weather was overcast."

The wreckage was on Trayfoot Mountain, which has an elevation of about 3,200 feet, and was more than a mile from the nearest road, Townsend said.

The accident was Henson's first involving injury or loss of life since the carrier, a subsidiary of Piedmont Airlines, began operating in 1931, said airline vice president John Presburg.

Presburg, speaking at a news conference at the Baltimore-Washington airport, said the plane was making an instrument approach under a 1,000-foot cloud ceiling. He added that that's "not necessarily bad weather but it obscured the tops of the ridges."

Senate chairman misrepresents students

CATHERINE SAYLER
Collegian Columnist

Mark Jones, senior in management and Student Senate chairman, should receive 1,302 phone calls this week. No, make that 1,301. One voter has already made the call.

Thirteen-hundred and two is the number of people who voted last semester in favor of delaying the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Apparently to Jones, this number of people — which represents 64 percent of those voting — is an insignificant amount, one which does not constitute student opinion.

Through his personal research, Jones believes he has a more accurate perception of student opinion, a perception he relayed to the Board of Regents Friday. The board met to decide whether or not to redesign the coliseum.

Jones told the regents that the students are all behind the coliseum. It was not until Regent Wendell Lady reminded Jones of the student referendum that Jones qualified his statement. In a recent telephone interview, Jones said that according to Student Governing Association bylaws, the referendum needed two-thirds approval to pass, but fell 2 percent short, thus it could not serve as a gauge of student opinion.

What Jones and even those who circulated the petition have failed to note is that student opinion cannot "pass" or "fail." A large group of people will never have one single opinion and, thus, a 2 percent difference is an irrelevant amount. Also 64 percent of those voting had reservations about the coliseum. That is all that can be said.

Even more interesting is the speculation about what Jones would have said if the referendum had received the magic 66 percent. Would Jones have then said that the students are all against the coliseum? In that case, the 700 people who voted in favor of continuing the coliseum as planned would be calling Jones with complaints of misrepresentation.

Jones also said that the number of students voting was not large enough to be an accurate gauge of opinion.

To those who worked long, hard hours in order to give all students who cared a chance to vote, the contention is especially irritating.

The original petition to delay the coliseum had 2,300 signatures. Those circulating the petition decided that, in the interest of fairness, they should put their 2,300 names to the test. They should provide for the chance for those who cared or cared not to sign the petition to express their opinion.

Petitioners opted for a referendum, knowing that it was possible that the opposition might defeat them at the polls and negate their efforts. They also knew that, ethically, to do anything less than give the opposition the chance to express itself would be unfair.

Perhaps, though, the 1,302 students should just agree with Jones that the voter turnout of about 2,000 is not a representative sample of student opinion. By granting him this contention, one can ask the simple question, "Well then, how are you and the rest of elected student governing officials representative of the student body?"

Senators need between 100 and 200 votes to be elected. Student Body President Steve Brown, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, who remained silent at the regents meeting, received 1,500 of the total 2,500 when he was elected to the presidential post.

Jones, who ran in the first round of the race for student body president, received only 423 votes. Student senators later elected him to his present position as Student Senate chairman.

For Jones, who described himself to the regents as a "student leader," to ignore the active voice of 1,302 students is a tragic disservice to the students he is supposed to be leading. A simple statement of fact, of percentages and total number voting, would have sufficed to make the 1,302 feel that they had been represented Friday.

Every one of those who voted in the referendum last semester should give Jones a call and ask him for an explanation. Or, instead, they should all visit him at his office.

Jones owes us all an explanation.

City's mall causes unrest

Once again, some members of the Manhattan city commission are demonstrating a marked lack of consideration for effective and fair city management.

The impending exercise of eminent domain for the purchase of properties for the downtown mall demonstrates just how underhanded they are.

Eminent domain is the right of a city to take, or to authorize the taking of, private property for public use, generally with just compensation to the owner. However, Manhattan, is offering low-dollar figures in return for prime business property, and may very well get away with it.

"Blind ambition" is the operative phrase. There are disturbing parallels between the downtown mall and the Fred Bramlage Coliseum — people with more political power than brain power determined to bull a project through despite trivial matters like fairness or facts.

The downtown mall could be a fine thing if it were done properly, but it is a tradition in the City of Manhattan to bite every hand that feeds it. Cheat the students through legislation, pricing and policy; cheat the businessman through taxation, legislation and eminently unfair exercise of eminent domain.

Although in a strict legal sense the commission has a right to eminent domain, the ethics of the operation are subject to question. Is it fair to offer 50 percent of the appraised value of a property when the owner has little choice but to accept?

Why does Manhattan insist on practices that border on economic suicide? A city that takes its residents for fools 90 percent of the time is likely to find it has fewer residents of which to take advantage.

The sole option is to make this term of office the last for those individuals who will not see reason.

Panic over AIDS needless

It's mass hysteria. Over the years, various communicable diseases have knocked on the door, and now the modern-day bubonic plague is at the public's doorstep. And it's not knocking, but banging noisily — on closet doors.

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) has spawned lively debate and heated controversy. But the hysteria over AIDS has been based on ignorance and unclear medical explanations.

When AIDS strikes, it kills. About 75 percent of its victims are homosexual men, but now AIDS, which can be passed through infected needles, blood transfusions or exchange of body fluids, is rampantly spreading.

Misinformation and unclear descriptions about AIDS and its method of transmission has led to panic.

Ethical decisions about printing the specific method of transmission of AIDS have led to controversy. A vast majority of cases, according to Newsweek, are through breakage of the rectal lining through anal sex.

The previous description of the transmission of AIDS — that it is passed through "intimate sexual contact" or "exchange of bodily fluids" — is vague and led to panic that the disease could be passed through casual contact.

The AIDS virus can be found in saliva and tears, but not a single case of transmission through these body fluids has been documented. The virus can only live a short time outside the body.

The myths about AIDS are in epidemic proportions themselves. In a country with a foundation of freedom, the spread of "homophobia," the fear of homosexuals or homosexuality, only adds fuel to the fire.

While myths about AIDS continue to burn, school children, prisoners and blood bank workers are adding themselves to the list of victims, not of AIDS, but of "homophobia."

Time magazine recently reported that up to 1 million Americans are thought to be exposed to the virus and the majority do not themselves know who they are.

AIDS does not linger on doorknobs, clothing, food, dishes, glasses, utensils or toilet seats, according to Time.

Hysteria based on the ignorance about AIDS is "homophobia" bigotry. Before parents keep their children out of school because of ignorance, before prisoners are put in solitary confinement because of their life sentence to AIDS and before insurance companies deny insurance to all men, period, the public should educate themselves about AIDS.

In this case, clear information and open minds could dispel rumors that lead to panic and drastic unnecessary action.

Muslims, Christians should work together

SAMY ALY
Guest Columnist

A Muslim-Christian lecture sponsored by the Muslim Community Association, the first of its kind at K-State, has been scheduled for 6:30 p.m. Wednesday at Union Forum Hall in order to promote more understanding of these two universal religions.

MCA members hope that dialogues between the two groups will initiate a free, unbiased thinking in the minds of the followers of these two creeds. Several reasons for such hope include the following:

— The world we live in is a complex one. Frequently, wars and turmoils are direct encounters between Muslims and Christians living in the same country or in two different countries. Such events provide, unfortunately, the proper atmosphere for misunderstanding and prejudice which, in turn, help in veiling the essence of the inherent beauty of these two religions. Such inherent beauty could be brought into focus only through unbiased, serious and patient attempts to understand each other.

— Muslims living in this country know about Christianity, generally speaking, more than the Christians know about Islam. One reason for this is that a Muslim belief, from an Islamic viewpoint, is not complete unless he or she believes indiscriminately in all the prophets of the one true God, including of course, the great prophet of Christianity, Jesus. Therefore, it is necessary for Muslims to monitor any distortions of the original beautiful mission of Jesus in order to keep their faith and the faith of their coming generations as pure and true as God wants it to be.

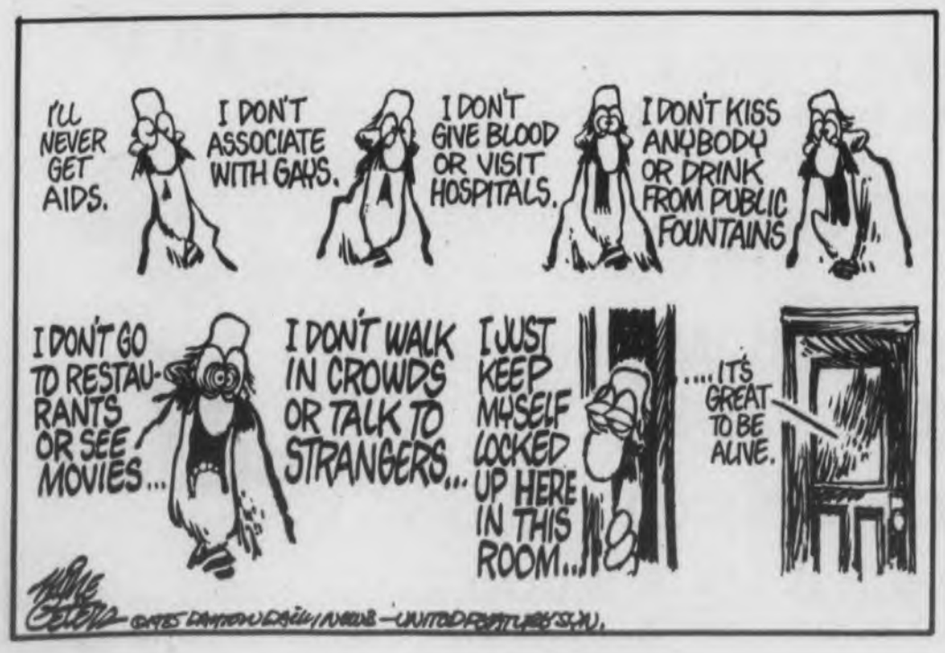
Muslims also believe in the last messenger to mankind, the apostle of God Mohammad, but his mission is not considered at all as an element of the Christian faith. Discussions are great opportunities for Christians to listen to the Muslims' viewpoints, to explore the undistorted faith of about 1 billion human beings and to discuss, interact and criticize.

— Despite the major differences between Islam and Christianity, most importantly concerning the concept of God, both Muslims and Christians should be able to recognize the fact that it is their responsibility to establish peace based on justice and to stop any conspiracies aimed to initiate hostile attitudes and harsh feelings in the hearts of Muslims and Christians throughout the world.

There are many fields in which they can, and indeed should, join forces to stop the evils prevailing in their societies and in the world at large.

Jeopardized world peace, violated human rights, communism, crime, alcoholism, drug abuse, child and spouse abuse, family degradation, unnatural sexual activities, unjustified abortions and discrimination against people because of color, race, sex and creed are examples of the threatening social and international diseases which should be recognized as areas of common interest to fair-minded Christians and Muslims.

Constructive dialogues are steps in the right direction. They should help us shed some light on what we must do together in order to make the world, as everybody says, a better place in which to live.



Zealous Christians and Muslims already have realized this fact. In the years 1968-79, for example, 27 Christian-Muslim dialogues were organized in countries throughout the world.

We believe that such dialogue is a good challenge for all of us. It is an opportunity to exercise our intellect, tolerance, open-mindedness and to suppress — hopefully to eliminate — prejudice and misunderstanding.

We invite all the truth seekers to attend and contribute. We invite researchers to evaluate the discussion with the same integrity with which they evaluate scientific data. We invite the students to take it as seriously as they take their course of study.

We invite all to exercise the most precious character of a human being, the free, unbiased inquiry and attend the lecture.

KSDB should keep current format

Editor,

Drifting around campus is a rumor that KSDB-FM, our campus radio station, is going to change its format. But why? Why would they even imagine that Manhattan would open its arms to another "all hits" radio station?

Why would they want to turn the FM dial into one gigantic generic radio station? That would be great, wouldn't it? We would never have to bother turning the dial, because all the stations would all be playing the same songs.

Maybe the concern is that not enough people are listening to KSDB-FM. My answer is they're way off track. The KSDB listening audience is increasing every day. Interest in new music from the coasts as well as the midwest is growing. New bands are finally making it to Manhattan and receiving a great response.

These bands, such as the Phones and the Producers, are turning even more people on to the music scene. Plus, the Alternative Music Brigade has been generating even more interest around town by publishing a music magazine and having "alternative music night" every Monday at Mannequins.

Let's hope this rumor isn't true, because KSDB's time is here, it's now, it's happening. Don't give up! As INXS says, "Don't change a thing."

Editor meets students

Alumna shares experiences

By The Collegian Staff

Although being a young woman editor has posed some problems, Julie Doll, editor and publisher of the Hays Daily News, said she has gotten "some breaks."

Doll addressed a meeting of Women in Communications, Inc. Monday night in Kedzie 105.

A 1979 graduate from the University, Doll worked at the Lawrence Journal-World before joining the Hays staff in June 1980. She entered the management training program of Harris Enterprises, a newspaper chain and broadcasting group, in February 1982.

After training at newspapers in Hutchinson, Olathe, Garden City and Hays, she became publisher of the Hays Daily News on June 1, 1984.

"Shortly after the announcement was made, an editor called and said he wondered if I was a little young and cuddly to be a publisher," Doll said.

People in town would ask the employees what it was like to work for a woman, she said. Another editor said she was "quite a cookie and a gol-darn female."

Being a woman publisher was nothing new to Hays, Doll said. There had been a woman publisher for 10 to 12 years before the man she replaced.

"Being a woman had its advantages. It didn't take much to impress a lot of people," she said. "I just had to show some knowledge of the fact that I could speak in coherent sentences."

The job was much easier for Doll because John Lee, her predecessor, was a meticulous business man. She was familiar with everything that was happening on the newspaper and why it worked that way.

Business career day to link students, firms

By The Collegian Staff

The College of Business Administration will hold its fourth annual career day today. The theme of the event will be "Get a head start on your race to success."

Dr. Robin F. Potter, Overland Park, will be the guest speaker and will be talking on setting goals and taking the necessary steps to success. The lecture will be in the Little Theatre in the Union at 10:30 a.m.

Potter, a 1975 magna cum laude K-State graduate, currently practices dentistry in Lenexa. He received a doctorate in dental surgery from the University of Missouri at Kansas City in 1979.

Sandy Warmund, senior in finance, and Melissa Snider, senior in marketing, are chairpersons for the event. Warmund said the idea of career day is two-fold. It helps the students to learn about different firms and it lets the firms get to know students with interest in them.

"Career Day is a good opportunity for freshmen and sophomores to get an idea for an internship," Warmund said. The event is also important to juniors and seniors because they will soon be job hunting."

Company seminars will be held in the Union Big Eight Room from 1 to 4 p.m. Approximately 45 businesses will be represented at the seminars.

Student translates literature into native Urdu

By SARAH KESSINGER
Collegian Reporter

As poet and critic, Sohail Khan, under the pen name Ahmed Sohail, enjoys bringing the literature of various languages to his native Pakistan.

Khan, graduate student in sociology, has worked for several years translating literary works from English to Urdu, the language of Pakistan. Writing poetry and critiques are also part of Khan's work.

He recently completed a book in which he critiques modern theater from many parts of the world. The book is sold in Pakistan.

Khan critiques short stories, novels and poems. He said he has completed about 400 critical articles and written 200 poems. He also has written plays for radio in Pakistan and served as a researching journalist in the social security and administration department in Pakistan.

To gain a doctorate in sociology, Khan said he wanted to study in the United States and had heard about K-State from several people in his home city, Karachi. He received his bachelor's and master's degrees in sociology from Karachi University.

Khan said he asked no payment for his articles because he believed his work as translator, critic and poet was a hobby and a mission.

"I'm not materialistic; (writing) is a creative liberty activity," he said. "I enjoy writing poetry and criticism; my education I use as an art."

Khan said his book took nearly 16 years to write and covers several areas of the modern theater including psycho-theater, theater of the absurd, radio drama and the theater of Bertolt Brecht, a famous German playwright.

It usually takes one to two weeks to translate a piece, he said.

"Sometimes I will rewrite and rewrite and rewrite, 15 or 16 times a poem," Khan said. "One poem took me 52 times."

The frequent difficulty in translation from one language to another is that the translator must consider he also is going from one culture to another, Khan said.

"Explaining the cultural meaning of a word" is a challenge, he said. American literature is at times difficult because it is from a "mixed society" or it contains a large variety of ideas from different cultures. However, if he has a translation problem, Kahn said, he often can refer to a person on campus for cultural explanations.

Khan said he collaborated with Bradley Shaw, associate professor of modern languages, on the translation of some Portuguese poems which the instructor translated to English and Khan copied into Urdu.

The level of education is high in Pakistan, Khan said, with English used often in the schools. American literature is popular in his country, he said.

Kansas is popular in Pakistan, Khan said, because both are basically agricultural societies. He often comments on Kansas subjects when writing to a newspaper in Pakistan.

After receiving his degree, Khan said, he would like to teach sociology, but he has not decided whether to remain in the United States. He plans to continue his writing, a novel is his next goal.

Leslie Rose, senior in natural resources management, and her horse were the open champions.

Prancing for Pleasure

Sounds of creaking leather, muffled hoofbeats and hushed conversations from spectators broke the silence while the horses and their riders performed in the arena.

Applause occasionally broke out to congratulate the winner in a class.

Beneath the stands, contestants busily groomed, saddled, and led their horses to the arena during the KSU Horsemen's Association Sixth Annual Horse Show in Weber Arena last Saturday.

Kathy Vink, freshman in veterinary medicine and president of the Horsemen's Association, said the show is the club's first project of the year and is designed to give the community an opportunity to participate.

"It gives us a chance to get together and organize a horse show. It also gives people that live here a chance to show," Vink said.

Contestants did not have to attend the University and could be any age. However, classes were divided into an intramural division for exhibitors from the University and an open division for those who don't attend K-State, Vink said.

In the intramural and open divisions, a high point award was given to the horse and rider who had the most number of points tabulated from their placings in specific classes.

Rhoda Rein, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and secretary of the association, won the intramural high point award and Leslie Rose, senior in natural resources management, won the open high point award.

Several contestants from tne University, including Bryan Chadwell, sophomore in agriculture education, had brothers or sisters competing in the show.

Chadwell, and his sister Becky, a junior at Buhler High School, competed on the same horse, but in different divisions.

Chris Ellis, senior in preveterinary medicine, and her sister, Beth, a freshman at Northwestern Missouri State, Maryville, each showed their own horse at the show.

"My parents were bringing my horse up here, and since my sister was coming home for the weekend, she decided to show too," Ellis said.

"If there's a horse show within reasonable driving distance, I go to it," she said. "I think it's fun to show."

Ellis said her favorite class is trail, because riders must work their horses through obstacles such as bridges or barrels.

Additional classes contestants could enter include halter, in which the conformation of the horse is judged; showmanship, western horsemanship, and hunt seat equitation, which involves judging the exhibitor on their ability to show or ride the horse; reining which consists of running a certain pattern; and jumping.

Rein, who served as chairperson of the show, was disappointed by a low attendance.

"I think the rain might have hurt our attendance this year," she said.

The show was supposed to be held at Cico Park because of renovation at Weber, Rein said.

Despite the low participation, David Oliphant, who has received his animal science degree and is working toward a second degree in agricultural economics, said competition was very good.

"Competition is high. It's a tough decision among the top competitors. "Small errors are making a difference in the top few horses."

Oliphant helped the judge, Tom Davies of Olathe, by telling contestants what to do and by keeping order in the ring.

Parents of some contestants watched their children perform in the arena.

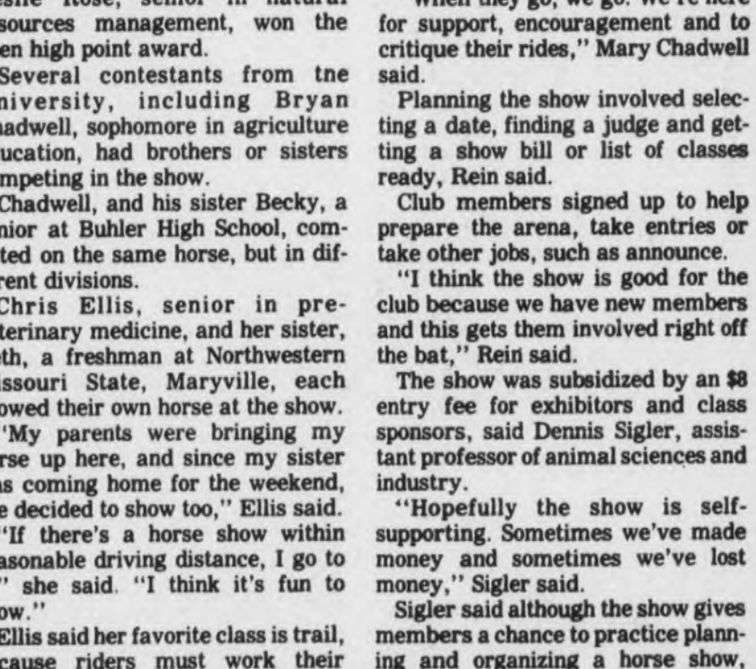
Bryan and Becky Chadwell's parents, Lyle and Mary Chadwell from Moundridge, said they have gone to many shows with their children.

"When they go, we go. We're here for support, encouragement and to critique their rides," Mary Chadwell said.

Planning the show involved selecting a date, finding a judge and getting a show bill or list of classes ready, Rein said.

Club members signed up to help prepare the arena, take entries or take other jobs, such as announce.

"I think the show is good for the club because we have new members and this gets them involved right off the bat," Rein said.



The show was subsidized by an $8 entry fee for exhibitors and class sponsors, said Dennis Sigler, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Hopefully the show is self-supporting. Sometimes we've made money and sometimes we've lost money," Sigler said.

Sigler said although the show gives members a chance to practice planning and organizing a horse show, having fun is also a very important part of the show.

During Saturday's Sixth Annual KSU Horsemen's Association horse show in Weber Arena, riders await the judging in the Western Pleasure class.

Susan Goldschmidt, senior in dairy production, grooms her horse prior to the competition.

Deirdri Frey jumps her horse over a fence during the warm-up session before the jumping competition.

Study results in Shinzwani dictionary

By The Collegian Staff

Harriet Ottenheimer is publishing a one-of-a-kind dictionary.

The dictionary will be of the Shinzwani language of the Comoro island Anjouan, off the East Coast of Africa near Madagascar. The population of Anjouan, one of four Comoro Islands, is about 359,000.

Ottenheimer, associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, has not named a publisher, but the dictionary should be finished by May and will consist of 15 handwritten volumes and 6,000 handwritten words.

This is the first dictionary of the Shinzwani language, she said.

Ottenheimer started the dictionary in 1968 with information gathered from field notes taken by herself and her husband, Martin, during a research trip to the Comoro Islands in 1967.

As part of their graduate student requirement, the Ottenheimers completed field research for Tulane University in Louisiana. Since they were cultural anthropologists, their research involved living with a group of people, learning their way of life, learning their language, eating their food, wearing their clothing and practicing their culture.

In preparation for their trip to the islands, Harriet Ottenheimer studied French and Martin studied Swahili. Many of the people of the islands speak French as a second language because the islands were once a province of France. According to literature the Ottenheimers studied, Swahili was the native language of the islands.

Staff/Peter Obetz

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, and Larry Waggle, senior in anthropology, check through the files that she wrote about the Shinzwani language of the Comoro Islands near Africa.

Upon arrival, however, they found the Comorans did not speak Swahili. The language of Anjouan — Shinzwani — is related to Swahili as both are of the Bantu language family.

"Swahili and Shinzwani are Bantu languages and share common grammatical features much like English and German are both Germanic languages, and French and Spanish are both Romance languages," Ottenheimer said.

Through their knowledge of linguistics and familiarity with Bantu languages, the Ottenheimers were able to communicate with the island people. They wrote Shinzwani words on slips of paper as they talked to people. Eventually, they collected entire songs and folk stories.

In 1982, the Ottenheimers returned to the Comoro Islands and took the manuscripts of the dictionary to verify words with the people. While there, the Comoran government learned of the project and became interested. Their government encouraged the dictionary's publication, she said.

The dictionary will be translated from Shinzwani to English and from English to Shinzwani. The translation will improve the economy through trade, international development, tourism and international study, Ottenheimer said.

Performers, spectators experience bluegrass at Winfield's 14th festival

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

The pickin' was fine and the livin' was easy at the 14th Annual Walnut Valley Festival this past weekend in Winfield despite cool and rainy weather.

A popular attraction despite the muck and mud was the Irish folk music concert held Saturday.

"It's been muddier than this, and it's sure been a lot colder than this," said Bob Olson, Winfield doctor of dental surgery and long-time fan of the festival. Olson and his wife, Loyette, have been coming to the festival since it began.

"We came before it was (called) the Walnut Valley bluegrass festival," Loyette said. "It started at Southwestern (College) and John Denver was one of the early performers."

The hammer dulcimer contest is also a favorite among festival-goers.

Ernie Von Feldt, third-place winner in the hammer dulcimer competition and Wichita resident, said he has been playing the instrument all his life.

"My father played and built several (hammer dulcimers). The instrument I played on today was made in the '50s," Von Feldt said. "I didn't win anything last year but I learned a few things. I learned that selection of music is important in winning."

The festival is the brainchild of Bob Redford, Winfield businessman, and two partners, Stuart Mossman, former Winfield resident and owner of the now-defunct Mossman Guitar company, and Sam Ontjes. Mossman and Ontjes are no longer part of the festival.

The Redford family is the only investor in the festival, said Carol Young, information director for the Walnut Valley Association, which now sponsors the festival. Redford is director of the association.

According to Redford, the festival lost $14,000 the first year. It now costs approximately $270,000 to hold the annual event, Redford said. The association now tries to earn enough to cover expenses.

Some of the prizes awarded to the winners of the instrumental contests are bought by the association, while some are donated, Young said.

Prizes are usually new instruments in the musician's field. For example, a guitar contest winner will receive a new guitar.

Young said contestants come from all walks of life and are varied in their professions.

"Most people think of them as hippie-types, but we have doctors, lawyers, engineers, bankers — all kinds of people. The most far-out occupation a contestant had was a Blackjack dealer," Young said. "But most of the people here don't care what you do, they just care that you're here and you like music."

The festival is nationally — and internationally — known to contestants, Young said.

"We have some from as far away as Australia," she said. Other foreign visitors to the festival include those from South Africa, Denmark, Thailand, Equador, Japan and West Germany.

The arts and crafts fair was also a popular attraction at the festival. Wares ranged from rattlesnake skin top-hats to glass dragons.

The festival also included workshops presented by various artists attending the championships. Tips on how to play an instrument better, how to care for instruments and even how to make certain instruments were included in workshop presentations.

The food at the festival was varied also. Dixie Trotter, William Newton Memorial Hospital employee and volunteer for the Snyder Research Foundation food booth, said most of the festival's out-of-town visitors preferred health food.

"They wanted things like ciders, pumpkin bread, zuchinni, baklava, herb spice teas, milk and fruits, while our Winfield people wanted doughnuts," Trotter said.

Next year's festival will be the 15th anniversary of the founding of the event and "something special" is planned, Young said.

Senate

Faculty representatives are Jerome Frieman, former Faculty Senate president and professor of psychology; David Schafer, Faculty Senate president-elect and professor of animal sciences and industry; and Reagan.

Also on the committee is the deans' representative, Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, and non-voting members Owen Koeppe, University provost, and Stanley Koplik, regents' executive director.

Brown said he and Reagan were surprised by the number of alumni on the committee.

"The way we understood it, it was going to be three, three and three," Brown said. "I think a lot of students will be really dissatisfied having unequal representation."

When asked if he thought students are concerned about the composition of the committee, Reagan said, "They should be."

Brown said the issue would probably be discussed at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

Ray, one of the alumni representative, said she would respect the decision of the regents.

"I would like to say the Board of Regents felt comfortable with those who were selected for the committee and I would have to respect that decision," Ray said.

Ray said it is "the faculty's prerogative (to request more representation) and that would be the regents' decision."

'Cats sweep double-header against Pratt

By DOUG SCHEIBE
Staff Writer

K-State's baseball team continued its fall season success by sweeping a double-header Sunday against Pratt County Community College.

K-State beat Pratt County 17-1 in the first game and had them down 11-0 in the second contest before the game was called in the fourth inning because of lightning.

The Cats are 6-0 this fall while scoring 88 runs to their opponents' 13. The team batting average is .406 with 48 of their 88 hits being for extra bases.

"We have good bat speed and our pitchers are throwing strikes," Coach Gary Vaught said. "We haven't had anyone come close to stealing a base on us this fall."

In the first game against Pratt, K-State had a hit in every inning and scored in every inning except the eighth. Of their 25 hits in the first game, seven were for extra bases, including three home runs.

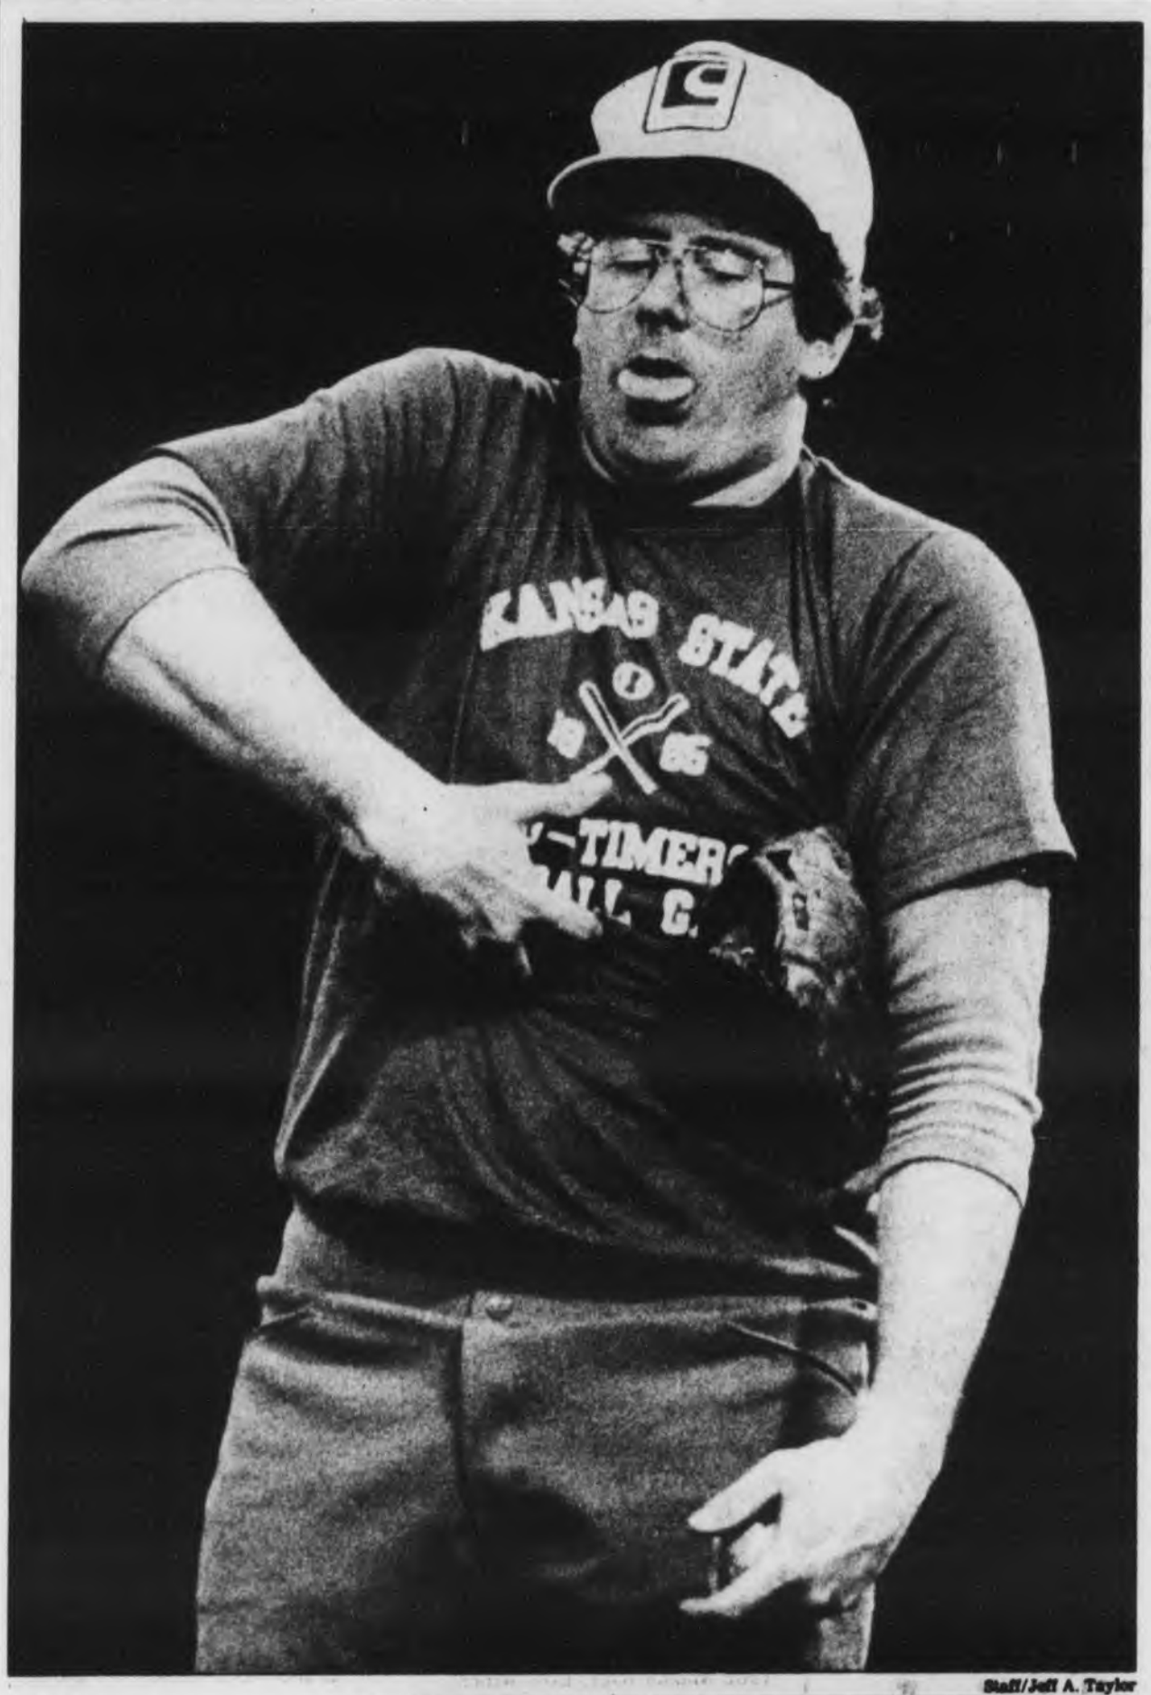
Center fielder Mike Hinkle went 4-for-6 with two runs scored and two RBIs. First baseman Otto Kaifes went 3-for-6 with four runs scored and two RBIs and designated hitter Mike Hamacher went 4-for-6 with a home run and four RBIs.

K-State pitchers allowed only three hits in the first game while striking out 10. Pratt's only run came when Danny Kveton walked, moved to second on an error by K-State shortstop Pat Stivers and scored on a groundout after moving to third on another walk.

In the second game, K-State battered Pratt pitching in the third and fourth innings for nine hits and 11 runs before the game was called because of threatening weather.

"No game is that important," Vaught said. "And besides we had them down 11-0."

Hamacher was 2-for-3 in the second game with two runs scored and three RBIs.



K-State will play Johnson County Community College Thursday at 3 p.m. and Sunday against Labette Community Junior College from Parsons.

"We'll get to bear down this week with Johnson County and Labette comming into town," Vaught said. "We're not a good team yet, but if we keep practicing, we can be a great team."

Vaught brought in 16 recruits this season he hopes will turn the Wildcats into a great team.

"There's no comparison (to last season)," he said. "We have more depth and more speed. We're making the plays in the outfield. It's a different team altogether."

K-State played its first game under the new lights at Frank Myers Field Friday night when they hosted the alumni in an old timers game. The alumni then attended the doubleheader against Pratt.

Take me out coach

Rekindling the fire in a once blazing fast ball is not all it's cracked up to be as Dave Tuttle ('74-'77) of St. Louis, former baseball player for the K-State Wildcats, found out Saturday night in the first Old Timers Game. Tuttle pitched two-thirds of an inning before being pulled from the game by Alumni Coach Dave Fiser ('58-'60) of Manhattan. The Alumni lost the contest 8-0, under the newly installed lights at Frank Meyers Field.

Volleyball team suffers first defeats of season

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's volleyball team suffered its first two defeats of the season Friday and Saturday in the Northwestern Invitational at Evanston, Ill.

The Wildcats went into the tourney with a 5-0 mark but lost two of three matches.

The first action of the tourament pitted the Wildcats against Northern Illinois University. The five-game match lasted 2½ hours Friday, with K-State coming out on top 15-13, 11-15, 15-9, 10-15 and 16-14.

"It was a hard-fought match," said Scott Nelson, head volleyball coach. "Physically and mentally it was a real challenge."

Northern Illinois made a run at K-State in the fifth game and tied the contest at 14. Mary Kinsey came into the match and got some key kills that resulted in points for K-State.

In the match, Helen Bundy was the leading attacker for the 'Cats with an attacking percentage of 38 percent. Bundy was followed by Shawnee Call at 35 percent and Renee Whitney at 33 percent.

The next match was Saturday against Southern Illinois University. The match went four games with K-State coming out on the losing end by a 15-10, 15-17, 12-15 and 5-15 count. It was the first loss in the young season for K-State.

Again Bundy was the leading attacker for the Wildcats. She was successful in 37 percent of her kill attempts. Kinsey was right behind Bundy with a 32 percent attacking percentage.

"We really controlled the tempo through the first game-and-a-half. Then we got out of our tempo. Southern Illinois began serving tough and that took us out of our faster offense that we like to run," Nelson said.

The host team, Northwestern Unversity, was the final competition of the day for K-State. Northwestern is ranked 17th in the nation and is considered one of the top teams in their region.

The match went four games, with Northwestern coming out on top 15-5, 15-11, 10-15 and 15-6.

"Northwestern played real strong and served well," Nelson said.

In the second game, Bundy suffered a sprained ankle and Nelson replaced her with freshman walk-on Kelly Herrold. Nelson made a position change in the third game by moving Call to the middle blocker position, allowing Val Kastens a chance to play.

"With the youth and experience we had out on the court, we still played good volleyball," Nelson said. "It is tough to beat a top-20 team when your playing with younger players."

The next action for K-State will be Friday and Saturday in the Old Timer Classic at Colorado State University. They will play Southwest Missouri State University, who has traditionally been one of the top teams in the region. Texas Tech University is the other team in the tourney.

Sunday the Wildcats will travel to Laramie, Wyo., to face the University of Wyoming.

Slump worries Wilson

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City centerfielder Willie Wilson says he is so frustrated by a 2-for-22 slump that he's considering asking to be taken out of the lineup against lefthanders as the Royals begin a critical six-game road trip.

"I'm going to talk to Dick (Royals Manager Dick Howser) about maybe platooning somebody with me," the switch-hitting Wilson said after going hitless in four at-bats Sunday as the Royals dropped a 7-3 decision to Minnesota to fall a game behind the California Angels in the American League West.

"It's all right hitting left-handed, but it's really frustrating because I can't do what I'm used to doing. I feel like I'm hurting the team. I feel out of it. I don't feel like I'm contributing."

Wilson said his timing hasn't been right since he sat out 18 games after undergoing surgery to relieve swelling in his leg following an allergic reaction to a penicillin shot.

Wilson's slump is another worry for Howser, who has seen his starting pitching sag in the final month.

"Our pitching is going to have to be good," Howser said. "It wasn't good on this homestand. It's going to have to be better on this road trip."

The starters have won more games (69) than any other American League staff. Many have also pitched more innings than ever before in their career. Charlie Leibrandt has pitched a career high 225⅔ innings and Bret Saberhagen has 221⅔ innings after just 157 innings in his rookie year last year. Danny Jackson, who lost the first and last games of a seven-game homestand, has pitched 194 innings in first full major league season.

"Tiredness is a state of mind really," said pitching coach Gary Blaylock. "The only thing is the younger guys, who are used to playing through August, are now playing through September.

"But it's more psychological than anything else. The whole idea is you try to conserve for this time of year."

The Royals, who had an off-day Monday, open a three-game series in Seattle tonight. The Mariners swept four games from the Royals last week in Kansas City.

Kansas City goes to Minnesota for three more before returning home for a four-game series with the Angels and a season-ending, three-game set with Oakland.

The homestand, in which the Royals were 2-5 with Seattle and the Twins, reminded third baseman George Brett of 1982, when Kansas City lost seven in a row to fall three games behind California, which went on to win the West.

"We have to live with the circumstances we have put ourselves in," Brett said. "Obviously, we didn't have the home stand we had hoped to or felt we should have had.

"Let's hope it's not the same. I can see some similarities ... This is a big road trip for us."

Rugby Club places second

The Rugby Club placed second in the Kaw Valley Cup tournament this past weekend in Topeka.

The club opened the meet with a 54-0 win over the University of Kansas Rainbow team. K-State charged out to a 26-0 halftime advantage on the strength of two tries scored by wing Ron Hollingsworth, and single tries scored by flyhalf Mike Allen, wing-forward David Todd and wing Doug Scherich. A try in rugby is worth four points. Todd added the two-point conversion following three of the tries to round out the first-half scoring.

In the second half K-State kept the pressure on Rainbow and scored 28 additional points. Prop Bill Sexton scored two tries in the half, and Todd, Hollingsworth, center John Craig and wing-forward Brian Riedel added additional tries in the half for K-State. Todd added two conversion kicks to round out the scoring.

The squad downed the KU Collegiates in the semi-finals 13-0. K-State moved out to a 3-0 halftime lead on a penalty kick by center Bill Knopick.

In the second half, lock Ken Price scored the lone try of the game for either team, returning a 22-meter drop out. Knopick added the two-point conversion kick and later added a penalty kick to round out the scoring.

K-State lost in the final round to Topeka Rugby Football Club, 32-12. K-State missed two close chances at tries early in the game and fell behind 10-0 at the half.

Tennis teams open season

K-State's women's tennis team went 1-2 in its first weekend of action by defeating Southwest Missouri State University and losing to the University of Arkansas and Wichita State University.

The 'Cats opened the weekend with a 7-2 win against Soutwest Missouri on Saturday.

Winning matches for K-State were Lena Svensson, Sigrid Ivarsson, Kristy Line, Judy Miller and Sabrina Skulborstad. Lisa Creighton lost her match. Svenson edged Helena Olin 7-6 (7-4), 2-6, 6-0; Ivarsson defeated Tracey Williams 6-2, 6-0; Line beat Laurie Jones 6-3, 6-3; Miller won in three sets over Kim Crousen 1-6, 6-4, 6-3; and Skulborstad whipped Beth Potter 6-2, 6-1.

Doubles partners Line and Miller won their match against Olin and Williams by a 6-3, 6-7, 6-2 score. Skulborstad and Esther Olson also were victorious.

Against Arkansas the 'Cats found the competition a little tougher as the Razorbacks won eight of nine matches. The only singles winner for K-State was Ivarsson, who edged Topeka native Linda Norris 6-4, 7-5.

The Wildcats managed one win in six matches against Wichita State. Skulborstad defeated Danielle Shilling 6-0, 6-2. The doubles matches were rained out.

Playing in the University of Kansas Invitational in Lawrence, K-State's men's tennis team won five of 13 matches in the first action of the season.

The 'Cats' Deon Botha won his match against Greg Beers of Iowa State 6-1, 6-3. Kris James defeated Scott Barber of Nebraska 4-6, 6-4, 6-0; Scott Chandler beat Iowa State's Ned Skarna 6-1, 6-2; and Scott Sandlin defeated Reggie Hodges of Kansas 6-2, 6-4. Botha and James won their doubles match by beating Nebraska's Tad Carson and Stuart Yung 6-4, 6-2.

'Cats soccer club ties, loses

The K-State Soccer Club opened the fall season Saturday and Sunday with a tie and a loss. On Saturday, when K-State played the University of Kansas, the game ended in a 1-1 deadlock.

The 'Cats' Dave Weitz scored a goal in the final two minutes of play to give K-State what appeared to be a victory. But the Jayhawks rallied with a goal just 30 seconds later.

The Soccer Club traveled to Lincoln, Neb., Sunday to play the University of Nebraska and lost to the Cornhuskers 3-2.

A goal by Kevin Umidon staked the 'Cats to a 1-0 lead at halftime. Nebraska countered with a goal early in the second half to tie the game at 1.

The Soccer Club regained the lead when Mike Russell headed the ball in on an assist from John Serafin. K-State was unable to keep the lead, however, as the Cornhuskers scored two goals, one which skidded under the goalkeeper, to capture the win.

Rifle team wins competition

The K-State rifle team has captured its second national championship, winning the Collegiate National Championships in the non-NCAA affiliated club air rifle competition.

K-State held off a challenge from the University of Texas to win the competition, which was held last spring at various locations around the nation.

Alan Arwine, Andy Vikman, Gordon Sandercox and Tim Putnam were the members of the K-State squad that scored 1,438 of a possible 1,600 points to win the title. Texas scored 1,402 points to finish second.

Lifeline

ticipants are required to turn in point totals once a month.

"Turning the points in once a month forces them to take stock (in the challenge). It's too easy to cop out if points are turned in only once," Halverson said.

Lifeline is based on the honor system. The application asks for participants to be "careful, accurate and honest" when turning in point totals.

The different levels range from the minimum Fresh Start level, which requires 12 points a week, to the Die Hard level requiring 60 points per week.

"Anyone could do it," she said. "You can choose from quite a bit (of aerobic activities)."

Halverson said about 40 people are taking part in Lifeline this semester. She said she would like to see the number of participants increase.

Tim Lindemuth, University Relations informational writer, has participated in the Lifeline program for four semesters.

"It gives you incentive," he said. "When you work behind a desk at a computer, you need a break."

Lindemuth added that his blood pressure has gone down 15 to 20 points since he began the program.

"It's a good break during lunch to swim, shower and then go back to work," he said. "I get into it for the motivation, if I don't have the pressure to make the points, I miss exercising."

Lindemuth is also entered in the Lifeline Challenge, which is separate from the Lifeline program. Each month, Rec Services issues a different challenge.

This month, athletes were given a cycling challenge. The participants are required to complete 250 miles in 30 days.

In October, the running challenge is issued. Participants run 60 miles during the 30 day period. The final challenge is in November. It calls for athletes to swim a total of 15 miles during the month.

Mileage cards are turned in by the participants once a week. The entry fee for the challenges is the same as for the semester-long Lifeline program.

Cindy Shaw, senior in life sciences, is entered in the running challenge for a second semester.

"I feel like almost anybody could complete the 60 miles, it's a good level," she said.

Shaw has been running for about three years, but she still thinks the challenge motivates her to do better.

Halverson encourages those interested to get a copy of the point booklet from the Rec Complex.

"The neat thing about it is a lot of people make a promise to themselves to exercise; keeping a daily log gives them the extra motivation and a kick in the pants to do it," Halverson said.

School

puter disc stores 500 entries, which reduces the physical space required for a cataloging system.

Graham said a major challenge for students is that they must be able to spell accurately in order to use the Apple IIe computer used in the system.

The traditional card system allowed students to search for familiar names printed on index cards, but the computer requires the students to "punch in" the name of the author, subject or title they are looking for. When the entry is correctly typed, a list of books available in the library appears on the computer's screen.

"The necessity for being accurate is a bonus effect we hadn't thought of," Graham said.

Sharon Smith, library media specialist at Amanda Arnold, said the students seem eager and excited to learn about the computer. Although computer demonstrations were given to the students and their parents prior to the school's opening, she plans to begin regular instruction sessions next week.

"Most of them are delighted to use the computer, and some of the students are even fascinated," Smith said. "Because of the pleasure involved in working on a computer, we hope the students will become more motivated to practice their reading and spelling skills."

Teachers discuss goals

New school may reduce overcrowding

By SUSAN D. BAIRD
Collegian Reporter

When a new school building replaces an old one, it can simply be a matter of moving people and equipment as an entity.

But when a whole new school is formed, and people as well as equipment come from a variety of settings, the process can become a bit more complicated.

Such was the case when the Amanda Arnold Elementary School, 1435 Hudson Ave., opened this fall. The school was constructed to reduce overcrowding and the need for mobile classrooms at other schools in the district, as well as serve the increased number of students living in west Manhattan.

In an effort to avoid mistakes and make the transition to the new facility easier, the staff had three organizational meetings during the summer.

Bob Anderson, who served as principal of Marlatt School before becoming principal of Amanda Arnold, said the staff discussed research studies done around the country on effective ways of teaching elementary students and set some general goals for the school.

One goal is for teachers to return each student's classwork promptly and make periodic evaluations of the student's progress. Teachers also hope to use more class time for practicing skills.

In addition, the school's staff is hoping to receive more support from the community by getting parents involved in the new school.

Through the newly organized Amanda Arnold Community Council Parent-Teachers Association, parents of students at Amanda Arnold and community members will be able to work together for the school.

The organizational meetings also allowed teachers to become acquainted with their co-workers before classes began.

"It (the meetings) gave us the advantage of meeting and talking with other teachers we hadn't worked with before," said Mary Schindler, sixth grade teacher.

The school's administrators have scheduled future orientation meetings for parents and teachers. At these meetings, parents can find out what is expected of them, how they can become more involved with the school and what curriculum the students will take.

While approximately 50 percent of the staff is from Marlatt, at Hobbs Drive and Browning Avenue, others came from throughout the district.

Coleen Beck, special education teacher for Unified School District 383, is the only faculty member at Amanda Arnold new to the district.

There have been problems, such as with the plumbing and air conditioning, Anderson said, but that's to be expected.

"It's the situation where people have to be able to roll with the punches."

The mood of faculty and students was mixed between the excitement and the problems of moving into a facility not yet complete.

"It's been exciting," Schindler said of the move. "It kind of gives you an extra burst of energy because you have the new school, and you don't want to repeat mistakes from the past."

Anita Nichols, physical education specialist, said the lack of a playground and equipment is "the biggest hassle right now."

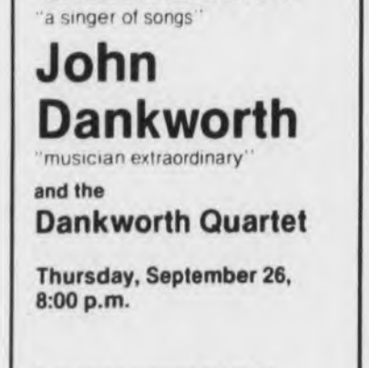
Black South Africans to be forced off land

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A government commission on Monday proposed a plan that would forcibly uproot about 42,000 people, most of them black. But a government official said the plan does not reflect the attitude of the white regime.

The Commission for Cooperation and Development proposed proclaiming about 28,000 acres of the Zulu tribal homeland in Natal province part of "white" South Africa, and buying up some 152,000 acres of white farmland and turning them into "black" areas of the homeland. The plan, immediately condemned by many leading whites in Natal, would uproot about 42,000 people.

A fundamental pillar of apartheid, and one of the most criticized internationally, has been to chop South Africa up into black and white sectors, leaving the black majority of 24 million on 13 percent of the country's land and reserving the rest for the 5 million whites, 2.8 million people of mixed racial ancestry and 850,000 Asians.



Parliamentarian Ray Swart of the Progressive Federal Party, which opposes apartheid, said the plan was "hell-bent on the apartheid road."

Architect to begin tenure as director of facility planning

By The Collegian Staff

Bringing with him the experience of working at four major universities, W. Lawrence Garvin will become the University's director of facility planning and University architect Tuesday.

Garvin will replace Robert Jackson, associate professor of architecture.

Garvin was an associate dean and chairman of architecture at Texas Tech University in Lubbock, from 1978 to 1983; assistant vice president for physical planning and construction at the University of California-Berkley from 1973 to 1977; and staff architect at both Harvard Medical School, from 1966 to 1973 and Massachusetts Institute of Technology, from 1964 to 1966, in Cambridge.

Garvin will be responsible for long-range planning, capital improvements, new building and renovation project drawings and specifications, new building program development and management of the office of facility planning.

"I'm excited about Garvin, he has had extensive background in preparation of programs for long-range capital development, and his experience will greatly enhance K-State's capabilities in additional capital resources," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"Garvin is also a planning-oriented individual. His techniques will fit very well in the University planning; programming (and) budgeting of those resource developments," Miller said.

Miller intends for the office to provide the analytical services that will help to assess the adequacy of University facilities in both quanitative and qualitative aspects, he said. Miller also indicated the office will be directly involved in the translation of short- and long-range diplomatic statements of the University to help develop the appropriate facilities to aecommodate programs.

"I think that the primary objective is that we do the very best job that we can with the existing resources that

Wal-Mart considering possible land purchase

By The Collegian Staff

Although little is on paper, officials of Wal-Mart Stores, Bentonville, Ark., have been considering the possibility of building a second store in Manhattan.

Bill Bothwell, who is in charge of Wal-Mart properties in Kansas and five other area states said the company has a purchase option on land in Manhattan, but declined to give the owner's name.

Sean O'Brian, an assistant manager at the Manhattan Wal-Mart store, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd., said he was restricted to the statement: "We are talking about it but there is nothing on paper."

However, Stacey Duncan, a public information representative for Wal-Mart in the Bentonville offices said, "I show nothing on my schedule for a second store in Manhattan...that's not to say we won't in the future. But I don't have anything about it (now)."

Dan Woellhof, Manhattan Code Inspection office head and Eric Cattell, assistant city planner, both said they had heard references to the project, but their offices had not been approached officially.

A representative of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce said they had not been informed of the project.

"I really don't know the status of it yet," Bothwell said, adding that an option was not a guarantee a second store would be built. He said all plans would have to be presented to an executive committee and approved before a final decision would be made.

"There could be any number of reasons for not building the store, even with (the land purchase) option," Bothwell said.

Economists call deficit misleading

By TRISH MEHAFFEY
Staff Writer

The fact that the United States is a debtor nation because of the trade deficit is not as traumatic as some believe, according to two University economists.

Patrick Gormely, associate professor in economics and Roger Trenary, instructor in economics, said in an interview Monday there is no cause for Americans to be overly alarmed about the trade deficit.

The U.S. Commerce Department revealed last week the deficit had reached $31.81 billion.

Trenary said there are two views of the deficit situation.

"One view is that the government deficit makes the exchange rate high, which means less export and more import, which results in a trade deficit," Trenary said. "The second view is that U.S. taxes are low, which makes the United States an attractive place to invest, which encourages foreigners to invest and produces need for dollars and results in exporting which pushes up exchange rate."

Trenary and Gormely said they tend to go along with both views, but stressed that it was hard to have a cut-and-dried answer for such a controversial subject.

Trenary said he was more of an "import man," wanting to get more goods.

"Whether it's better to import or export depends on which side you're on," Trenary said.

"(Just exporting) would be a problem if we kept putting out money and someday ran out of funds," Gormely said.

Trenary said that some United States firms are investing in the United States, but are also borrowing overseas because it's cheaper.

"It's advantageous to us," Trenary said. "They're (foreigners) building our factories. For example, if GM (General Motors) borrows from Japan, builds another factory in the United States, then that borrowing is being used to build up the U.S. company and put the money back into U.S. pockets."

Gormely said if the borrowing was to finance self-consumption and not to benefit the United States, such as generating funds, then it would be wrong.

Thousands leave quake-torn city

Rescuers search for survivors in rubble

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Thousands fled the city Tuesday, fearing disease from polluted water and decaying bodies. Others watched rescuers pull survivors from earthquake debris that had imprisoned them for days, praying to see relatives.

Workers dug and listened on ultrasound equipment, specially trained dogs sniffed and pawed in the desperate effort to find the estimated 1,500 people still buried before it is too late.

Cheers are raised for every victory, when someone who thought his trap was his grave is pulled to safety.

Not even disaster can change fundamental human behavior: Teams digging through the rubble of an apartment building reached a 70-year-old woman, but she refused at first to come out "because I am naked and people are going to think I have no shame."

The latest official count put the death toll at 3,000 from the two major earthquakes that struck the heart of the city last Thursday and Friday.

The city government said 7,100 people were injured and 600 remained in hospitals.

An estimated 300,000 are homeless, and only about half have found temporary shelter. The others huddle in parks and streets, or have left the city to seek help from friends and relatives outside the capital.

Health officials said there was no severe threat of epidemic from contaminated water and decaying bodies that either are caught in the rubble or awaiting burial. They advised residents of the city to boil drinking water.

Health workers fumigated badly damaged buildings and devastated areas to stop any spread of disease from the corpses underneath.

Survivors visited Roman Catholic churches, lighting votive candles for the dead, many of whom are being buried in mass graves.

Detours and blocked streets tied up the normally heavy traffic until it approached gridlock in this huge urban sprawl of 18 million people. The city attorney's office said bodies could not be taken outside the city for burial, and told families to take them to one of three public cemeteries.

An intern was rescued from the wreckage of the Juarez Hospital on Monday morning. Four doctors and a patient were dug out later in the day.

French and Swiss teams still were trying on Tuesday to reach Dr. Gilberto Lozano Saldivar, chief of the hospital teaching staff and other

Grain dust hazards still topic of concern

By RANAE YOUNG
Collegian Reporter

Dusty air and an ignition point can send a grain elevator tumbling into a pile of rubble.

Grain dust explosions are not a new hazard to the grain industry. They have been reported since 1918, when the U.S. Department of Agriculture published "Preventing Grain Dust Explosions" said Robert Schoeff, professor of grain science and industry.

"The dust is a combination of starchy grain particles and chaff off of the grain," said Ron Lee, professor of physics.

"The unusual thing about grain dust is it is not the bigger particles that set off an explosion," he said. "We have found that the finer the particles, the more explosive they are."

The dust particles have a lower limit to their explosion point; this means it takes fewer particles of dust per square inch of at-

Science advisers review 'Stars Wars' design

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's "Star Wars" missile defense program could "substantially increase" America's safety under certain conditions, but it will never be able to protect the entire country from nuclear attack, science advisers to Congress concluded Tuesday.

A study by the Office of Technology Assessment said the United States would need "great technical success" in its research program along with a change in the Soviet Union's strategy to also emphasize defense rather than offense.

A companion OTA study raised new questions about U.S. anti-satellite, or ASAT, weapons and cautioned that while this country may lead now in a technology field related to Star Wars, the Soviets are likely to catch up.

"What this means is that after spending billions and billions of dollars, we could find that we have bought ourselves greater instability than the world has ever confronted in the atomic age," said Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

The 324-page study of the Star Wars program, which is known formally as the Strategic Defense Initiative, was done at the request of Aspin's panel and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Release of the report comes in the midst of a debate over the place of the high-tech missile-interception program in the nuclear balance between the two superpowers.

The SDI program "carries a risk" that it could start an entirely new arms race and could create "severe instabilities" if it made the Soviets think the United States was seeking a first-strike capability, the study suggested.

It noted there is confusion over the specific goals of Star Wars. Some supporters of the program want a so-called "Astrodome" defense that would defend the entire nation, while others call for a defense of U.S. missile sites. Critics say the latter would violate the 1972 treaty limiting missile defenses.

The study concluded that while anti-missile weapons could "substantially increase" the safety margin in a nuclear attack, "assured survival of the U.S. population (the 'Astrodome' defense) appears impossible to achieve if the Soviets are determined to deny it to us."

That is because any U.S. defense could be countered by Soviet offensive maneuvers that would likely ensure that some attacking missiles would make it through the American shield, it said.

As the November summit meeting between Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev approaches, the Soviets have increasingly called for cuts in the Star Wars program and said any new nuclear arms limitation agreement depends on the United limiting its research.

Leader calls defense plan 'sinister'

UNITED NATIONS — Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze unveiled Tuesday what he described as a plan for "Star Peace" that would save the world from the Reagan administration's "sinister plans of Star Wars."

In an address to the 40th U.N. General Assembly, Shevardnadze said the Star Wars program, known officially as the Strategic Defense Initiative, is the main stumbling block to a new U.S.-Soviet arms control agreement. He said it threatens to make the global arms race "uncontrollable and irreversible."

Shevarnadze said Moscow has offered "far-reaching proposals" at the Geneva talks to which the United States has not responded. Secretary of State George P. Shultz made an identical claim for the U.S. position at Geneva in his address to the U.N. Monday.

Shevardnadze accused the administration of seeking to achieve nuclear superiority over Moscow through the development of a secure defensive shield against nuclear attack.

But he said the Soviet Union "will not permit military superiority over itself."

"The State and party leadership of the Soviet Union has instructed me to reaffirm this once again from the high rostrum of the United Nations," said Shevardnadze, making his first address at the United Nations since being named to succeed Andrei Gromyko as foreign minister earlier this year.

Gates Learjet announces lay offs

TUCSON, Ariz. — As part of a previously announced work force reduction, 142 Gates Learjet workers here have been told that Friday will be their last day of work.

On Sept. 12, Gates announced that it would be laying off 400 to 500 workers in the next several weeks at its plants in Tucson and Wichita About 150 people have been laid off to date in Wichita and seven in Tucson.

Jack Metz, spokesman for the International Association of Machinists ' Aerospace Workers in Wichita, said Monday that he expects about 100 more layoffs there at the end of the week. The company is expected to inform the union of the exact numbers on Wednesday, Metz said.

The layoffs in Tucson primarily involve workers making the 50 Series jets, said Gates spokesman John V. Alexander.

The company has frozen wages until the end of the year and officers and directors have taken voluntary pay cuts in an effort to reduce costs, Alexander said.

Gates also announced Monday that it was cutting the base prices of its 30 and 50 series jets an average 17.5 percent. The new base price for the Learjet 35A is $2.85 million and for the Learjet 55 it is $4.49 million.

Service reports on crops' seeding

TOPEKA — Nearly one-third of the state's 1986 wheat acreage has been seeded, the state Crop and Livestock Reporting Service said Tuesday.

As of last weekend, 30 percent of the anticipated 11 million or so acres of wheat had been planted, the service said in its weekly report on crop conditions and planting progress. That compares with 20 percent by this time last year and 25 percent in an average year.

As the wheat begins its growth, topsoil moisture is rated 83 percent adequate to surplus and subsoil moisture is rated 95 percent adequate to surplus, the service also said.

On the fall-harvested row crops, the summary said the harvest of corn, sorghum and soybeans is now getting into full swing with 15 percent of the corn, 3 percent of the sorghum and 2 percent of the soybeans already cut.

Seventy-five percent of the state's corn, 45 percent of the soybeans and 30 percent of the sorghum was reported to be mature, with soybeans slightly ahead of usual, corn about on schedule and sorghum somewhat behind average.

Predecessor warns of budget cuts

WASHINGTON — James C. Miller III, President Reagan's choice to succeed David Stockman as budget director, told the Senate Tuesday he would press for additional budget cuts with as much vigor as his predecessor exhibited.

"I'm anxious to get to work," Miller, a conservative economist who has been chairman of the Federal Trade Commission since 1981, said at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee.

Miller said that it was "an unreasonable assumption" to believe that the United States could grow its way out of budget deficits running at around $200 billion a year and said another round of spending cuts would be needed.

Asked whether such cuts would extend to so-called entitlement programs, which guarantee certain benefit levels under law, Miller said "I wouldn't put anything out of bounds unless the president did."

Pilot averts crash with helicopter

WASHINGTON — Eastern Airlines' 5 p.m. shuttle flight to New York was aborted at takeoff Tuesday when the pilot hit his brakes because he feared collision with a helicopter, authorities said. The plane, carrying 175 passengers, skidded to a stop 50 feet from the Potomac River.

An FAA spokesman, Stephen Hayes, said Flight 1500 came to rest on a section of the runway overrun which had been completed only last December to provide pilots with more room to abort a takeoff. The safety area was built following the crash into the Potomac of an Air Florida flight in 1982.

Cecil Wynn, who fishes in the area, said, "I've been coming out here for four years and I've never seen anything like this. I guess that's why they extended that runway. It's a good thing they did, because otherwise he would have been a gonner."

"The (airline) pilot was just about at top speed," said witness Andy Sawicki. "I thought he was going into the water. He zig-zagged when he left the runway. I guess he was trying to stay on land as long as he could."

Sawicki said he saw the helicopter flying toward the Boeing 727's takeoff trajectory.

George Dounis, another eyewitness, also thought the helicopter was flying toward the takeoff pattern of the plane. "The chopper makes a U-turn and makes a beeline back to the hangar," he said.

Springsteen has birthday on stage

DENVER — Rock star Bruce Springsteen celebrated his 36th birthday with some 68,000 bundled-up concertgoers who heard him sing that he was "Born in the U.S.A."

"I'd like to thank you for spending my birthday with me," he told the crowd at Mile High Stadium on Monday night. "Nice birthday party."

Fans waved "Happy Birthday Bruce" banners, and a cake was lifted up to him from the crowd.

Springsteen, wearing faded blue jeans and a T-shirt and accompanied by the E Street Band, put on the kind of high-energy show he's famous for, belting out ballads of blue-collar life.

Jackson may be candidate in 1988

OKLAHOMA CITY — The Rev. Jesse Jackson, who tried to win the Democratic presidential nomination last year, said he hasn't ruled out another try in 1988.

Jackson said at a news conference Monday that he had not decided whether to vie again to become the nation's first black president. He said his Rainbow Coalition, formed during his 1984 presidential bid, continues to organize across the nation.

The civil rights leader was in Oklahoma City to speak to students at John Marshall High School.

"That would affect future generations, Trenary said. "They would have to pay off those selfish loans."

Trenary and Gormely said it wouldn't matter if the money came from overseas or from the United States, the debt has to be paid back regardless and the company doesn't care if it's foreign or not.

Trenary said what mattered was that borrowing is cheaper in Japan, for example, and American firms were investing in the United States. Japan is investing in the United States because the taxes are attractive and they have nothing in which to invest their savings in Japan, he said.

Expressions of ancestry, imagry

Artists exhibit baskets, oils

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Basket works of Indian heritage and oil paintings with theater and performance themes are currently on exhibition in the Union Art Gallery.

The artwork — baskets by Margaret 'Redfern' Pitzer and paintings by Nicholas Hill — is open for viewing daily from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. and will be on display until Sept. 27.

Growing up with the influences of Cherokee ancestory, watching her mother and grandmothers create baskets out of cane, Pitzer has intertwined the two to form her basketwork. Self-taught, Pitzer learned the art of weaving by observation and studying at libraries and museums. She concentrates her basketry efforts on preserving the ancient designs of her Cherokee ancestors.

"Luckily, I can look at something and tell how it's made," Pitzer said. "When you're a kid, you learn more than you think you do."

Although Pitzer grew up around weaving she didn't become interested in it until 10 years ago, when a leg injury confined her to a wheelchair.

"I needed something lightweight to hold in my lap. And the more I did the more it intrigued me," Pitzer said.

Pitzer works six to eight hours each weekday on beadwork or basketry — done in honor of her grandmother Redfern. Each basket is also signed with a sprig of red fern.

Along with her husband, Pitzer gathers what raw materials she can, such as honeysuckle, buck brush and cattails. She purchases other materials: cane, ash and oak splint.

Pitzer's Indian style display is joined with oil paintings of "figurative imagery" by Nicholas Hill.

Hill said metaphors of theater and performance are an on-going theme in his paintings of the last three years.

"The imagery toys with the theatrical concept. It attempts to avoid mere illustration," Hill said.

Fleeting gestures and daily life actions are all possible starting points for imagery, Hill said. "The playful juxtaposition of disparate images often provides the impetus for a painting," he said.

"I make the paintings to be seen and also to be remembered. I hope that the viewer leaves the work with some remnant of an image or some reaction to an image," Hill said.

Hill received a master of fine arts degree from the University of Iowa, Iowa City. He did student teaching in Feltwell, England and currently is an assistant art professor at Bethany College in Lindsborg.

Woman's plea bargain brings lighter sentence

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — A former Emporia woman was sentenced to consecutive terms totaling 5½ years to 18 years Tuesday after she pleaded guilty to plotting with her church minister to murder her husband.

Lorna Anderson Eldridge, who pleaded guilty Aug. 24 to two counts of criminal solicitation to commit first-degree murder, was sentenced to 2½ years to eight years in prison on one charge and to the maximum of three years to 10 years on the other charge.

Eldridge originally was charged with criminal solicitation and with conspiracy to murder her husband, Martin K. Anderson. She pleaded guilty in a plea bargain in which the conspiracy charge was dropped and a second solicitation charge added.

Prosecutors alleged that Eldridge had an affair with Thomas Bird, former pastor at Faith Lutheran Church in Emporia, and that the two conspired to kill Anderson. Eldridge, who remarried June 29 and now lives in Hutchinson, was Bird's secretary.

Although Anderson was found shot to death in a Geary County field on Nov. 3, prosecutors say schemes worked out by Eldridge and Bird were never carried out. No one has been charged with the actual slaying of Anderson.

Bird is serving a 2½-year-to-seven-year sentence for criminal solicitation for scheming with Eldridge against her husband. Bird also was sentenced to life in prison last month after he was convicted of first-degree murder in the July 1983 death of his wife, Sandra.

Sandra Bird initially was believed to have died in a traffic accident, but the case was later reopened.

Faculty input important

Faculty Senate has called a special meeting to discuss the unequal representation on the presidential search committee. The committee — named by the Board of Regents Friday to nominate candidates for the successor for University President Duane Acker, who has resigned from the position effective June 30, 1986 — is composed of six alumni, three students, three faculty, one dean and two non-voting members representing University administration and the regents.

The complaint among senate members centers around the regents' choice of six alumni to serve as voting members on the committee. Originally, the search committee was to have had equal representation among alumni, faculty and students. The regents, for an unknown reason, chose to weigh the search committee heavily toward alumni — ignoring the impact the committee's actions will have on students and faculty.

Senate's decision to protest the regents' move is justified and necessary. University alumni are rarely affected by the decisions an administration makes. The faculty and students must deal on a daily basis with the financial and policy philosophies and actions of the University president.

Faculty members are affected by these decisions to a greater extent than are students. Students may feel the effects of the administration for four or five years before becoming alumni themselves; faculty are often here much longer.

Nonetheless, students as well as faculty need to be represented equally on the presidential search committee. The University would have no purpose without students, and no means of accomplishing its mission without faculty. Without discounting alumni financial support, the alumni are the least affected by daily University affairs.

The regents' decision to name six alumni to the search committee is unfathomable. Students should take a cue from the faculty and protest this move. The student body has a responsibility to request equal representation on the committee, as a part of the duality most affected by the outcome of that committee's, and the regents', decision: a new University president.

50-year ag policy erosion

If a new report by the Roosevelt Center for American Policy Studies is correct, now may be the appropriate time for the federal government to establish policies that link agriculture to conservation.

The report, "Eroding Eden," released by the Washington, D.C., non-partisan research institute, said export-oriented agriculture programs ironically provide incentive for farmers to reap vast harvests of wheat, corn, soybeans and cotton for export markets, but also increase the likelihood of causing serious wind and soil erosion.

Congress is in the process of writing the '85 farm bill. The bill, a federal farm policy map of sorts, includes provisions requiring farmers to take a more environmentally oriented approach to agriculture.

The bill, which is taking months to hash out, must replace the law that expires Sept. 30. The House plans to begin debate Thursday on the bill, and the Senate plans to begin debate on its version of the bill next week.

Congressional leaders are attempting to mold a farm bill that includes programs that would deny federal funds to those who cultivate fragile, erodible land. It appears some legislators may have come to the realization that poor land and poor farmers go hand in hand.

Despite the creation of the Soil Conservation Service in 1933 — whose charge it is to deal with land conservation problems — the federal government has not adequately addressed the conservation issue.

Money and practicality — considering the current agricultural depression — should guide Congress during the long process of writing new farm policy, but the nation's crucial soil and water resources can no longer be neglected. U.S. farm policy should address, and the agriculture industry must adopt, a meaningful long-range conservation policy.

Legislation that denies benefits to farmers who do not respect the balance of nature and pays those who do is necessary.

If the Roosevelt center's assessment is correct — and it must be — the new farm bill should contain a meaningful method of reducing the conflict between natural resource conservation and agricultural production.

Solomon Amendment victims deserve aid

CATHERINE SAYLER
Collegian Columnist

Imagine the student government of a midwestern university righting a wrong of the federal government. Imagine a student government becoming its own U.S. Supreme Court and deciding a federal policy is discrimatory and unconstitutional.

Sounds pretty far-fetched.

At Iowa State University, the student government has taken issue with just such a federal policy, the Solomon Amendment, and has recently attempted to override the amendment's main form of enforcement.

The Solomon Amendment, which has been in effect since 1983, requires that every student who receives federal financial educational aid comply with the Selective Service Act.

The Iowa State student government views the Solomon Amendment as a basic attack on freedom of education. The students have taken on the burden of preserving their freedom by establishing a $7,500 scholarship specifically for students who are denied federal financial aid because they have refused to register for the selective service.

How such a blatently unconstitutional act as the Solomon Amendment has been allowed to remain in effect for so long is a mystery.

The question, "Have you registered for the selective service?" violates the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution — the right not to incriminate oneself. If a student has not registered for the selective service, he must either incriminate himself by answering "no" or he must lie. There is no provision for a student who wishes to "take the Fifth."

If a student wishes not to lie, and he answers that he has not registered for the selective service, he is automatically punished by denial of aid, without a trial and without a conviction, which violates another tenet basic to democracy.

The amendment is also selective, and thus discriminatory in its enforcement by focusing on the poor male college student. Those not attending college and those who are wealthy enough not to need aid are virtually free from punishment if they choose not to register.

Most of those who refuse to register for the selective service do so on moral grounds. Many in this area are Mennonites, whose religious faith for centuries has included the doctrine of non-violence.

Article 18 of the Mennonite Confession of Faith states "We believe that it is the will of God for his children to follow Christian love in all humn relationships. Such a life of love excludes retaliation and revenge...As nonresistant Christians we cannot serve in any office which employs the use of force. Nor can we participate in military service, or in military training, or in the voluntary financial support of war. But we must aggressively, at the risk of life itself, do whatever we can for the alleviation of human distress and suffering."

Fred Belk, former temporary instructor in anthropology, has outlined the history of many Kansas and Nebraska Mennonites in his book "The Great Trek."

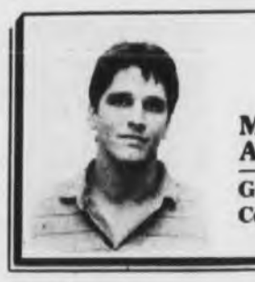
Over a century ago, Kansas Mennonites' ancestors fled from Germany to the Soviet Union to avoid conscription. The Soviet government allowed the group to practice their religion freely for a time, but then began to insist that the men join the armed forces.

The group again fled, this time to central Asia, where they became destitute. Mennonites who were already settled in the midwestern United States responded to their Asian brethren's plight by raising enough money to transport the group to the Kansas-Nebraska area.

During times of conscription in the United States, Mennonites and others have been able to claim a "conscientious objector" status, thus notifying anyone interested that they would not, under any circumstances, resort to violence. The selective service act, however, does not allow for the conscientious objector.

Since the selective service is an indication to our "enemies" that the citizens of the United States are willing to fight, some Mennonites and others claim that simply by adding their names to the list, they are increasing the chance of a violent solution to the world's problems.

Iowa State students have recognized that regardless of the reasons for refusing to register, tying education to compliance with a government policy is a dangerous precedent. Our universities must stay full of people with different opinions and ideas from "America, love it or leave it" to conscientious objectors to even those who are outright hostile to the U.S. government.



The Iowa State students have realized that without freedom of thought, the university merely becomes a propaganda machine for the politics of the day.

Perhaps K-State will follow Iowa State's lead. With the $700,000 available for student use through refinancing of the coliseum bonds, the establishment of a scholarship similar to Iowa State's would be an easy financial move.

With the long history that a sector of the Kansas population has had of practicing nonviolence, the move would seem to be the only just way to ensure that all Kansans have a fair and equal chance at education.

Board of Regents' decisions 'questionable'

MIKE AUDLEY
Guest Columnist

I am beginning to wonder if the Board of Regents really is concerned with K-State's future. A lot of important decisions are being made that are going to shape the image of K-State, yet the regents seem to be making decisions in a most unprofessional manner.

Two decisions last Friday best support my opinion: The regents' selection of the presidential search committee and their vote in the revised program of construction for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Both decisions seem to warrant review.

My first question concerns the appointment of alumnus Gilbert Johnson, a contractor from Colorado who was one of two contractors in charge of monitoring the coliseum budget estimates. The Collegian reported Monday that both contractors told the University that the architect's budget estimates were on target, however neither chose to submit a bid on the project in August. We now know that the lowest bid was a $1.8 million oversight.

Johnson's appointment must make one wonder just how much homework went into selecting the presidential committee. I also believe that we have had enough help from Johnson.

The second question is: Why do alumni now have six votes to the faculty's three and students' three on the committee? I feel students deserve more of a voice in who's going to run the University and I hope the faculty is concerned about who their next boss is going to be. After all, if the students and faculty are taken away there's really not much for a president to do, is there?

My third question is: Why do so many of the regents say they are confused about the coliseum issue yet go off and vote 7-1 in favor of the revised program of construction? The Collegian reported Monday that Regent Bill Roy, Topeka, said he was concerned the regents were "giving a second or third blank check to K-State and ending up with a lousy building." Roy voted in favor.

Wendall Lady, an Overland Park regent and architectural engineer, supported the redesign proposal but expressed reservations about the quality of the project's planning.

Junction City regent John Montgomery said he believes the University "must have the coliseum," but is troubled by rumors that it will lack the plushness that was promised several years ago.

It seems to me some regents are taking a "cross your fingers attitude" involving a $16.1 million decision. K-State deserves a clear picture of what we are getting for $16.1 million.

It is time students opened their eyes to the decisions being made on K-State's behalf and get some mileage out of our expensive fee cards.

After all, if we stand around and watch K-State go down the tubes, how attractive will "K-State" look on our resumes in the future?

Editor's note: Mike Audley is a senior in social sciences.

Letter

Student Senate chairman 'dedicated representative'

Editor,

Re: Tim Carpenter's column, "Senate leader fails to represent students," in the Sept. 23 Collegian:

Through tremendous powers of inductive reasoning, Tim Carpenter has slandered a committed student leader. Because Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones, senior in management, could not immediately recall the date of the May 7 coliseum referendum at the recent Board of Regents meeting, Carpenter has concluded that Jones did not do his homework for the meeting and is usurping power for "private advantage."

Ludicrous is the only word describing such vengeful nonsense. Jones spends more than 12 regularly scheduled hours per week in the Student Governing Association office to serve students. His evenings and days away from campus working for K-Staters are innumberable.

Jones, unlike state or nation political leaders, does not have a bureau of historians, assistants or speech writers. Keeping an up-to-date mental or written record of all senate activities is impossible. Asking a senate chairman the precise date of one activity is like asking the Collegian editor what ads were on page 9 of the Sept. 23 issue.

As for using the senate chair position for personal gain, what possible "private advantage" could Jones be seeking? Re-election? More scholarships? A bigger office? Heavier social schedule? How about the Collegian editorship? Or K-State presidency?

Jones is a mangement major. He will graduate in May 1986 and plans to enter law school next fall. Any possible gain from writing "senate chair" on his resume is far outweighed by the tremendous amount of work and time required. It would not be worth it.

Jones is not incompetent nor power hungry. I am pleased that he is not threatened by the political blackmail tactics of a few vocal students. He has stood the heat of an unwarranted fire. He can be proud of his record of service.

French newspaper reports

Official gives order to sink ship

By The Associated Press

PARIS — A French newspaper said today that Charles Hernu, the defense minister who resigned over revelations that French spies sank the Rainbow Warrior, may have given an verbal order to "neutralize" the Greenpeace ship.

However, the article in the respected Le Monde newspaper said the alleged order was made without the knowledge of President Francois Mitterrand or Premier Laurent Fabius.

Le Monde reported that "the order was given on the political level by Mr. Hernu himself, responding to a pressing demand of Adm. Henri Fages," at the time head of the nuclear testing center at Mururoa.

The article in Le Monde, which has led the French press with revelations about the Greenpeace affair, quoted Bernard Tricot, the civil servant who furnished the government's initial report on the affair, as saying Le Monde's scenario was possible.

The front-page article in Le Monde came under a headline reading: "Who gave the order to neutralize the flagship of Greenpeace July 10 in the port of Auckland?"

The article said then Army Chief of Staff Jeannou Lacaze and Gen. Jean Saulnier, chief of staff at the presidential Elysee palace, were kept informed "but the premier and the president of the republic were not informed."

On Sunday, Fabius said French spies had mined and sunk the Rainbow Warrior on July 10 in the harbor at Auckland, New Zealand, before it set off on a mission to survey France's nuclear testing site at Mururoa Atoll. A photographer was killed in the attack.

The article said there was no written order to sink the Rainbow Warrior and that "the oral order itself does not forcibly imply the technical translation given to it by the DGSE," the General Directorate for External Security, the spy agency involved in the sinking. "Technical translation" is a reference to the sinking of the boat.

Tricot's report Aug. 26 revealed that five agents were in New Zealand on a surveillance mission but cleared France of any involvement in the sinking.

Two French spies are awaiting trial in Auckland on charges of murder and conspiracy. New Zealand authorities have been seeking the extradition from France of three other secret agents.

Police carry 14 bodies from plane debris

By The Associated Press

WEYERS CAVE, Va. — The bodies of 14 people killed when a commuter plane slammed into a mountain and burned were carried down rugged trails Tuesday as investigators looked for clues to the cause of the crash.

"It's amazing how a plane that size can be reduced to nothing," said state police Sgt. R.L. Bass, one of about 30 officers assisting National Transportation Safety Board investigators gathering pieces of the Henson Airlines Beech 99.

The plane, carrying 12 passengers and two crew members, went down Monday morning on a flight from Baltimore to the Shenandoah Valley Airport in this western Virginia community south of Harrisonburg. The wreckage was spotted nearly nine hours later from a Marine helicopter.

The first ground team to reach the crash site on Trayfoot Mountain didn't arrive until about 2 a.m. Tuesday.

The victims' bodies were placed in bags at the site Tuesday and stretcher teams carried them to the nearest road, more than a mile away.

"It appeared the plane came in straight or slightly descending...bulldozed the ground and broke apart," NTSB investigation team leader Patricia Goldman said. "Very little is intact."

She said some of the bodies were burned.

At an afternoon news conference, Goldman said investigators had not been able to confirm reports that the pilot had trouble with navigation equipment before the crash.

She said investigators would listen to conversations between traffic controllers at Leesburg and the pilot to determine if there was any such problem.

Col. David Carter, a spokesman for the Civil Air Patrol in northern Virginia, said Monday that one of the pilot's radio messages reported a failure in a device called a localizer, which tells the pilot where the plane is in relation to a runway. Carter said that should not have had a serious effect on an experienced pilot's ability to navigate.

State police Sgt. A.J. Anderson said the plane hit the brush-covered mountain from the northeast after clipping the tops of trees. He said spot fires from the crash burned all night, and the wreckage still smoldered at daybreak.

"The fire was very intense," he said.

The wreckage, which covered a 300-square-yard area, is in Shenandoah National Park which includes part of the Skyline Drive atop the Blue Ridge Mountains, said state police Lt. G.M. Morris. The crash site is about five miles east of the airport.

John Presburg, a Henson vice president, said it was the airline's first crash involving injury or loss of life since it began operating in 1931. Henson is a wholly owned subsidiary of Piedmont Airlines.

Inquiry finds doctor guilty of publicizing drug agency

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Veterans Administration investigation has concluded that a VA physician accepted nearly $62,000 in fees and expenses for speeches, including some delivered on government time, from a drug company whose product he requested the agency buy.

VA officials declined Tuesday to say if it will take or has taken disciplinary action against the doctor.

It also declined to make public the name of the doctor, who is among 75 to 100 employees investigated by the VA inspector general's office following allegations they accepted gratuities from Smith Kline & French Laboratories, a Philadelphia pharmaceutical company.

Documents relating to his case and those of four other employees were obtained by The Associated Press under the Freedom of Information Act.

VA spokeswoman Donna St. John said she was unable to say whether disciplinary action had been taken or was planned against the doctor.

In a letter accompanying the documents, Renald P. Morani, deputy inspector general for the VA, said those five cases are the only portions of the investigation in which action has been completed.

No disciplinary action against the doctor was reflected in the investigation records, and Morani did not immediately return a reporter's telephone call.

St. John said she could not explain why the inspector general's office records did not indicate any action.

In the other cases, involving the acceptance of meals, drinks and theater tickets, one employee received an official reprimand and two others received letters of warning, the internal documents revealed. A fifth employee no longer works for the VA, according to Morani.

St. John said investigations into other VA employees are continuing.

In each of the cases in which documents were released, the VA blacked out names of the employees and other identifying detail, including the VA hospitals where they worked.

The reports said the VA had obtained records from Smith Kline & French, including a list of the doctor's speaking engagements.

Smith Kline spokesman Jeremy Heymsfeld said the company had no comment.

Another company spokesman, Alan Wachter, said last month that his company has cooperated with the VA investigation for more than a year.

According to the inspector general's investigative report, the doctor made 83 speaking engagements from 1982 through 1984, for which he received $43,200 in fees and $18,797 in expenses. Twice he received fees and expenses of more than $3,000 for a single speech.

The investigative report said the doctor did not serve on the VA medical center formulary committee, which determines what drugs are bought, but that he attended several meetings as a "guest."

It said that at an April 16, 1984, meeting, he requested that Darbid, a Smith Kline drug for the treatment of ulcers, be included on the committee's list of drugs to buy. The committee approved the drug for listing, the report said.

A list of the engagements showed that on at least six occasions, the doctor's speech was made on VA time. The documents did not reveal who the speeches were delivered to, but said he appeared before other organizations as part of Smith Kline's speakers' bureau.

The doctor, also a university medical professor, worked for the VA on a seven-eighths time basis. Because he was not full time, the inspector general's report said, he had not been required to report his outside income to the VA.

The doctor told investigators any appearances during VA working hours were "the result of clerical error or oversight."

Young policymakers take office in China

By The Associated Press

PEKING — In a triumph for top leader Deng Xiaoping, the Communist Party promoted five younger policymakers to the ruling Politburo on Tuesday, replacing old revolutionaries with a new generation to guide China's reform.

But the scale of the transition was less than diplomats and Chinese sources forecast, and there was no replacement in the Politburo Standing Committee for Marshal Ye Jianying, who retired last week.

The Standing Committee is China's top policymaking body.

Deng, 81, retained his own post of chairman of the Central Advisory Commission. No one had expected him to step down.

All of the new Politburo appointees are Deng proteges and have advanced rapidly in the party apparatus since he emerged as senior leader in 1978.

The changes were made during a full meeting of the party Central Committee in Peking. It capped a series of three meetings which Deng used to bring in newcomers to continue market-oriented reforms he launched seven years ago.

State-run television showed the 210 Central Committee members shoving ballots into a red box in the Great Hall Of The People.

Although 10 party elders voluntarily resigned from the Politburo Sept. 16, only six seats were filled, one by a previous alternate, Vice Premier Yao Yilin, 68.

The Politburo Standing Committee, focused around Deng, now has five members instead of six.

The Central Committee Secretariat was altered from nine seats and two alternates to 11 full members.

Reagan promotes tax system overhaul

By The Associated Press

President talks of $600 per household

ATHENS, Tenn. — President Reagan unveiled a new study of his tax overhaul plan Tuesday, saying it showed each American household would eventually gain about $600 a year if his proposal is implemented.

Calling his struggle with a reluctant Congress over the tax bill "a kind of drama, with good guys and bad guys and even a damsel in distress," Reagan asked members of his audience, "Do you find our present (tax) system utterly disgusting and demoralizing?"

"Yes," the crowd replied.

"Well, I'm with you," said the president.

"The heroes are the citizens across this country who are asking for tax justice," Reagan said. "The villains are the special interests — the 'I got mine' gang. And the damsel in distress?

"A lass named Endless Economic Growth who's tied to the tracks and struggling to break free."

Referring to the study in his speech at the McMinn County Courthouse in Athens, Reagan said his economic advisers told him the growth inspired by the tax changes "should create the equivalent of almost four million new full-time jobs. They found that the personal economic gain for each household will be about $600 a year."

"The truth is our plan will ultimately bring a heck of a lot more money into the government," Reagan said. "One reason is that every time we cut tax rates in one area — say on capital gains — we bring in more capital gains tax revenues because the cut in rates stimulates economic activity."

As Reagan began a two-stop visit to eastern Tennessee on his weekly trip out of Washington to campaign for the tax bill, the White House issued a rosy new assessment of the plan drawn up by the President's Council of Economic Advisers. It predicted the proposed overhaul of the federal income tax system ultimately could boost the gross national product by as much as 3.2 percent.

The council, whose forecasts of economic growth during the Reagan administration have proved overoptimistic in the past, acknowledged that its tax study projections "should be viewed as plausible outcomes rather than as precise predictions."

Nonetheless, according to a summary released by the White House, the administration economists said Reagan's tax plan "will increase incentives to work and invest while reducing preferential treatment for certain forms of consumption and reducing incentives to cheat on taxes."

Congressional leaders have expressed skepticism that both the House and Senate can agree on a tax bill before the end of the year, but Reagan has sought to keep the issue alive by pressing his campaign across the country.

Dave "Smitty" Smith, who says he was hired as the dishwasher, but is actually Barb Smith's husband, relaxes in the front window of the cafe on the last day.

The final day at the Downtown Cafe

Barb Smith, owner and operator of the Downtown Cafe, is presented with a goat as a closing-business gift from her regular customers.

Friday morning didn't look any different than any other morning at the Downtown Cafe, other than everyone was bundled up a little tighter than usual and drank an excess of coffee to warm themselves on the brisk 60-degree morning.

However, this particular morning was different. Sept. 20, 1985. The beginning of the last day for the quaint little cafe at 218 Poyntz Ave.

After eight years of operation, Barb Smith has closed the restaurant to make room for the Manhattan Regional Shopping Mall, to be built by Forest City Rental Properties, Inc., of Cleveland, and JCP Realty Inc., a subsidiary of the J.C. Penney Co. Inc.

Gone will be the early morning coffee groups that gathered for an hour or so before heading off to work, and the easy-rolling table talk of rattlesnakes, truck driving and trenching equipment.

But this morning most of the regulars hung around a little longer than usual, discussing where they would meet on future mornings and how most other places were a little too fancy for "us workers."

However, the mood wasn't all sad.

Barb, the owner and operator of the cafe, and her husband Dave — who likes to be called "Smitty" and claims he was hired as the dishwasher — were looking forward to this day.

"I'm tired," Barb said. "He (Smitty) says I've worked long enough, and that I'm not going to work anymore."

However, closing the cafe meant an end to spending each day in the compay of "the regulars."

"Around here there are no strangers," Barb said. "We've enjoyed everybody. We really have, and it was a good living.

"The kind of people that patronize this place is the easy going...kind'a like live-and-let-live people," Smitty said.

"We have our guys come in here and they know they can sit as long as they want to and enjoy themselves," Barb said. "If they've been sitting a while and we get busy they leave, to give other people a chance to sit. We are just one big happy family."

As is the case in most families, small events in the cafe have evolved into tradition. Take, for instance, "The Shelton Plate."

"One of the guys that works for Manhattan Trenching, named Don Shelton, would come in and say, 'Now don't forget, I'm awful hungry,' and we tried to feed him enough so he wouldn't be hungry," she said.

The restaurant business began about 28 years ago for Barb, when she switched from waiting on tables to cooking.

"I started pretty young waiting tables," Barb said. "Then (at) the place I was working at the cook got sick and had to retire, and the boss put me in the kitchen."

Barb spent the next 20 years as a cook for several different Manhattan cafes, all now closed.

"I went to work for 'Mom' Murial. I cooked for her down on South Fourth Street, which is now a furniture place," she said. "I worked at the M&R Cafe that used to be down on South Fourth, and I worked at Jensen's Cafe."

The last year Jensen's Cafe was open the Smith's leased it, and then got out of the business for a few years.

"One day the old barber that was in here, Pete Peterson, who had this building for 54 years, hollered at us and said this area needed a restaurant and the only people he would sell it to was us," Barb said.

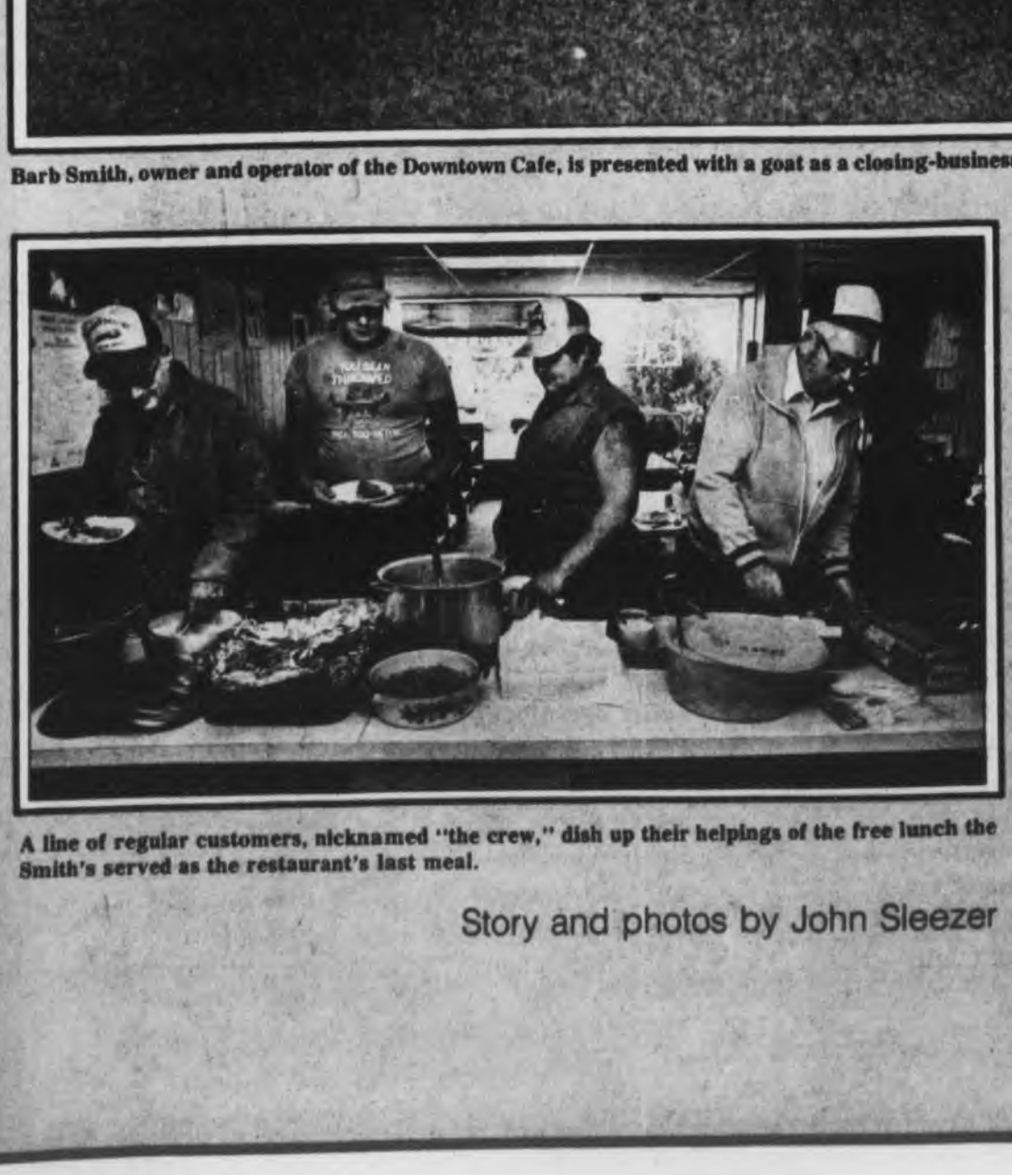
The Smith's have watched restaurants like theirs disappearing from downtown Manhattan, only to be replaced by fast-food restaurants.

"Places like ours are just about all gone, because you have your fast-foods businesses," Barb said. "And the only place left now is McDougal's (Restaurant 220 N. Third St.), but they go out too" because of the new mall.

"You don't make the money you used to in a place like this. I know we haven't in the eight years we've been here," she said. "We haven't made what we did across the street 10 years ago" (at Jensen's Cafe).

"Prices go up, jobs are getting scarce and people can't afford to take their families out like they used to."

The new mall has drawn mixed feelings from business and property owners affected by the project, but Barb thinks the mall is a good idea.



"I am really for it (the mall). I really think a downtown mall is going to be great," she said. "I've lived here all my life and 12 years ago this area down here was packed all day and all night. There used to be several taverns and three restaurants, and they were always busy. Each year it's just been dropping.

"I think a mall for Manhattan is going to be great. You've got all these people surround-

The cafe's waitress, Bert Folsom, taste-tests the free lunch in the kitchen before Barb dishes it up to the waiting customers.

A line of regular customers, nicknamed "the crew," dish up their helpings of the free lunch the Smith's served as the restaurant's last meal.

Ken Parker, a Manhattan farmer in Ashland Bottoms, gives Barb a hug and a few words of thanks before he leaves the cafe after lunch.

At the end of the day, Barb sits at her reserved table and relaxes.

Special course focuses on handicapped

By MARK McDERMET
Collegian Reporter

Imagine a classroom environment which emphasizes social relations and sharing emotions, invites special visitors each week and is taught by a professor called "Doc."

The course is Theatre for Special Populations and "Doc" is Norman Fedder, professor of speech. Visitors from a trainable mentally handicapped class taught by Debra Engstrom, Manhattan Middle School special education teacher, help make the class what it is.

Fedder's goal for both the students and children is to develop greater self-expression and social relations. A second goal is to have each student lead a class session with the children.

"If I'm really effective I'm going to be out of business in a few weeks," Fedder said. "That's the ultimate in the teaching process, when they can do it on their own."

Another purpose of Theatre for Special Populations is to learn the uses of drama in the development of creative imagination among special populations such as the handicapped and the senior adult, Fedder said. The class meets every Tuesday and Thursday at 9:30 a.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"The purpose is not for performing or entertaining, but for their own personal development," Fedder said.

The course is not geared toward theater majors. The program attracts students from a wide variety of curriculums including speech pathology, education, home economics, psychology, social science and pre-nursing.

"Many of the students enrolled are in majors where they'll end up working with these types of children. It gives the students a chance to experience something in life they may never get a chance to experience," Engstrom said.

The first meeting began with a "getting to know you" game which also represented the theme for the class. The children got things started by telling group members their name and what they liked the most. Group members prompted each child by asking these questions in unison aloud.

"I think it's very important that they have an opportunity to interact with the students," Engstrom said.

Fedder is attentive to the students and children and everyone participates.

Some might say Fedder displays the qualities of a good stand-up comic, however he does incorporate his own type of enthusiasm. His baldness is sometimes a focal point of his act.

Once in the session, while playing a game, Fedder inadvertently overlooked a child. A student sitting nearby immediately brought it to his attention.

"With every hair I lose it means I forget something, so let's make sure the rest of these hairs stay in place," Fedder said.

Fedder, in his sixth year of teaching the class, attributes his interest in drama as a help for developing people.

In 1978 he accepted an invitation to the Kansas Association of Retarded Citizens festival held at the University. Fedder was moved by the creative capabilities of the handicapped involved in the festival.

"I wasn't aware of how talented mentally retarded people can be and how wonderful it would be to work with them," Fedder said.

When the members of the Leisure Studies program at the University decided there was a need for a creative drama class, Fedder said he saw it as an opportunity to make a good thing work.

"Working with them makes it possible for my students to work for other disadvantaged groups," Fedder said.

"It helps with interacting with the special population," said Paula Reichenberger, junior in speech pathology.

While Tuesdays are set aside for the children, Thursday's class allows the students to give interpretations of the drama activities they each experienced with the children. Many students said the children expressed apprehension and nervousness at first, but later found themselves more at ease.

"In some ways they are less inhibited then we are because they are less self-conscious. But in general we share this world together. They share the same feelings we do," Fedder said.

City hears ordinance to support purchases

By The Collegian Staff

A special meeting of the Manhattan City Commission was held Tuesday afternoon to hear the first reading of an ordinance authorizing the acquisition of properties by eminent domain for construction of the Manhattan Regional Shopping Mall.

Eminent domain is the right of a governing body to take property for public use without the property owner's consent.

Ruth Schrum, who owns property in the redevelopment area, asked for answers to questions regarding the time limit for the city to obtain properties and complete construction of the proposed mall; what would happen if the time limits were not met and was there a list available to find the prices actually paid for acquired property.

In response, Gary Stith, community development coordinator, said the contract with the Department of Housing and Urban Development called for acquisitions by Jan. 1, 1986 with the mall to be opened Aug. 6, 1987. HUD money, in the form of an Urban Development Action Grant totalling $9 million, is being used for site acquisition and land preparation. Stith also said if the time limits were not met, the city would have to renegotiate with HUD for amendments to the original contract.

"I'm not sure about the releasing of prices," Stith said.

City Attorney Bill Frost said the prices may be confidential, but he would look into the situation further.

Mayor Suzanne Lindamood cast the single vote opposing the move, saying she believed it was inappropriate to take the property by eminent domain.

Group to sponsor talk on resistance program

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan Alliance on Central America will sponsor the program "How our neighbors do it — Pledging resistance in Salina and Hays," at 6:15 tonight at the American Baptist Campus Ministry, 1801 Anderson Ave. The program will follow a $2 per plate rice and beans dinner.

Gerry Gillespie, from the Salina Peace Coalition, and Tod McElroy, from the Western Kansas Task Force on Central America, will be guest speakers for the program.

MACA is a coalition of community churches and campus organizations that participates in a network of groups across the nation. In addition to sponsoring programs and rice and beans dinners, the groups participate in telephone and letter campaigns aimed at influencing legislators to change U.S. Central American policy.

MACA supports: a flat ban on U.S. aid to the Contras, rebels seeking to overthrow the Sandinista government in Nicaragua; demilitarization through the Contadora process; cuts in military aid to the army of El Salvador; refusal of military and economic aid to the government of Guatemala; decreasing U.S. military presence in Honduras; and providing sanctuary to refugees fleeing political repression in Central America.

Being only woman on team offers challenge for Cronan

By JAY KNORR
Collegian Reporter

When Kelley Cronan tried out for the K-State Soccer Club this fall, she had no idea that she would end up playing on the men's team.

Cronan, a 17-year-old freshman from Overland Park, said it was by accident that she even tried out for the men's team. Her first intentions were to play on the newly formed women's team at K-State.

"This was totally unintentional. I came out for a women's (soccer) team that I read about on a flyer at Varney's (Bookstore)," Cronan said. "My sister plays at KU (University of Kansas) on the women's team and she wanted me to play here so we could play against each other. So the first thing I saw or heard about soccer, I went out for it.

"I called Clay (Ross), the coach, to ask when practice was and he said that it would be really interesting seeing me out there but I wasn't sure what he meant. When I got there, there were these oversized soccer players and I didn't see any other girls. But Clay asked me to stick around and try it anyway, so I did."

Ross said he was somewhat skeptical when he saw Cronan at the first tryout.

"I was a little curious really, about whether she was going to work out or not," he said. "I saw in the first day of drills that she was a little slower than the guys, but she had the skills and she had the heart."

At the first day of tryouts, some of the men were negative toward her. That soon changed.

"When I came back the second day some of them softened up on me and weren't so cold," she said. "The only time they give me a hard time is off of the field and it is always just jokingly."

Playing center fullback, a defensive position, Cronan gets her share of contact. She said that at first the men on the team were timid about making contact with her on the field and would appologize when they did. She said she doesn't want any special treatment from them and doesn't expect it.

"There is more contact in the games than there is at the practices because we don't really scrimmage that much," Cronan said. "But in games it doesn't effect the other team at all and it doesn't bother me because I don't want to be treated like a 'woman' on the field."

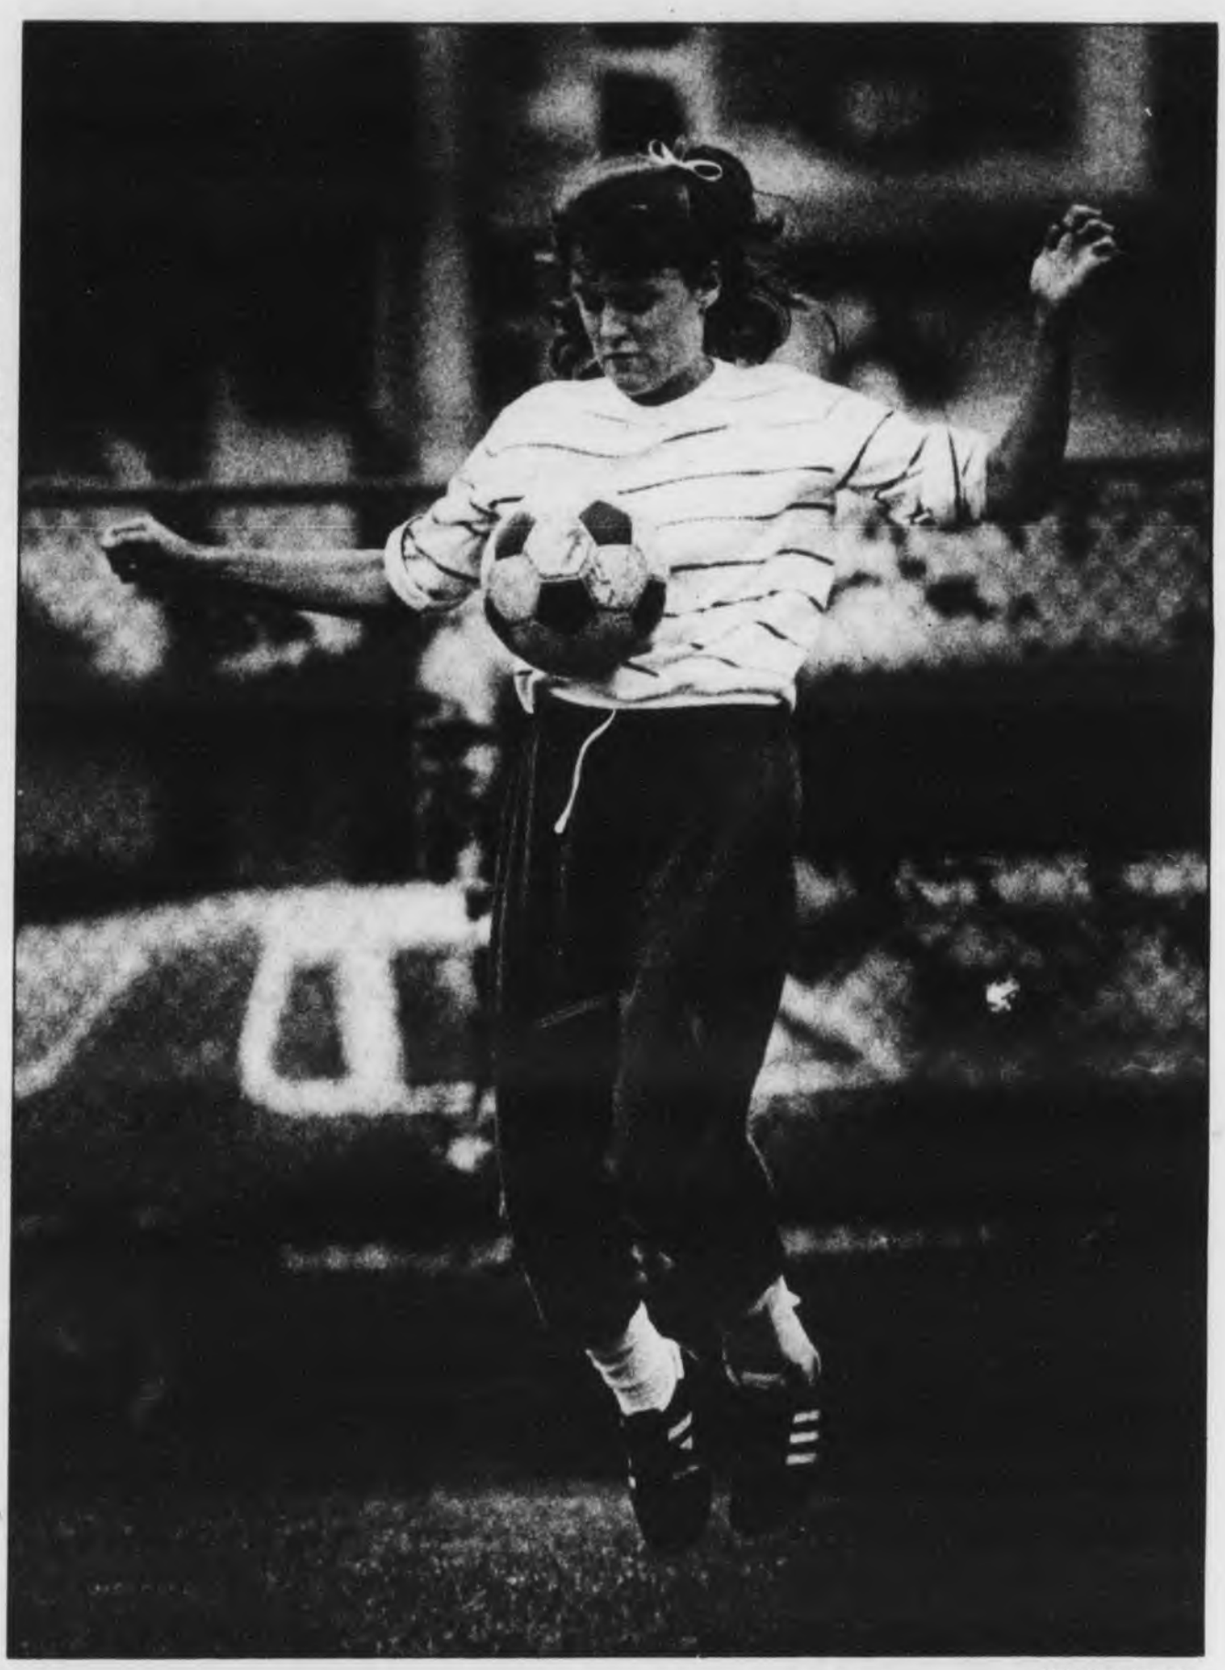
Cronan started playing soccer when she was in the seventh grade. She has played on coed indoor teams but never on an all-male team. When this opportunity came along, she couldn't pass it up.

After she had made the men's team, the women's coach approached her at practice.

"She said that it was up to me whether I wanted to play with the guys or the girls and I chose the guys," Cronan said.

"I'm the kind of person that can't turn down a challenge. I've learned a lot more playing with guys because there is always something more that I can learn. I'll never, as long as I play on this team, be at the top. I'll always be learning something new from the coach and from the players."

Cronan started in the "B" team's first two games of the season. She played all of the first game and half of the second game until she developed fluid on her left ankle. The injury was caused by the constant pressure of cutting from side to side.



Her doctor gave her a splint so she could work out lightly for seven to 10 days. She was told to avoid heavy play for about 15 days.

Cronan's mother, who had been concerned with Kelley getting injured playing soccer, reacted to her making the team in an unexpected way.

"My mom didn't used to support me during soccer but she told me not to get hurt," she said. "I was really surprised to see her at the first two games."

"Kelley's mom told me that she was worried that Kelley was going to Fall offers variety for sports fans

DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Fall is here.

Although I'll readily admit that summer has always been my favorite season of the year, fall has consistently been a close second.

What other season gives the sports fan such a variety of activities to watch — both in person and on television? None that I can think of.

Fall gives us the end of the baseball season, the start of football at all levels and the opening of training camps for professional basketball, hockey and soccer teams.

The World Series has always been my favorite sporting event. As a baseball junkie, the "Fall Classic" brings a perfect end to a year of professional baseball.

Where else in professional sports do two teams, that have played a rigorous 162-game regular season schedule, play a best-of-seven series in front of millions of fans viewing on television in virtually every nation in the civilized world?

What true sports fan can forget catcher Carlton Fisk's dramatic home run in the sixth game of the 1975 World Series to win the game for the Boston Red Sox and send the series, which was won by Pete Rose and the Cincinnati Reds, to a seventh and deciding game?

As a coach and player, baseball is my favorite sport and is the main reason summer is my favorite season. But football is yet another reason I look forward to fall.

I love high school football. As long as I can remember, I have made a Friday night ritual out of attending a high school contest — regardless of whether or not my high school was a participant.

Excited players, screaming cheerleaders and fanatic parents are just a few of the reasons I love high school games. The true emotion shown by both participants and fans at these games is unmatched anywhere in sports today. As an emotional person, I love being a part of the fun.

College football and Saturdays in the fall go together. Although we haven't been blessed with too many outstanding teams at K-State over the past several years, I can't help but love the feeling I get when I wake up on a cool, crisp autumn morning knowing there is a game on tap for that afternoon.

With Sunday comes professional football — and lots of it. Unless you are fortunate enough to live in a city with a pro team, you probably are like several million of us that are glued to the "tube" every Sunday afternoon for a minimum of five hours.

The opening of training camps for basketball, hockey and soccer tell us that yet another winter is just around the corner.

But before we shift gears and tackle the adventures that winter brings, let's stop and enjoy the fall. Take in a high school football game Friday night. Come out to the stadium and watch the 'Cats on Saturday. Sit in front of the television with your friends and watch a pro football game on Sunday. Get ready for baseball's playoffs and World Series.

Fall is here — enjoy.

Niekro fails again to win No. 300

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Phil Niekro failed in his third bid Tuesday night to win his 300th game, and for the second time in a week, the home-run bats of the Detroit Tigers did him in.

Niekro, trying to become the 18th pitcher in major-league history to reach the 300-mark, left the New York Yankees' game in the fifth inning trailing 8-0 after Lance Parrish lined a two-run homer into the left-field seats. Detroit went on to win the game 9-1.

Earlier, John Grubb had been Niekro's chief nemesis, hitting a three-run homer in the second and then delivering a two-run double in the third.

The rough outing came six days after Niekro took a 5-2 loss in Detroit after surrendering homers to Kirk Gibson, Darrell Evans and Larry Herndon. That defeat left Niekro with an 0-3 mark against the Tigers this season and prompted his remark, "It looks like they've got my number."

Niekro won his 299th game on Sept. 8 against Oakland, but lost his first try at No. 300 on Sept. 13 when three unearned runs against Toronto saddled him with a 3-2 loss.

He took the mound to a standing ovation at Yankee Stadium.

get smashed," Ross said. "I said that she probably would get smashed, but the decision to play was 100 percent Kelley's."

Ross said there is the possibility that Cronan may get some playing time on the "A" team.

"She is dedicated, she's been keeping up and she's been working hard in practice," he said. "She's a great asset to the team and she's competitive."

Cronan said the women on her residence hall floor in Ford Hall have been supportive of her. After she had made the team, they made her a congratulatory poster and before the first game a banner was hung in the hall to wish her good luck.

For now Cronan has to settle for light workouts until her ankle heals. But when it does heal, she'll be on the field causing as many problems as she can for opposing players — male or female.

Commissioner requests drug testing of players

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth on Tuesday asked major league players to voluntarily submit to drug testing. The players' union responded that the action may be unlawful and indicated it would tell players to ignore the request.

At a news conference, Ueberroth said he had designated a representative from each club's management to deliver letters to every major league player. The letters ask players to submit to urinalyses three times a year beginning in 1986. Ueberroth said he had asked for responses to the letters by Friday.

At the same time, Ueberroth said he had decided to postpone any punitive action against seven players who testified in the federal drug trial in Pittsburgh of Philadelphia caterer Curtis Strong.

"Baseball is on trial," Ueberroth said, "and it has suffered public humiliation in the last few weeks, not to anybody's surprise, least of all to mine. I've wrestled with what to do as commissioner."

Ueberroth said the testing program would be similar to one already being used to test minor leaguers and non-playing major league personnel. Tests would be done without notice, but would always be conducted in the player's clubhouse. They would be conducted by medical people, and he said there would be no punitive steps taken against players who tested positive.

USC wants to cancel OU games

By The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — A request to allow the University of Southern California to withdraw from a football series with the University of Oklahoma in 1987 and 1988 is on the backburner while Oklahoma officials look at possible replacements for the Trojans.

Oklahoma President Frank Horton told members of the board of regents that he would check to see what teams might be available to fill out the schedule and would report back to the board.

Horton had recommended Monday that the school comply with Southern Cal's request to withdraw from the proposed home-and-home series so they could play Cal-Berkeley in 1987. Oklahoma and Southern Cal have a verbal agreement.

Southern Cal has played Cal-Berkeley every year but one since 1915, but scheduling problems arose with the admittance of Arizona and Arizona State into the Pacific-10 Conference.

New student support group to help in recruiting athletes

By MIKE McQUEEN
Collegian Reporter

A new method of recruiting athletes for the University was started this fall in hope of making the prospects feel more at home.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is trying to encourage the student body to get involved in recruiting. Athletic Director Larry Travis, Assistant Athletic Director Steve Miller and Kenny Mossman, administrative assistant of athletics, have formed a student support group to meet this need.

Miller said he believes the program could be beneficial to the recruiting process at K-State. According to Miller, students could help in a couple of ways.

First, students could contact high school athletes in their hometowns and tell them about the University. Second, the students could take active roles in showing recruits around campus.

In most cases, the athlete is shown around campus by a coach or some other official. Miller said if students were to get involved in this area, the athlete might get a better perception of the campus.

The group was begun, in part, because of concern for a lack of contact between the athletic program and the student body.

"We need students to talk up K-State," Miller said. "The students are the best natural resources we have."

The support group met for the first time last spring and has had two meetings this semester. People in the support group program, which has not been officially named, have contacted student body leaders on campus and requested their involvement. Twenty-six people attended the last meeting, on Sept. 12.

Mossman said the program is a good way to "keep a finger on the pulse of the student body." By working together, the athletic department and students can communicate and understand each other easier.

Greg Pestinger, senior in marketing and a member of the interfraternity council board of directors, has been active in the new group.

"I think this type of program will be effective," Pestinger said. "It may not help us to win football games but it can increase the spirit among the student body."

Because virtually no recruiting is done in the fall, the support group has yet to become active in the recruiting process. The group, however, has been active in raising funds for the 14 non-revenue sports on campus. The non-revenue sports include all sports except football and men's basketball.

One fund-raising activity so far has been sponsoring a raffle for a 1968 Ford Thunderbird. Tickets can be obtained through the athletic department and a donation to the group is requested. The winner will be announced Nov. 16 during halftime of the K-State-Iowa State football game.

Grain

mospheric air to set up an explosion, he said.

Over the last five years, from 1980-1984, in the United States there have been 112 explosions in which 38 people have been killed and 185 injured. The estimated damage was $77.4 million, Schoeff said.

"Sometimes if a fire breaks out in an elevator, the firemen have to be careful fighting it," Lee said. "If they happen to spray water on the dust, they have put the dust into suspension with the air. The fire's flame then sets off an explosion far worse than what the fire actually was." he said.

The real trouble spot for setting off the first explosion is the leg of the elevator, a structure ususally made up of concrete containing a conveyor belt which moves the grain to the bins. Transfer points between the belts are places where large amount of dust accumulate, setting up a prime situation for an explosion, Lee said.

If an explosion can be contained in the leg or vented to the outside of the structure, the damage will be lessened, he said.

In older structures, the leg is completely surrounded by storage bins, so it is hard to divert the pressure, he said.

"The trouble with an explosion is that it is not just one big burst of energy. It is a series which starts off small and gets increasingly worse until the pressure finally blows the bins apart," Lee said.

"A grain dust explosion is different than a dymamite explosion. Dust explosions are rapid burning and do not produce the shock wave bangs that other explosive materials have," he said.

New structures have an advantage over the existing ones, as they can be designed to have the leg structure on the outside release the pressure, he said.

They also can design a venting system into the elevator. The system allows a series of vents to be blown out by the pressure, rather than the whole structure being exploded, Lee said.

Water or oil can also be used to hold the dust down and prevent explosions.

The big facilities know about the problems and do try to minimize them. However, the more grain they handle, the larger volume of dust they will have, Lee said.

"Kansas has been very fortunate. We have not had a serious explosion for a very long time and in the past 25 years there have been only one or two fatalities," Schoeff said.

"There has not been an explosion in Kansas this year, and we do not have one on record since 1980," he said.

"I feel this is partially due to the efforts of our department to educate the operators on how dangerous the dust can be," he said.

"We have developed a notebook to help operators and owners prepare for an explosion and the effects the explosion will have on their operation," he said.

"Education is the key to protecting lives, jobs, property and profit of all those involved," Schoeff said.

ing us that drive to Topeka, Kansas City, Wichita and Salina to do their shopping."

To close out the last day, the Smiths provided a free lunch to everyone who showed up. Meatloaf, beef and noodles, mashed potatoes and gravy, salad, corn, broccoli and chocolate cake made up the menu.

The highlight of the lunch came when the regulars at the cafe, known as the "crew," gave Barb and Smitty a goat in the middle of the restaurant. "They (the regulars) would always ask Smitty what he would do if you ever quit the restaurant," Barb said, "And he would say, 'I'm going to raise goats and have a goat farm.'

"I think we've had a pretty good time," Barb said. "I'll miss it, naturally. Not the work, but the people."

staff members. He was believed to be trapped with a class of medical residents that was in session when the first quake destroyed the 12-story building on Thursday.

A team member said there was voice contact with Lozano and others trapped in the ruins, hopes of reaching them were strong, and "everything is going well."

Famous tenor Placido Domingo, looking haggard, continued his vigil at the remains of a building in which four of his relatives had lived.

To reporters who asked whether he was worried about damage to his voice from dust and germs in the air, Domingo replied: "I don't think about the voice. It's the last thing."

There were few reports of looting or price gouging immediately after the quake, but they are becoming more frequent.

Housing plan assists commuting students

By The Collegian Staff

Officials in the Department of Housing believe commuting to campus for evening classes is stressful.

In an effort to alleviate some of that stress, they have developed a program titled "After Hours Housing."

Robert Felde, assistant director of housing, said the time was right to begin such a program.

"The after hours housing concept came about for two reasons: One realistic reason was because we have the space available at the present time (in residence halls) due to declining University enrollment. And two, we felt that it was an opportune time to start serving the nontraditional residential students," Felde said.

Last year, the department had a similar program on a smaller scale. If an individual called the department looking for a place to stay, accommodations were usually found in one of the residence halls. The program this fall is the first time an organized effort has been made to provide rooms. The service is available to all individuals on official academic assignment, Felde said.

"We really like the program. We think that the people in the dorms are really great," said Debbie Kingsley, graduate in adult and occupational education. "Everyone has been very helpful. We used to spend about $35 per week on motels and we travel to Manhattan from Hays every Monday for class. When you add that up, it gets expensive."

"We have about 20 to 25 spaces available, but we could accommodate more than this, if needed. We have had about 20 people take advantage of the program so far," Felde said.

Men are housed in Haymaker Hall and women in Ford Hall. The rates are $11 per night for a double occupancy room and $12 per night for a single occupancy room. The cost of meals is not included, but guests may eat at Derby Food Center.

Putnam residents control environment

Program promotes community, respect

By SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Reporter

Students in Putman Hall live in a RESPECT-full environment.

RESPECT is the acronymn for Residents Encouraging: Study, Peaceful Environments and Community Thinking, a program which began this fall. Its two main goals are to provide a quiet atmosphere in which people can sleep and study in their rooms and to develop a community, said Deb Hamilton Stafford, hall director.

So far the hall has grown from 66 residents at the beginning of the semester to 92. Only one person has transferred.

The program was developed after administrators from the Department of Housing sponsored discussions last spring with freshmen, sophomores, juniors, seniors, transfer students and student leaders about the need for such a program, said Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing.

Students were contacted by hall directors, staff and members of the hall governing boards and asked to meet in discussion groups.

"We heard that issue of 'quiet' time and time again," Proite said.

She said students wouldn't mind asking people to be quiet, but they "didn't feel comfortable doing that with the given restrictions in the hall." Students also said they wanted more responsibility.

It became apparent Putnam was the best hall to use because it was small and empty. A community approach of respect and responsibility would be easier to enforce in a small hall, Proite said.

After applying for placement in the residence hall, each student had to read and sign a contract. The stipulations include keeping the noise level low, preserving the facilities on each floor, helping with one non-social program and attending at least two academic or cultural programs each semester.

Now "quiet hours" are easier to enforce because students cooperate with each other and keep the noise level low when asked, Stafford said.

"They feel like they have the backing because we've all signed this contract together. (There's a) feeling that we have chosen this hall, and we all have at least that as a common goal," Stafford said.

In addition, administrators wanted to include the area of involvement because they were concerned about freshmen and transfer students moving into the hall and not interacting with other residents.

"We didn't want our new students to come here and get lost in their rooms and never be heard from again," Proite said.

Students make up their own programs or bring in guest speakers, Stafford said. Some students in preveterinary medicine invited a student to speak on how to apply to veterinary school, what kind of grades the school requires and how many times students should apply. Another student will present a dress-for-success program.

In addition, the hall has parties. At a Tourist party, everyone dressed as tourists and the older students took new students around campus. At the first of the year, Boyd Hall invited Putnam residents to a Welcome-to-the-Neighborhood party. Another time a campout planned by Putnam residents was rained out, so they pitched a tent in the basement and had a party.

"They're starting to do some of those impromptu things that you don't always see," Stafford said. "They're making an effort to go meet each other instead of hanging back."

Everything's gradually starting to come together, she said.

"People are really starting to coin the phrase 'respect,'" more in the sense of what the word means.

"There's a feeling of family and home," said Colin Hickey, junior in political science.

Organizers not upset with FarmAid's proceeds

By The Associated Press

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Singer Willie Nelson, who organized the giant FarmAid concert to benefit troubled farmers, says he's not disappointed that the extravaganza apparently raised far less money than hoped.

He said the concert's second objective — telling the farmer's story to the rest of the nation — was reached.

Nelson said the concert raised about $5 million from telephone pledges and about $4 million from corporate donations and ticket sales. He originally projected $50 million in FarmAid revenue.

The singer-songwriter also said he expected additional donations to flow into FarmAid in weeks and months ahead and that money would be raised through sales of a FarmAid album and other projects.

Tabulating Sunday's telephone pledges was not expected to be completed for up to a week, said Linda Lounsberry of Buddy Lee Attractions of Nashville, Tenn., the event's promoter.

The FarmAid money will be used for cash grants to needy farmers, legal aid, counseling and job training, a nationwide information hotline and a campaign to increase awareness of farm problems, Nelson said.

"You can spend it quick or spend it right," said Nelson, who will maintain control over the money. "So we're not going to rush into anything."

More than 70,000 people attended the concert Sunday by country, rock and blues stars. Along with the music, a controversial farm bill also grabbed center-stage, prompting the Illinois Farm Bureau president to criticize the concert as "a carefully orchestrated political event."

"Last night's concert was loaded with a political message the Farm Bureau totally rejects," John White said Monday. "The concert stage became a soapbox for a small group of entertainers pleading support for a poorly understood piece of legislation."

Nelson, singers Neil Young and David Allan Coe, actor Timothy Hutton and others used the concert to promote a farm bill sponsored by Sen. Thomas Harkin, D-Iowa, and backed by the American Agriculture Movement.

Nelson said he hoped FarmAid's television audience would pressure lawmakers to approve the measure. Young said it would boost farmers' incomes by 30 percent while lifting consumer prices by only 3 percent to 5 percent.

The Farm Bureau argues that Harkin's proposal would further dry up export markets for U.S. grain and force even more family farmers off the land.

Congress is embarked on what promises to be a long and contentious process of writing new farm policy to replace the law that expires Sept. 30.

Both bills are attempts to gradually ease crop price supports downward in an effort to make U.S. farm goods cheaper and more competitive on world markets.

The Harkin measure never came to a vote in committee and may be dead for the year.

Hurricane weakens in wind strength; still threatens coast

By The Associated Press

MANTEO, N.C. — Hurricane Gloria, one of the most powerful storms ever recorded in the open Atlantic, spared the Bahamas and headed for the East Coast on Wednesday as it spun across the sea with 135 mph winds.

Gloria was threatening the Carolinas, and a hurricane watch was posted from South Carolina to Virginia, including North Carolina's vulnerable barrier islands, where campers began evacuating.

Although the storm, which had packed 150 mph winds, weakened Wednesday night, emergency plans were drafted and residents were warned to keep track of Gloria in other coastal areas.

Before weakening, the 300-mile-wide hurricane had been ranked as a "borderline" Category 5 storm, capable of catastrophic damage. The last time a storm anywhere near the strength of Gloria hit the East Coast, it killed 600 people in New England in 1938.

"If it goes into the Carolinas, this could be a very terrible storm," said Neil Frank, director of the National Hurricane Center in Coral Gables, Fla.

Even if Gloria's winds weaken further before landfall, which could come by Friday at a site yet uncertain, it might attain such a fast forward speed that it could be just as dangerous because there would be less time to evacuate, Frank said.

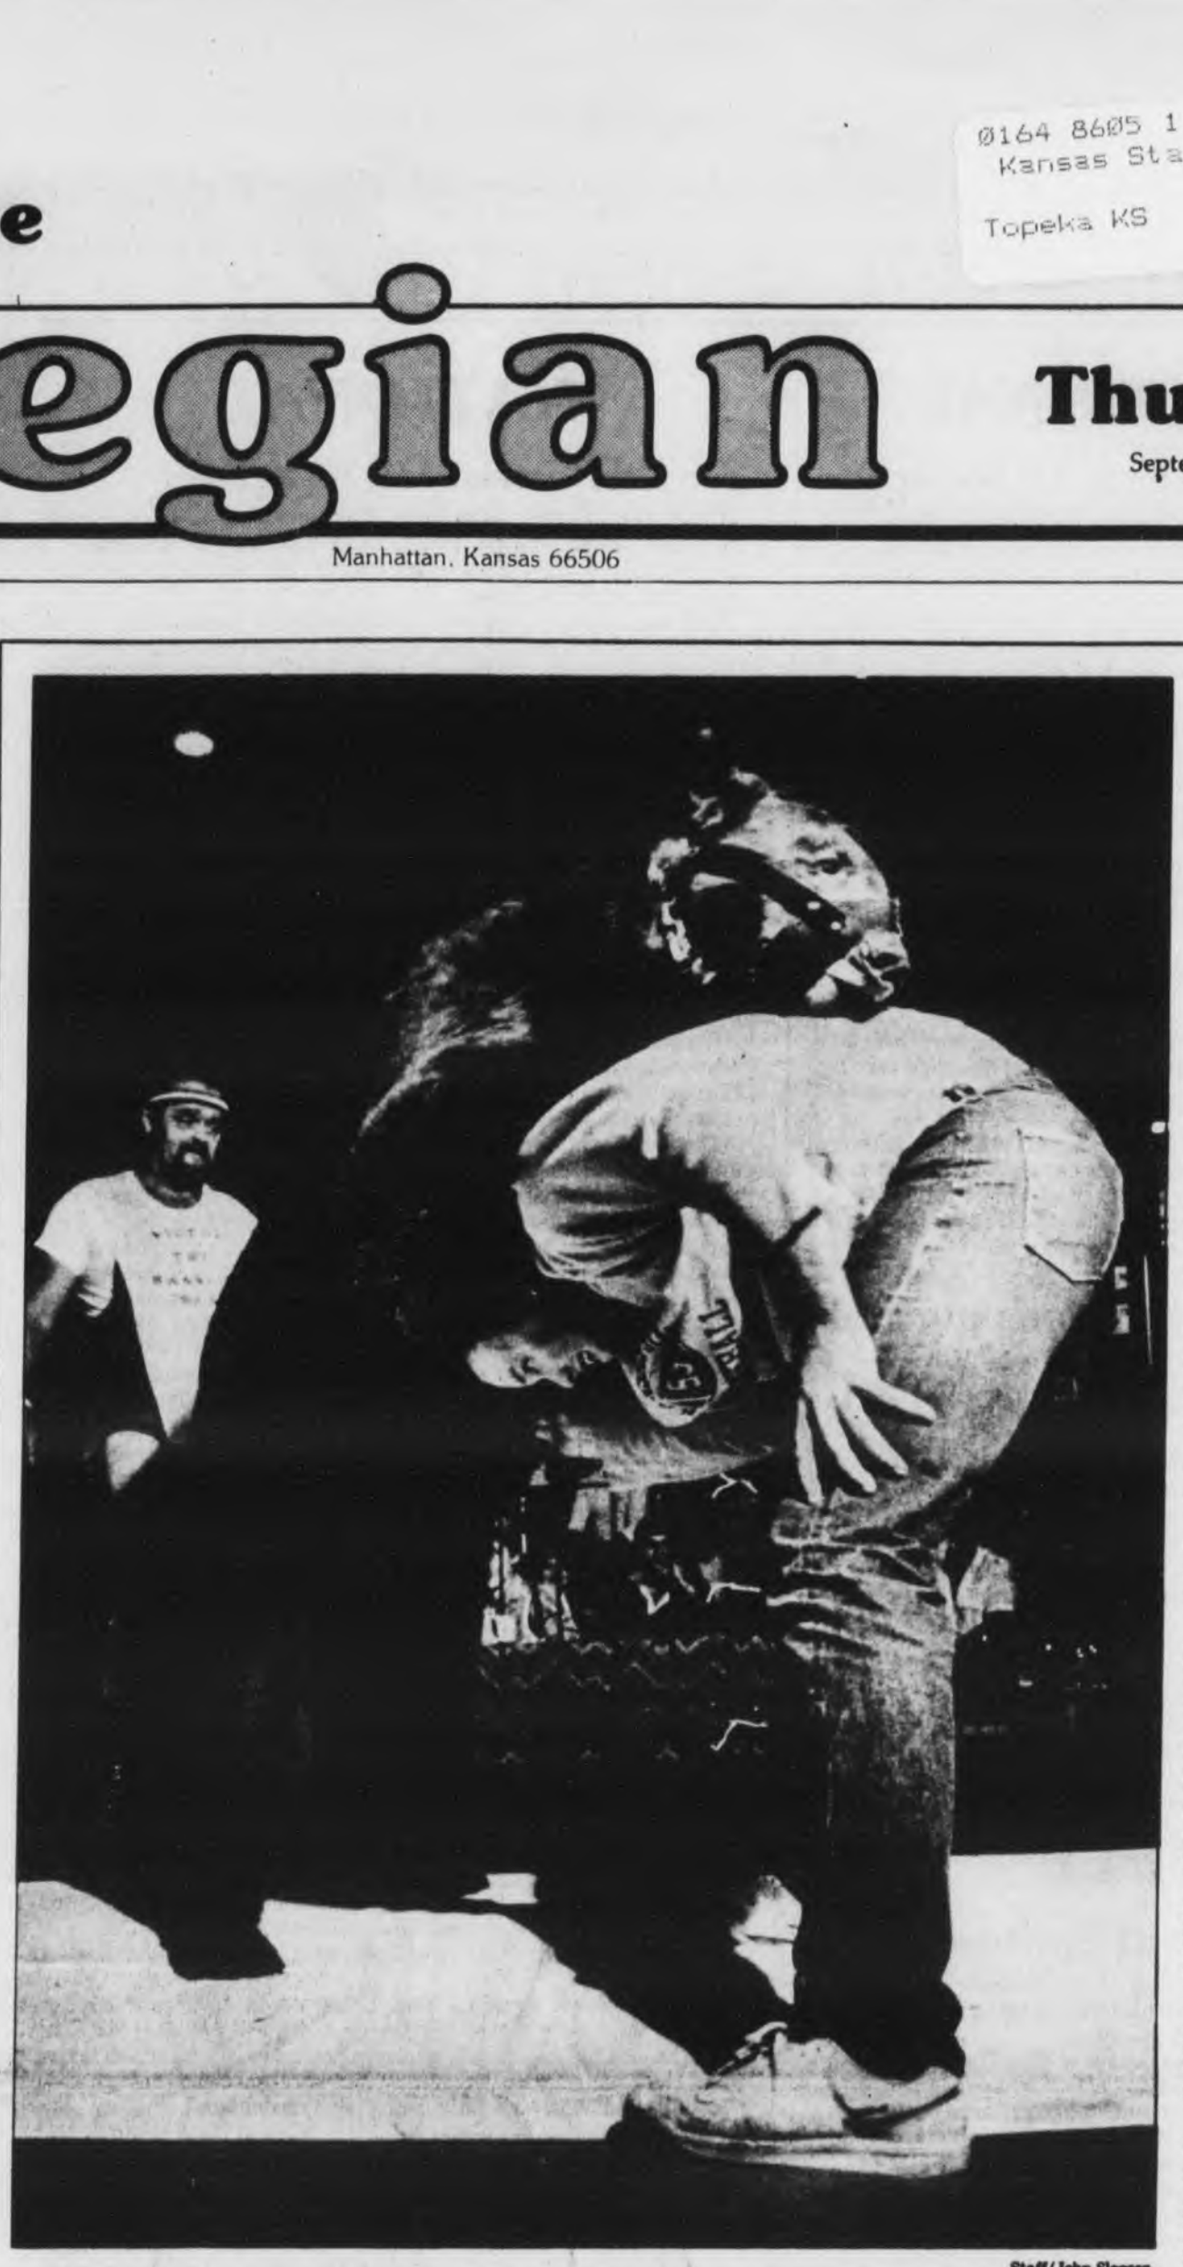
At 8 p.m. CDT, Gloria's eye was near latitude 28.0 north, longitude 74.2 west, or about 500 miles south-southeast of Cape Hatteras, N.C. It was moving northwest at 15 mph and was expected to turn northward gradually and increase its forward speed.

South African justice orders halt to assaults

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A judge on Wednesday barred police from assaulting jailed activists after a white government doctor testified that hundreds of her inmate patients were brutally assaulted.

Dr. Wendy Orr said prisoners she treated in Port Elizabeth had bruises and wounds showing they were "systematically assaulted and abused after their arrest."



Along with beatings, she said she also found cases where one detainee was forced to drink gasoline and another to eat some of his hair.

Judge J.P.G. Eksteen's order covered all prisoners held under emergency powers in the Port Elizabeth and Uitenhage regions of the eastern Cape Province. It was the first time a court issued a restraining order against police abuse of prisoners held under South Africa's 9-week-old state of emergency.

More than 3,500 activists have been arrested since the emergency was imposed July 21 in an attempt to quell nearly a year of anti-apartheid rioting that has left more than 700 dead, according to unofficial tallies.

In Port Elizabeth Supreme Court, 43 parents and relatives of detained activists joined Orr, the government doctor, in seeking an injunction restraining police from assaulting prisoners held under the emergency powers.

Eksteen found that 286 people had complained of assault on admission to prison from July 22 to Sept. 16; in 153 cases the injuries "could not have been inflicted lawfully."

Jerry Poole, senior in electrical engineering, tries to hold up Victor, a 710-pound Canadian brown bear, during Wednesday night's wrestling match at a local club. Victor defeated Poole in the three-minute match.

'Wrestler' confronts opponents

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Excitement seekers packed into the Sports Fan-Attic Thursday night to watch four men test their wrestling skills with a 710-pound bear named Victor.

Each man wrestled for a maximum of three minutes as bear and man attempted to pin each other. Victor wasn't pinned — but then he never has been pinned, Cory Allen, Victor's "mommy," said.

"Victor No. 2 has been rolled over half a dozen times, but has never been beaten," Allen said. "Victor No. 1 was pinned twice and retired." To consider the bear pinned, the bear must be on his back with all four legs cradled for one count, Allen said.

She said wrestling is combat between two men and 'rassling' is an exhibition of skill between a man and an animal.

Victor's appetite is satisfied with three meals a day, each meal consisting of five pounds of apples, two pounds of carrots, two stalks of celery, as much lettuce as he can eat and a loaf of bread, Allen said. Every five to six days Victor gets his protein in the form of smoked salmon, fish or chicken. He loves chicken, she said.

"When we drive past a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant Victor smacks the back wall of the bus," Allen said.

Allen said Victor is licensed by the United States Department of Agriculture and has been granted Kansas state clearance by a Kansas veterinarian.

The first round wrestlers agreed that they 'rassled' the bear "just so we can say we did it." Starting the night's event was Timothy E. Echevarria, followed by Jerry Poole, senior in electrical engineering; Jeff Weatherly, senior in geology; and Gregory Schmidt, senior in physical education.

Journalism department lauds 75th

By COLLEEN WILSON
Staff Writer

The Department of Journalism and Mass Communications will host a colloquium today featuring speakers, entertainment and more than 100 alumni guests in celebration of its 75th anniversary.

The theme for the anniversary colloquium is "The Responsibilities and Shortcomings of the Free Press," based on a statement about media in the future written by Milton S. Eisenhower, former University president and a 1924 K-State journalism graduate.

The department has been celebrating the anniversary since spring by hosting speakers and participating in University events, said Harry Marsh, head of the department.

Reg Murphy, publisher of the Baltimore Sun, will deliver the Milton S. Eisenhower Memorial Lecture in the Union Forum Hall, from 1:15 until 2:20 p.m. Murphy's topic will be "How Tomorrow's Media Can Adequately Inform the Public in an Increasingly Complicated World."

Murphy made national news in 1974 when he was kidnapped by the American Revolutionary Army and held for 49 hours — 4½ of which he spent tied up in the trunk of a car.

Murphy was selected to deliver the memorial lecture based on his background in journalism and because he was the publisher of Eisenhower's

K-State enrollment slides; KU hits record high

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

K-State enrollment dropped 3 percent below '84 totals, but enrollment at the University of Kansas increased this fall, according to 20th-day enrollment figures released by the two schools Wednesday.

University officials said 17,570 students enrolled for the fall of 1985 compared to 18,092 for the fall of 1984. K-State officials attributed the decrease in enrollment to the tapering off of the baby-boom generation and a depressed state economy.

The fall enrollment figure for new freshmen was 2,682 — off 94 students from last year's figure of 2,776. New student enrollment was down one student from 4,094 to 4,093.

While enrollment at K-State declined, KU enrollment hit a record high with a 1.4 percent increase from fall '84.

KU reported a record 20th-day total enrollment of 27,141 — an increase of 397 students over last year.

The total enrollment figure for KU includes students at the branch medical schools at Kansas City and Wichita, campus and off-campus students. The figure of 24,774 for campus and off-campus also set a record surpassing the 1980 record of 24,466.

KU's Chancellor Gene Budig said the increase in enrollment was a vote of confidence for KU.

"I regard our fall 1985 enrollment as both a vote of confidence and a challenge," Budig said. "It is essential that we continue to offer quality in our programs at KU. At the same time, however, we must redouble our efforts to call attention to the University of Kansas and academic advantages it offers."

The enrollment numbers for K-State were down in every college except the College of Business Administration, which increased 83 students, and the College of Education, with an increase of one student.

The College of Agriculture was down 143 students; the College of Architecture and Design, 21 students; the College of Arts and Sciences, 334; the College of Engineering, 41; the College of Home Economics, 40; the College of Veterinary Medicine, 8; and the Graduate School, 32 students.

Abortion debate inspires preachers' walk

By BECKY WILEY
Features Editor

This preacher wasn't wearing a suit. Attired in a jogging suit and tennis shoes, the Rev. Norman Stone, of Appleton, Wis., interrupted his 3,400-mile pilgrimage to speak out on abortion in All Faiths Chapel Wednesday night.

For eight months, Stone has been "Walking America for Life" because he is "carrying a burden for unborn children."

Traveling with his associate pastor, Jerry Horn of Appleton, Stone said he is trying to create an intellectual awareness about abortion, as well as offer answers and alternatives.

Stone outlined five arguments against abortion.

"Abortion is morally wrong," he said. "It denies the rights and privileges of a certain class of people, the unborn. Innocent children are victimized."

Ethical, social, spiritual and philosophical issues were also raised.

"Abortion encourages selfish and hedonistic practices. Do you know what hedonism is? It's the worship of human nature, the body and the mind," Stone said. "In other words, man has elevated himself into a diety — whatever pleases man is acceptable."

'You can't ignore this issue of abortion. The conscience of America is dying. There is no grief left, it seems.'
—The Rev. Norman Stone

He claimed the media is dealing with illusions and deceptions. News reports tell us of a mother arrested and charged with homicide because she left her unwanted child in a garbage can, while an abortion clinic down the street is taking hundreds of lives, he said.

"Aborting an unwanted child is no more of a tragedy than leaving someone who's not wanted," Stone said.

Stone said the surprising thing about his journey has been the noticeable lack of opposition, because pro-choice groups haven't taken advantage of the many media opportunities this walk has provided.

In Denver, he said, not one pro-choice activist would respond to his request to have a radio talk show debate on the abortion controversy.

"That's because when the arguments are whittled away, abortion becomes plainly an issue of life and death," he said.

Stone said he isn't mad at the women who obtain the abortions.

"I'm more upset with the people who say 'I don't care,'" he said. "You can't ignore this issue of abortion. The conscience of America is dying. There is no grief left, it seems."

Dole backs ag research legislation

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

A Senate Appropriations Bill totaling $400,000 for K-State's agricultural research program that could eventually enhance farm exports is being sponsored by Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan.

Mitch Rose, press assistant in Dole's office, said the bill has already gone through committee and has reached the Senate floor. However, Rose said he did not know when full Senate is expected to vote on the legislation.

Two research projects may be funded by the bill, Rose said. One is the international livestock program at K-State and the other is the stored grain insect management program.

Ethiopia donates funds to Mexico

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — The Red Cross in Ethiopia, where millions of people suffer from famine caused by years of drought, said Wednesday it was donating $5,000 to help earthquake victims in Mexico.

The agency said it was sending the money despite "the enormous needs prevailing in Ethiopia" because Mexico supported Ethiopia when Italy invaded the African nation in 1935, the same year the Ethiopian Red Cross was founded.

Total emergency relief aid to Ethiopia is expected to reach more than $1 billion by the end of the year.

Explosions kill 2 in Mozambique

MAPUTO, Mozambique — A series of thunderous explosions ripped through an army ammunition depot on the edge of Maputo on Wednesday, killing two children and wounding at least 20 people, the government news agency said.

The news agency AIM said the children died when their house collapsed from the force of the blasts. It said the wounded were admitted to hospitals.

The depot was located near the suburb of Malhazine, northwest of Maputo, AIM said. Several small blasts were heard first, and then the entire depot went up in a series of explosions that shattered windows throughout the capital.

It was not immediately known what caused the explosions. No one claimed responsibility, and the government did not blame saboteurs. But Wednesday was Armed Forces Day in this former Portuguese colony, and anti-Marxist Mozambique National Resistance rebels have been threatening Maputo for almost a year.

Mexican rescue operations proceed

MEXICO CITY — Rescuers dug toward signs of life Wednesday and President Miguel de la Madrid began a review of city building codes. He said demolition would proceed cautiously to avoid endangering buried survivors.

Mayor Ramon Aguirre's office raised its estimate of the death toll in Mexico City from the two great earthquakes last Thursday and Friday to 3,500. National government officials have said the total could go to 5,000, and that about 100 people were killed outside the capital.

About 1,500 people were believed trapped in the wreckage, some perhaps still alive. Aguirre's office said 11,700 people were injured, of whom 1,700 remained hospitalized.

De la Madrid started the review of the building codes at a meeting with city officials Wednesday. It will include land use, building heights, allowable population density and construction standards.

Rescue teams from France, Switzerland, West Germany, the United States and other countries joined Mexican crews Wednesday in another day of digging and sifting through the heaps of debris.

Cancer victim meets Springsteen

DENVER — A 17-year-old Detroit girl who missed Bruce Springsteen's concert in her hometown because she was in the hospital with cancer got to meet the rock singer in Denver.

Dianna Zobel met Springsteen backstage at Mile High Stadium on Monday night before he opened the first of two concerts there.

Springsteen kissed her cheek and autographed a large photograph of himself, said her father, Chuck Zobel. Dianna gave him a dozen roses to celebrate his 36th birthday, which was Monday.

"It was exciting to see Dianna on such an emotional high when she had been in so much pain the week before," Zobel said. "He (Springsteen) has been such an inspiration for her."

Dianna was back at C.S. Mott Children's Hospital in Ann Arbor, Mich., Tuesday night.

Getty provides bail for Von Bulow

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Socialite Claus Von Bulow received $1 million from oil magnate J. Paul Getty Jr. to pay for bail and for his successful defense against charges he tried to kill his wife, a magazine said.

"The fact is that a friend needed help and I was able to give it ... it's no heroic thing," Getty, 53, is quoted as saying in October's Vanity Fair.

"I am certainly not going to ask for it back," Getty said. "I have always told him I wanted it applied to the legal bills, otherwise he would be broke."

Von Bulow was convicted in 1982 of twice trying to kill heiress wife Martha "Sunny" von Bulow with insulin injections, but won a retrial on appeal. He was acquitted in June.

Schultz, Soviet fail to agree

UNITED NATIONS — George P. Shultz and Eduard Shevardnadze, the Soviet foreign minister, met for more than four hours Wednesday, but the secretary of state said they did not reach agreement on any of the issues discussed.

Both had indicated they were optimistic before the meeting.

The two leaders met for four hours and 20 minutes at the Soviet U.N. Mission. It was the first of several sessions regarded as crucial to a successful summit Nov. 19-20 in Geneva, Switzerland, between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

Shultz said the Soviets did not reveal any new proposal that could break the impasse in the arms control talks now under way in Geneva. He said the discussion focused on "security issues, most particularly those being discussed by our negotiators in Geneva.

"We agreed we were looking for points of contact in our positions and areas of common understanding. We did not reach an agreement on any of these items. But we certainly did discuss each other's positions with great care," Shultz told reporters.

Government indicts Klan members

WASHINGTON — Culminating a two-year investigation, the Justice Department announced Wednesday the indictment of nine Ku Klux Klan members on charges they conspired to violate the rights of blacks and whites who were living or socializing together.

The indictment, stemming from an investigation of racial violence in North Carolina during 1982, also charged the nine defendants with committing perjury before a federal grand jury by denying any knowledge or involvement in a series of cross-burnings.

The 20-count indictment, charging acts of violence in Alexander and Iredell counties, N.C., actually was returned by a federal grand jury in Asheville, N.C., on Monday. But the document remained sealed until Wednesday, when federal agents began making arrests, the department said.

Among those indicted were Jerry Douglas Suits, identified as the titan, or leader, of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan in Iredell County; and his wife, Mary Vestal Suits, said to be queen kleagle, or leader, of the women's unit of the Klan.

Also indicted were Tony Douglas Earp, identified as leader of the Klan in Alexander County, and Klansmen Jerry Albert Henderson, Michael Thomas Chambers, Rodney Eugene Pope, Alfred S. Childers, Dan Pritchard and Kenneth Ray Blankenship.

KCC pushes for farmer's discount

WICHITA — Kansas Corporation Commissioner Keith Henley continued to press Wednesday for a discount electric rate for farmers, while KCC Chairman Michael Lennen expressed reservations.

At an administrative meeting in Wichita during which the three-member commission fine-tuned its proposed Wolf Creek nuclear plant rate case order, Henley told Lennen he wanted the discounted farm rate included in Kansas Gas and Electric Co. rates.

Henley said he has asked the KCC staff to draft proposed language for the rate.

Lennen balked. He said a lot of factors needed to be considered including the sales tax exemption agricultural users already have on utilities and the fact rural customers don't pay city franchise taxes. The chairman said he doesn't think the KCC has heard enough testimony about the cost of serving farm customers.

The commission has been following a national trend that puts more and more weight on the cost of serving customers when deciding utility rates.

Kansan to receive national honor

WASHINGTON — A Wichita medical student will receive a gold Congressional Award on Thursday for his community service work, becoming the first resident of the state to be so honored.

Kevin Hoppock, 21, will be awarded a medal twice the size of a silver dollar. It is the highest civilian honor by Congress for personal achievements by youth.

A student at the University of Kansas School of Medicine, Hoppock is being honored for devoting 1,795 hours to "voluntary community service, personal development and physical fitness programs" during the past three years, according to Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, who will present the medal to his fellow Kansan at a ceremony on Capitol Hill.

Hoppock is one of 115 people from 22 states to be honored at Thursday's ceremony. Gold medals are given to people aged 20 to 23 who devote at least 400 hours to community service and 400 hours in "personal development activities."

Bronze and silver medals also are awarded. The medals depict the Capitol dome on one side and the American eagle on the other.

Co-op ends child care woes

Program aids students, staff

By BRENDA KITCHEN
Collegian Reporter

Students, faculty and staff at the University all face the responsibility of budgeting their time and priorities. Adding parenthood to these already demanding roles calls for the availability of dependable, quality child care.

The types of day-care problems faced by university affiliated parents are unique, said LaVerne Lindsey, assistant provost in the Division of Continuing Education.

The approach to child care taken by the KSU Child Care Cooperative is also unique, Lindsey said.

The co-op was started in August by University affiliated parents to meet their previously unmet needs and ideals for child care.

There has been an effort by the University community to address the need of child care for close to 15 years, Lindsey said.

A child care cooperative is a child care facility owned by the parents. Policy for the facility is decided by a board of directors with input from the owners. Certified teachers are the primary caretakers at the co-op.

Multi-cultural, multi-ethnic, non-sexist child care is part of the philosophy of the cooperative.

"Being in a university setting, the children are exposed to other cultures," said Cynthia McCahon, parent, doctoral student and temporary instuctor of industrial engineering. "The child care reflects this."

The cooperative strives to accommodate the schedules of university affiliated parents. There are currently two full-time programs. One is for toddlers, ages 1 to 2½ years old and the other is for pre-school, ages 2½ to 5 years old. There is also a Flexi-care program, designed for parents who do need regular day care, but don't need to enroll their children full time. This accommodates 2½ to 5 year olds. Flexi-care is the only program which currently has space available.

The cooperative is located in the Jardine Terrace Apartments. The facility currently accommodates 30 children needing full-time care. They hope to expand the center to hold 250 children by next fall.

"We want to accommodate everyone, on campus, who needs day care," said Jennifer Kendall, a parent and graduate teaching assistant in statistics.

The availability of child care is a concern of some parents wishing to return to school. John Markiewicz, senior in construction science, said he believes the center will help entice more students to K-State.

"It is estimated that the number of students over the age of 25 will increase 34 percent in the next five years. More will come back to school, if they can find the special services they need," Markiewicz said.

Debi Evans said the welfare of her child was one of her considerations on whether or not to return to school. She said she likes the affiliation with

Decline warrants research

It's official: Enrollment is down 522 students.

University officials have attributed the decline to fewer high school graduates and the depressed state economy. These two factors are present, but they are laying on the surface of a deep-rooted problem.

The reasons provided for the decline appear to indicate that 522 less freshmen and transfer students enrolled. In fact, the number of new students enrolling this fall is only one less than the total from last fall.

The true problem is that not enough students are coming back.

K-State loses a significant percent of its freshman and sophomore population each year. The usual reason given by students is lack of funds, but how likely are these student to go into detail? Many of them are simply fed up with dealing with "the system."

More research needs to be done to determine why students give up on K-State. A student's academic success is not soley dependent on his or her ability to learn. A student cannot know what his or her goals are — academic or personal — unless they first know who they are. The University must pave at least part of the road to this realization.

There are numerous existing and developing programs addressing academic, emotional and social needs of students. It must be determined why many students never benefit from services they pay for with their tuition.

It is everyone's responsibility to show students what they can get for their money. Let's hope with the coming reorganization of educational and student services, and the increased faculty time devoted to advising, we can keep the students we now have. And gather more along the way.

Benefits should be shared

Three minutes are all it takes.

For Mexico City, and for the entire country, those three minutes of last Thursday's earthquake will stretch into years of mourning — and rebuilding.

Alameda Park, one of the hardest-hit areas, will no longer be the site for families walking together on Sundays. Garibaldi Square will not be the stage for mariachi bands.

The city of 18 million suffers from the effects of poverty, overpopulation and unemployment. Rebuilding costs will definitely add to the problems of the already unstable country, which has a $97 billion foreign debt.

In 1977, building codes were established to prevent destruction by impending earthquakes. Many buildings constructed since then fell last week. As is common with human nature, we look for someone on which to place the blame for such a tragedy.

But there are more important things to be done.

The first priority, said Mexican President Miguel de la Madrid, is to uncover those trapped and to bury the dead. As the search for the living continues, common graves are being readied for unidentified victims.

The International Red Cross is working to provide supplies and to gather information on the missing victims. Supplies and food have been arriving from many countries and private organizations.

De la Madrid, not wanting to increase the already massive foreign debt, resisted seeking financial assistance from the U.S. government. But refusing badly needed help would be suicide for the country.

In a "gesture of solidarity," President Reagan sent his wife, Nancy, to help assess the country's needs. She took with her a check for $1 million — enough to give $1 to one-eighteenth of the capital's citizens. Though well-intended and much appreciated, the donation is only a "drop in the bucket."

The first lady spent a few hours in front of a national television audience, escorted by Mexican officials whose time could have been better spent organizing relief efforts.

It is a time for compassion. It is a time for aid — from governments and from individuals. It is not a time to take advantage of a hurting nation. And it is not a time for U.S. public relations.

Muslim minister stirs apartheid rhetoric

DAVID BRODER
Syndicated Columnist

LOS ANGELES — It is ironic but instructive that Black Muslim Minister Louis Farrakhan has re-ignited an emotional debate here between races and religions at the very time when Americans have finally come together on a policy conveying our national condemnation of racial apartheid in South Africa.

The protest movement against the evil of apartheid was renewed by Randall Robinson and his allies immediately after last year's election. Growing numbers of other black leaders joined him and the campaign spread quickly through the white civil-rights community, the liberal politicians and then the conservatives.

Most Americans probably view all this as evidence of the healthy condition of racial relations in this country and feel the warm glow of self-satisfaction in the moral superiority of the United States to other nations.

Ever since he flashed into the public's consciousness as a campaigner for Jesse L. Jackson last year, Farrakhan has been a fright-figure to white Americans — especially to Jews, who are often the target of his inflammatory rhetoric. The anger and controversy increased when Farrakhan used a recent appearance before a cheering crowd of some 10,000 people in Washington, D.C., to voice further slurs on the "wickedness" of the Jews.

Jewish groups here enlisted clergymen of other faiths and politicians of both parties to condemn Farrakhan's local appearance. When Los Angeles' black mayor, Tom Bradley (D), said he would not speak out against Farrakhan before the event, he was criticized by many of his longtime supporters in the politically influential Jewish community.

As it turned out, Farrakhan modulated his message of bigotry here, condemning the "wicked hypocrisy" of Israel, by emphasizing separatism as a way to "get up from the foot of your masters and say, 'I am a free man.'" After the speech, Bradley said his decision to remain silent and support the private negotiations for restraint on Farrakhan's part was only a "partial success" and condemned the "racism, hatred...and bigotry" he said he found in the speech.

What the man and his movement bring uncomfortably to light is the fact that there is still an enormous distance between the races in both perceptions and realities, and great anger and fear as well, in this supposedly integrated and tolerant society.

The opposing white and black responses to Farrakhan are not the only evidence that we have a bit of South Africa-style polarization in our midst. We are foolish to ignore the implications of the fact that more than 90 percent of the blacks opposed the re-election of a President supported by more than 60 percent of the whites.

As a white whose black friend and colleague Milton Coleman has been threatened by Farrakhan for his honesty as a reporter, I know how I react. The Farrakhan I saw in Philadelphia last year was a racist demagogue surrounded by a cold-eyed, robotic security force as chilling as any I have encountered west of the Iron Curtain.

But I have seen other racist demagogues playing presidential politics and they were white. George Wallace has recanted. But Jesse Helms still serves in the Senate, with unaltered views, and he dominates not a minor movement called the Nation of Islam but one of our 50 sovereign states.

But like their counterparts in South Africa, American blacks judge the greater threat to justice come from the race in power. To be honest, if I were black, would I not fear a powerful white majority supporting a government which says the most important civil-rights issue is whether whites are being disadvantaged by affirmative-action goals and targets for minorities?

Farrakhan himself is no more than a footnote to history — like Wallace or Helms. But he reminds us of a racial gulf that we cannot ignore. And he warns us not to be too smug about the evils of South Africa.

Machine would change wind into water

JACK MORRIS
Copy Editor

Thousands of people are dying in Africa from starvation, malnutrition and disease related to a persistent drought that has lasted more than a decade.

Closer to home, western Kansas farmers are being threatened by a dropping underground water table. Productive, irrigated farmland will revert to "The Great American Desert" if it drops too much.

Both regions would benefit from an inexpensive way to pump water to crops and seed clouds to induce rainfall. Bill McKee, senior in electrical engineering and computer engineering, believes he has a machine that will do just that. He calls it the "Climate Tamer."

McKee's idea is to combine a "tornado turbine" generator developed by James Yen, fluid dynamics engineer at Grumman Aerospace Corp., Bethpage, N.Y., and a "power fence" proposed by Alvin Marks, who has donated his patent to the non-profit World Energy Foundation. Both machines convert wind energy to electricity, and each of them is more efficient than the traditional propeller generator.

The tornado turbine scoops wind into a tower where the trapped air spirals out the top. The spinning vortex creates a low-pressure area at the bottom of the tower, where a focused nozzle allows air from another area to enter.

For the same wind speed, Yen said, a turbine inside the nozzle of his tower can generate 35 times more power than can a similar-size bare (propeller) turbine. Furthermore, solar energy can be used to heat the base of the tornado tower to add to the upward rush of air.

The power fence is based on tapping a flow of charged water particles that are blown by the wind. When fine tubes that make up the fence's mesh are filled with water, the pressure forces some water out microscopic holes in the tubes.

The fence itself is electrically charged, which causes electrons to move back along the water to the fence. The water flow breaks into droplets, which are positive since the electrons carry negative charges to the fence.

The force propelling the positive droplets away from their negative electrons is the wind. When the water falls out of the wind's path, its charge flows through the ground to the fence — thus completing an electrical circuit that can be tapped for power.

McKee suggests installing a similar but smaller power "grid" inside a tornado tower to produce electricity. The grid would be smaller than the proposed fence, but the useful air speed would be greatly amplified.

The turbine could be left off to create an electrical generator without moving parts, or a combination of the two generators could be used. In addition, about half of the charged water droplets would escape into the atmosphere, McKee believes, and they could be used to help form ice crystals in clouds to induce rain.

Various seed particles, including silver iodide and ice-nucleating bacteria, could be joined to the charged water droplets as they leave the tornado tower. The machine could become the most efficient way to test long-term cloud seeding experiments.

It may be a dream, but it's based on reality. An unused grain elevator or silo could be converted into a prototype, McKee said. A group of Climate Tamers could be tested in western Kansas.

The proposal has a good chance of generating cheap power for remote irrigation and increasing rainfall through cloud seeding. If it efficiently accomplishes just one of these goals, it will be a success.

McKee is forming a research and development team to build and test a prototype Climate Tamer. K-State — a national leader in agricultural research — and its supporting agencies should agree that the idea deserves support.

Senate leader deserves respect, not condemnation

Editor,

Re: Catherine Sayler's column, "Senate chairman misrepresents students," in the Sept. 24 Collegian:

Catherine Sayler finally has succeeded where no other has. She has cracked what I had once considered an unbreakable wall of patience and tolerance.

Always before, I would simply consider the sources (Collegian Editor Tim Carpenter, senior in agricultural journalism; and Lee White, senior in journalism and mass communications) and conclude my time was more valuable. But Sayler's column is different. It is a gross injustice to Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones, senior in management, and an ironic quirk of hypocrisy.

To begin with, Sayler's glorification of 1,302 votes is at the very least deceptive and, in my opinion, should be viewed as a blatant manipulation of statistics. When evaluating her almighty referendum, a total of roughly 2,000 students took the time to vote. With an official total enrollment of 18,192 last spring, that is a 9 percent voter turnout.

The vast majority of K-State students did not care! What is the value of a referendum in which most students were totally indifferent? To base such harsh analysis of a very competent student leader on such an unrepresentative vote is pathetic.

Secondly, Sayler questions how representative our student government is. Herein lies the true irony. She was once a student senator for the College of Veterinary Medicine. She was elected to that post with a total of 12 votes. Twelve students within her college voted for her. Twelve out of more than 300 potential voters. What right does she have to criticize our representative student government?

Furthermore, she is guilty of the greatest injustice an elected official can commit. She was required to prematurely surrender her senate seat because she left the College of Veterinary Medicine. She was required to resign from her elected position, and now she has the audacity to criticize other elected officials.

Sayler is wrong in her criticism of Jones. Enough said!

Stanley Ehler, associate professor of agronomy, wants to do more than just teach his students about crops in his crop science class; he wants to present his view of life.

"The objective of the course is to show them (the students) God's love and God's truths. We are trying to build character, which means knowing what the right thing is, then doing it. This should be the objective of all education," Ehler said.

For Ehler's students the first day of class includes a presentation of the "secret" to the function of the class.

"The secret is to set the scene, to give the complete picture, to show where the student fits in, where the instructor fits in and where the information fits in," Ehler said.

Ehler said he believes most students are "too proud to beg and too weak to dig," so they go to college, but "many don't know why they are there," Ehler said.

There are two things Ehler tells his students that must happen during the semester.

"The students have to do what I ask them to do. And I have to love the student. That's really when they get to acting fruity, when you start using words like that," he said, "but I define love as an unselfish concern for their best interest.

"Then I tell them about learning. When we were run out of the Garden of Eden, we were separated from all truths and knowledge. So we're going to have to learn these things. The result is studying."

Studying is really work, Ehler said. "It (studying) is an act of will — the mind doesn't want to. Good teaching is not nearly as important as good studenting."

Ehler said to be an efficient student, the student must learn to submit.

"Submission is turning over the self to a godly order. Submission in the proper sense puts you in a position of strength. Everybody has a place, and if you are out of line with what God would have, you are out of his protection," he said.

Ehler said he believes it is important for students to be able to write essays, which is the testing method he uses in his classes.

"An old retired extension guy said: 'If you can't write well, you can't organize yourself well. If you can't tell somebody what you know, maybe you don't know anything.'

"My students are required to read," Ehler said. "Why? Because they can get ideas, learn the language and learn to write some. We have a nation where many people can't read because they get all the information they need from TV."

Ehler said the women in his classes are "a very special group of people."

"I have had some girl advisees and talked with others I've had in class. I just believe most of them are here because they are looking for 'Mr. Right.' But we have made liars out of them and that's what I'm really concerned about," Ehler said.

"When you ask them why they are here they will say 'I am majoring in this or that,' when the truth is they think they are supposed to say that. And yet, they are here to do what they are supposed to be doing (finding a husband)," Ehler said. "We put them in a situation that makes it hard for them to be honest."

Ehler said there is a difference between men and women and to instruct them the same way may be a mistake.

"The girls are more receptive to what I have to say," Ehler said. "By and large they are better many times in many ways than the boys, but they have different ways to see things, different things that they think are important; they are just different."

Ehler came to the University in 1972 and teaches crop science, grain production and weed management. He received his bachelor's degree in soils and his master's degree in weed control from Southern Iowa University.

Oil survey describes future energy crises

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The world appears to have enough oil to last until the mid-21st century, the U.S. Geological Survey said Wednesday.

But, it said, because most of the known and undiscovered reserves are found principally in the Middle East, Americans can expect to face several repetitions of the energy crises of the 1970s.

In a 25-page report, "World Petroleum Resources," the government geologists said their survey of potential oil-bearing formations around the globe indicates there are none equivalent to those in the Middle East.

"The most important conclusion of our study is that the Middle East increasingly will monopolize world petroleum supplies," said Charles Masters, the chief author of the report. "Even with continued frontier exploration effort and success, that distribution reality is not likely to change."

Dietetics professor becomes author

By BECKY WEBER
Collegian Reporter

Marian Spears wrote the book on food service organization.

Spears, head of the Department of Dietetics, Restaurant and Institution Management, along with Allene Vaden, dean of the School of Home Economics at the University of Southern Mississippi, have designed and written, "Foodservice Organizations: A Managerial and Systems Approach," published this summer by John Wiley & Sons Inc. of New York.

Three years ago, Spears was approached by Wiley to write the book because of a need for a text in the dietetics and restaurant management field. Also, other textbooks were old, outdated and lacking many of the modern techniques used today, Spears said.

Besides K-State, other universities such as Purdue University and Oklahoma State University use the text, though it will not be nationally advertised until October.

For two years, Spears taught and worked on the book. During her summer vacation, she set up office at home, writing 12 to 14 hours a day.

After sending the book to the publisher, it took a year before they sent it back, she said.

"When I got it, I was kind of numb. I just sat and looked at it," Spears said.

Spears had the textbook reviewed by peers who said it was a book dietetic practitioners should have on their shelves. She received a letter from the publishing company stating they predicted it to be a bestseller.

"It is unique that a textbook covers the whole field," Spears said.

Mary Hammel, assistant instructor in the College of Education, did free-lance artwork for the textbook.

Although she has no immediate plans to write another book, Spears said she would begin to revise the current edition at the beginning of next year.

'Singer of songs' to appear in McCain premiere event

By LISA BOOTHE
Collegian Reviewer

On any day in Las Vegas, you can take a ride down a famous street named Cleo Lane. Tonight only in McCain Auditorium, Cleo Laine just may take you for a ride.

Singer/actress Cleo Laine is performing at 8 p.m. with her husband, John Dankworth and the Dankworth Quartet in the first event this season at McCain.

Laine, who is British, refers to herself as "a singer of songs" because her musical repertoire is too extensive to be limited to one label. In fact, Cleo Laine is the only singer ever to be nominated in the Popular Female, Classical and Jazz categories of the Grammy Awards.

Laine's versatility has won her the admiration of both musicians and audiences. She was named Variety Club's 1977 "Show Business Personality of the Year" along with her husband, and has appeared on "The Muppet Show," "The Tonight Show," "The Merv Griffin Show," "The Mike Douglas Show," and other U.S. and British talk and variety shows.

In the Royal Court Theatre, Laine played the lead in "Flesh to a Tiger" and also appeared in the 1971 London production of "Showboat." This December, she will open on Broadway in "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," a musical based on the novel by Charles Dickens.

John Dankworth, who Laine married in 1958, was recently named Pops Musical Director for the London Symphony Orchestra. Dankworth is famous for his saxophone and clarinet expertise, but he is also a renowned producer/writer/arranger.

He was nominated for an Academy Award for his score for "Return from the Ashes." He wrote the original theme for "The Avengers" and composed the musical scores for more than 20 major films.

Dankworth has conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, London Symphony and Royal Philharmonic to name a few of the major orchestras.

With Laine's three-octave range, and the group's broad musical emphasis, the performance should prove to be well-received by any audience, however varied.

Artist understands his shortcomings

Movie captures 'atmosphere'

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Bertrand Tavernier's latest film, "A Sunday in the Country," is nearly all atmosphere — but it's great atmosphere.

Film Review

The camera pans across the lush grass of a country home, circa 1910, sunlight filters through the autumnal reds and oranges of the trees and the gentle beauty of the setting flows from the screen like a warm southerly breeze. If not careful, the intoxicating atmosphere might just lull the viewer into a blissful sleep.

Every camera shot in the film could be a painting. Unlike other films with the same approach, the images aren't simply reminders of a director and cinematographer sitting off camera, self-consciously trying to create art.

Tavernier isn't out to wow his audience with all the beauty he can cram into every frame of the film. His images are soft and inticing, but they aren't just bits of fluff. He creates an atmosphere that his audience can bask in.

He tells the simple story of an old man, Monsieur Ladmiral, an artist, whose children and grandchildren come visiting one Sunday in autumn. Ladmiral is lonely. His son, a successful business man, visits often, but his son is dull. His son's wife is hopelessly pious and the two boys are energetic but unimaginative.

When Ladmiral's son and family visit, he is only reminded how much he misses his daughter. But she does show up later this same day soaring up to his front door in her new motor carriage and then whirling through the house, stirring up everyone in her wake. She represents the energy he was never able to capture in his art.

This picks up the old man and renews him, but only momentarily. Once she's left and her energy has dissipated, the old man is more lonely than ever. But on this Sunday he will understand his shortcomings as an artist.

He was a good enough painter to earn a modest living, but he lacks the vision of Paul Cezanne, a post-impressionist artist. And as the day progresses, he begins to realize he is destined to be soon forgotten, as his paintings are competent but lack any true insight.

Travernier brings this simple story to life by allowing his audience to experience this Sunday as if they were one of this French family. He brings the camera up close and intimate, but never smothers the audience with images.

The old man, his children and grandchildren are like old friends that the audience is visiting. They aren't so complex that we spend the whole movie trying to figure them out.

Pete Blevins, a cystic fibrosis patient, is assisted by his wife, Joyce, while undergoing therapy to keep his lungs clear of mucus. Blevins needs assistance three times a day with his therapy.

Caring Enough to Live

A grandfather clock stands in a corner of the living room, ticking away time.

Time is something Pete Blevins, Manhattan, has a lot to spare, yet he cannot say how much he has left. Eight years ago Blevins was diagnosed as having cystic fibrosis.

Cystic fibrosis is a hereditary disease affecting the lungs and digestive system. The disease inhibits the release of digestive enzymes, making it hard for the body to absorb nutrients. The lungs excrete an abnormally thick mucus, resulting in numerous lung infections and episodes of pneumonia. Eventually this leaves the lungs scarred and unable to perform properly.

"With CF you just don't exert yourself (to) retain as much energy as you can. It gives me lots of time to think about the inevitable," Blevins said.

Blevins goes through stages preparing for it, but he's "just not ready to accept death yet."

Optimistically, last fall he began building the grandfather clock now standing in the living room corner.

"They come in kits," he said. "I have to assemble them, strip them and varnish them. There are eight of them out there somewhere."

During the winter months, Blevins prepares tax returns. He is an accountant and worked for a CPA firm in Great Bend before his health forced him to quit three years ago.

"I stay busy, keeping my breathing machinery up to date and my medicines ordered, and trying to help out my wife with the housework."

A five-week stay at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City three years ago washed away any self-pity Blevins might have been harboring.

"While I was at the hospital I might start feeling bad about myself, but you know, I'd see little babies with CF and they didn't make it. I'd see kids, 12 to 14 years old, without any hair because they're going through chemotherapy for cancer. And they were dying...it brings you around fast.

"I feel pretty lucky. I say that and people look at me like 'you must be out of your mind.' But I turned 29 this last summer and I've done a lot of things.

Most cystic fibrosis patients die before the age of 20. It is rare for one to live past 35.

Blevins is literally tied by the nose to an oxygen concentrator. The concentrator takes the oxygen out of the room air, concentrates it and sends it through a tube connected to Blevins' nose.

"Whenever I want to go out I have to take a bottle of concentrated oxygen with me and I have a regulator in the car," he said.

Getting out of the house is a problem. For a sociable person like Blevins, being housebound is difficult.

"It's kind of boring out here. Most people my age have jobs or are trying to raise kids. It can get lonely."

Blevins' treatments have three parts. Breathing exercises are done on a machine to strengthen the lungs. Blevins must also inject fluid into his lungs to thin the thick mucus caused by cystic fibrosis.

The final phase of the treatments is aimed at loosening up the mucus in the lungs so infection won't set in. This phase involves running a vibrator over the ribs, five minutes on each side. This is the only phase in which Blevins needs help. He has been doing the treatments since 1978.

So far, Blevins has been relying on his wife Joyce and his mother Marcy to administer the treatments, and help is needed. Anyone willing to give time should call Sue Mulyan at the United Way Volunteer Clearing House.

Blevins returned Wednesday from a visit to The St. Mary Hospital. He was admitted Saturday night when mucus plugged his bronchial tubes and he could barely breathe.

Blevins' doctor, James D. Gardner of Manhattan, attributes Blevins' longevity to his attitude.

"He has been quite positive with his attitudes." Gardner said, "If he hadn't he wouldn't have lived this long."

There is hope of freeing Blevins and other cystic fibrosis patients from the harness of the disease — heart and lung transplants.

"A transplant would mean I could hang up the hose and throw away half my medicines," Blevins said. "One CF patient who received a transplant only lived 60 days, but he was breathing room air in three or four days."

Blevins said there are only three places in the country where the operation is performed: Stanford University Hospital, Stanford, Calif.; Presbyterian-University Hospital, Pittsburgh; and Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore.

"I'd like to stay healthy long enough for them to get a little more practice...then they can give me one!"

Gardner said Blevins would be a good candidate for a transplant.

"He has a lot of drive. If he could, he would work hard and be productive," Gardner said, "not only would he benefit from a transplant, society would."

Opposition of U.S. policy grows

Group shares Central American view

By PATTY REINERT
Editorial Page Editor

Members of the Manhattan Alliance on Central America met Wednesday night to discuss the possibility of becoming more active in their opposition to U.S. policy in Central America.

Gerry Gillespie, from the Salina Peace Coalition, and Tod McElroy, senior in English at Fort Hays State University and member of the Western Kansas Task Force on Central America, spoke following a rice and beans dinner at the American Baptist Campus Ministry, 1801 Anderson Ave.

Many grass-roots organizations across the country have written "pledges of resistance," and Gillespie estimated that between 50,000 and 100,000 people have committed themselves to participation in civil disobedience.

"We decided it was important to write up our own pledge stating as well as we could where we were with this whole issue, and the risks and the actions and the decisions that we would be willing to make in case of an escalation of U.S. activity in Central America," Gillespie said.

After writing the pledge, the Salina coalition began non-violence training for its members, and contacted the local office of Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to inform them that they would commit civil disobedience in the office.

"The public pledge is one way of making people think more seriously about where they are on that, and not just sort of float through that question," Gillespie said.

The Salina pledge includes a commitment to engage in regular daily prayer services, participate in an on-going vigil outside Roberts' office until troops are withdrawn from Central America and to protest peacefully inside the office during regular office hours. The pledge also states that some Peace Coalition members may be called by conscience to remain after business hours.

McElroy said it is difficult to organize groups in western Kansas to sign pledges of resistance because many of the members are from "small, conservative towns."

"Reputation is a funny thing. When you teach grade school in a town of 200 people, they don't think it's so hot that you've been arrested," McElroy said. "People have to take these things into consideration — their family and their place in the community. There are larger issues, but there are still those facts that you have to think about."

K-State Players debut 'Exit the King' drama

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Players opens its season with Eugene Ionesco's play, "Exit the King," at 8 tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre.

The play, directed by Charles W. Edward, senior in theatre, will run through Saturday night. A cast of six, will portray a royal family at the close of their reign.

"It (the play) takes place during the last hours of the king's life. It's about the king, his family, his queens and the people around him," said Rhonda Miracle, publicity coordinator for the theater season. "It's about the way he faces death."

The doctor is caught in the middle, befuddled that the king is dying because he doesn't know what to do, Miracle said.

King Berenger will be played by Douglas Dickey, junior in information systems. Other characters are Queen Marguerite, played by Kelli Wondra, senior in theater; Queen Marie by Raina Granger, sophomore in general; the doctor by Michael McCarty, senior in theater; Juliette by Laura Manges, senior in theater; and the guard by H. Kent Sylvis, junior in history.

Because of the theater's small size, limited seating is available. Tickets may be purchased in advance at the Nichols Box Office at $2 for the public and $1 for students.

Purple Masque plays are a separate season from Nichols Premiere Season which opens Oct. 10, 11 and 12 with "Moon for the Misbegotten" by Eugene O'Neill.

The Purple Masque Theatre provides a low budget testing ground for new material in which graduate students are encouraged to direct and act, Miracle said.

Premier blames officials for Greenpeace bomb

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Prime Minister Laurent Fabius on Wednesday blamed former Defense Minister Charles Hernu and the former secret service chief for the bombing of a Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior.

Fabius said it was difficult to determine who specifically gave the order to sink the ship July 10 at its berth in Auckland, New Zealand, because "there was no written order."

He said he questioned Hernu and secret service chief Adm. Pierre Lacoste Wednesday afternoon.

"My conviction is that both of them acted under the impulse of their own idea of what was in the interest of our country," he said. "My conviction is that it is at their level where the responsibility lies."

Lacoste was fired last week for refusing to answer questions about the sinking, and Hernu, who had ultimate responsibility for the secret service, resigned.

On Sunday, Fabius announced that the secret service carried out the bombing on government orders but did not say who was responsible.

Speaking during his weekly television appearance, Fabius said, "In a democracy like ours, the responsibility for this kind of decision is borne by the civilian authorities — that is to say the minister (Hernu)."

Some news reports have said military subordinates carried out the attack either because they misinterpreted orders or because some right-wing elements in the army wanted to embarrass the Socialist government.

The Rainbow Warrior was preparing to lead a protest flotilla to France's South Pacific testing grounds for nuclear weapons.

One theory holds that Hernu gave an oral order to Lacoste to "take care of" the Greenpeace protest, and Lacoste interpreted it as an instruction to sink the ship.

A Greenpeace photographer was killed in the bombing.

Earlier Wednesday, the government named army chief of staff Gen. Rene Imbot to replace Lacoste as head of the General Directorate for External Security, France's secret service.

the University, the convenience and the philosophies of the cooperative.

"As long as I think he (her child) is being sustained in the aspects that I feel are important, as a parent, I feel comfortable with him being there (at the co-op)," Evans said.

She said the great advantage of being involved in the cooperative is the ability to have input in how the center is run.

Kendall said through the cooperative she has a lot of input in the programs and the philosophy of the child care.

"In commercial programs, if you don't like what is happening, all you can do is withdraw your child," she said, "If you don't like what is happening at our center, you can change it."

To be a member of the co-op, there is a $25 membership fee.

Moon provides players with winning attitude

TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

The proper attitude is an important quality of any good football team.

A team with inferior talent, but with a winning attitude, will many times defeat a team with better talent. K-State's two losses, to Wichita State University and the University of Northern Iowa can serve as examples of this.

K-State almost found themselves on the other side of things in last Saturday's loss to Texas Christian University. TCU, at most player positions, was bigger, stronger and faster than K-State.

Despite the suspension of All-American running back Kenneth Davis, TCU still was expected to roll over the Wildcats. But such was not the case. A fired-up K-State team put a 24-22 scare into TCU. With a break somewhere along the line, K-State may well have won.

There seems to be a positive shift in the attitude of the Wildcat team. Whether he wants to admit it or not, much of that positive shift can be attributed to interim Head Coach Lee Moon.

"That's not fair for me to say," Moon said Tuesday when asked if he thought his presence has made a difference in the attitude of the team. "I know it's been good since I got out here. I think whatever has happened in the past, happened in the past and we'll let someone else evaluate it."

While he didn't want to comment specifically on the coaching situation, fullback Ray Wilson could sense from the team's attitude before the TCU game, also Moon's first game as interim coach, that K-State was ready to play.

"You could see it in everybody's eyes," Wilson said. "We were going to play harder than heck."

Before the Wichita State and Northern Iowa games, Wilson said, the positive feeling just wasn't quite there.

"Everybody might be yelling and screaming, but it wasn't coming from the heart," Wilson said. "It wasn't as meaningful as it was this (TCU) game."

Maybe it's too early to say, but if player comments mean anything, Moon has had a positive effect on the team.

Quarterback John Welch said the first week of game preparation with Moon as interim coach was important in the success against TCU.

"Coaches always contribute," Welch said. "I think this is the reason that people saw a different team. I felt like we were a different team on the field this week. The reason is that we got together as a unit and finally decided to play some ball."

Split end Gerald Alphin said Moon's enthusiastic approach has carried over to the players.

"As far as enthusiasm, that's what he (Moon) tries to provide," Alphin said. "He's just a highly motivated person and that's how he wants us to play on Saturday."

Alphin also said Moon's practices, which have been longer and have included more contact than former Coach Jim Dickey's practices, have helped the team.

Moon's profile in practice is high, even after just one week as interim head coach. Moon is running the show and said he "felt comfortable from the first day" in his new role.

Moon lets his assistant coaches handle their specialties, but he still likes to move around the KSU Stadium turf among the various groups, dealing directly with the players.

"I like to get involved. I'll pat (the players) on the back if they do good and challenge them a little bit if they do bad. I'm not going to let them stand around," Moon said.

It may be too early to say. But if one game can serve as a determinant, Lee Moon seems to be transforming K-State into a team with the attitude it takes to win football games.

Sigrid Ivarsson, left, and Lena Svensson, right, were recruited by K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau with the intent of helping change the fortune of the women's tennis program. Svensson is the No. 1 singles player on the team, followed by Ivarsson who is No. 2 in singles competition.

Swedes adjust to life, tennis at K-State

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Sports Editor

Steve Bietau knew he had to do something to change the fortune of K-State's women's tennis program.

When he became the head coach for the men's and women's tennis teams at K-State, Bietau inherited programs that had finished at or near the bottom of the Big Eight Conference for several years.

Last year was no different, especially for the women's team. The 'Cats finished last at the Big Eight meet and had just one singles player and one doubles team win any matches.

The majority of the players from past K-State tennis teams have been from Kansas and Bietau could see a need to bring in new blood from outside of the state.

But Bietau went one step farther. Because he became K-State's tennis coach just before the the fall '84 season began, this year has been his first chance to recruit. And he has taken advantage of it.

Not only did he recruit from outside of Kansas, he recruited from outside of the United States. The result: Sweden natives Lena Svensson and Sigrid Ivarsson.

Getting two Swedish tennis players to come to Kansas was no easy task for Bietau. He also had to convince the two Swedes to play on a college women's tennis team that has enjoyed little success over the years.

So when he recruited Svensson and Ivarsson, he used the personal approach — and it worked.

Ivarsson, an 18-year-old freshman from Danderyd, was the first of the two recruited by Bietau, who originally made contact with her by letter.

"We wrote letters to each other about every other week," Ivarsson said. "It's important that you get along with the coach and that the coach is good."

Bietau, who at the time was the tennis coach at Hutchinson Community College, first saw the 21-year-old Svensson play tennis as a freshman at Palm Beach Junior College in Lake Worth, Fla.

He kept her in mind and this past May went to watch her at the National Junior College tennis tournament. It was there that he signed Svensson, whose hometown is Angelholm, to a letter of intent.

In fact, Svensson was being heavily recruited by other schools.

"I was very close to signing," Svensson said. "But Steve came to my match and he knew I hadn't signed. He changed my mind."

Bietau liked the idea of having two Swedish tennis players on the same team.

"We were looking for two girls and I had gotten a commitment from Sigrid already," Bietau said. "And I liked the idea of having two from the same country."

With Ivarsson in the United States for the first time and Svensson unfamiliar with this part of the country, the two agreed with Bietau.

"It was my first time in the United States and I knew I would have problems with the language," said Ivarsson, who is playing No. 2 singles for the Wildcats. "It's always a help when there's another person from the same country.

"It's always difficult to come to another country. But I think it's a good experience."

Despite not knowing each other until they meet at the Kansas City International Airport a week before the fall semester began, Svensson and Ivarsson have become good friends and ended up as roommates in Goodnow Hall.

Because neither one had ever been to Kansas, let alone the K-State campus, they relied on others to give them a perception of what it would be like to go to school at K-State.

"I talked to a boy (Bjorn Stenkvist) who was at Bethany College (in Lindsborg)," Ivarsson said. "I talked to him about Kansas and how the people were. He was very positive.

"(Also) my sister has been to the States. She's told me about all your habits."

Bietau also knew little about Ivarsson and Svensson and knew he was taking a chance on signing them. Based on a Swedish rating system for tennis players, Bietau said he had a good idea of their ability.

Although the team has played just one weekend to date, Bietau said he is pleased with the performance of the two Swedes.

"I think both the girls turned out as well or better than I expected," he said. "Both of these girls are our strongest players since I've been here. So we're definitely stepping up the caliber of players here.

"The biggest impact they've had, as far as example both in matches and practice, is that they both work very hard and are open to changes. It seems to be typical of Swedish players. Almost anytime someone travels half way around the world to play tennis they are serious about it."

While Bietau said he believes the two have the capability to pull the women's team out of the Big Eight cellar, Svensson and Ivarsson are modest about their talents as tennis players. They don't expect to step right in and dominate the Big Eight.

"Here you have to really work for your matches," said Svensson, K-State's No. 1 singles player. "I know the Big Eight is very tough and that it will be good competition."

'Cats hire Bennett to coach field events for track teams

By The Collegian Staff

Scott Bennett has been named K-State's new field events coach for men's and women's track, according to Steve Miller, head track coach and assistant athletic director. Bennett will begin his duties Monday.

Bennett, 33, comes to K-State from the University of Wisconsin-Madison where he served as assistant men's cross country coach and track and field coach.

Bennett graduated with a bachelor's degree in physical education from Wisconsin-Madison. He received his master's degree in human performance from Wisconsin-LaCrosse.

According to Miller, Bennett was able to incorporate the study of cinematography in his master's program. Miller said Bennett's knowledge of film and photographic techniques, as well as his years of experience of major college coaching, will aid Wildcat athletes.

"Scott brings us experience, not only as a coach with tremendous success on the Division I level, but also unique expertise with an outstanding film background, which is integral to improvement in field events," Miller said.

Golfers 12th at OSU meet

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State women's golf team opened its season this past weekend by placing 12th at the Oklahoma State University Cowboy Invitational with a team score of 1,372. Southern Methodist University won the team title.

Sherri Dercher led the 'Cats with a score of 263 in the three-round event which was played under rainy conditions.

Susan Navart scored a 270, Shelley Sherman a 275, Aaron Andrews a 277 and Page Harrison a 287 to round out the scoring for K-State.

Swim meet finals tonight

By The Collegian Staff

The finals for the intramural swim meet will be tonight at 8 in the Natatorium.

The meet should last until about 9:30 p.m., Steve Martini, assistant director of recreational services, said.

Events will include medley relays, individual medleys, breaststroke, freestyle, butterfly and backstroke.

Correction

Due to a reporter's error in Wednesday's Collegian story, "New student group to help in recruiting athletes," the prize in a raffle being sponsored by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics was listed incorrectly. The car being given away is a 1986 Ford Thunderbird.

The funding helps put Kansas in the lead among national agricultural research and promotion efforts, Dole said.

"This funding, if approved by the full Congress, represents not just an experiment but an investment for American farmers," Dole said. "The gains from this research could mean additional export of our livestock and grain products, and the insect management project should provide farmers with additional tools to combat stored grain insect problems."

The bill makes provision for $100,000 for the livestock research program, Rose said. The program is intended to be modeled after the successful International Grains Program.

The grains program focuses on the development of grain production in underdeveloped countries, bringing agriculture leaders from countries such as the Peoples Republic of China to the University to study grain science.

The remaining $300,000 appropriated in the bill would go to the insect management program, Rose said. The funds would be appropriated under a federal fund-matching program.

city newspaper, the Baltimore Sun, Marsh said.

The colloquium is scheduled to begin at a Rotary Club Luncheon at the Ramada Inn with guest speaker Everette Dennis, director of the Gannett Center for Media Studies.

Tonight, a dinner and a program featuring a panel discussion by five journalism educators will take place in the Union Ballroom.

The panelists, all of whom have been associated with the University as either alumni or faculty members, will address the issue "Journalism and Mass Communications Education: Facing the Future."

The panelists are Del Brinkman, dean of the William Allen White School of Journalism at the University of Kansas; Roy Fisher, director of the Washington Reporting Program for the University of Missouri School of Journalism; Philip Meyer, the William Rand Kenan Jr. Professor of Journalism at the University of North Carolina; Theodore Peterson, professor of journalism and research professor of communications at the University of Illinois; and Everette Dennis.

Enrollment

KU has fluctuated around the 26,000 mark. In 1980 total enrollment was 26,745; in 1981, 26,367; in 1982, 26,748; in 1983, 26,620; and in 1984, 26,744.

In contrast, enrollment at K-State climbed to a high in 1981 of 19,982, but has decreased the past three years. Figures for 1982 were 19,497; in 1983, 18,470; and in 1984, 18,092.

At Emporia State University, enrollment was down from 5,498 last year to 5,291, said Paul Kincaid, director of information services at Emporia State.

Pittsburg State University reported an 8.8 percent increase over fall semester 1984; climbing to 5,359. That represents the highest enrollment at Pittsburg State since the fall of 1982.

Final 20th-day enrollment figures for Fort Hays State University and Washburn University are expected to be released Friday.

The '85 K-State summer school enrollment figures, released Friday, indicate a 4 percent increase over summer '84 totals. A final enrollment figure was 7,535 students, compared to the 1984 summer figure of 7,248, an increase of 287 students.

ASK assembly debate to feature education, employment policies

By MARK MCDERMET
Collegian Reporter

The Associated Students of Kansas, a student-funded lobbying group, will debate major policy issues during its legislative assembly Sept. 27-28 at Wichita State University.

During the assembly, committees will divide into six groups to prepare for legislative action on the following topics: higher education budget recommendations for the Board of Regents and legislative assembly for fiscal year 1987; student employment in alcohol-related settings; Constitutional Revisions Committee report; special interest group policy; minority student caucus; and faculty and course evaluation.

ASK is seeking the enactment of more uniform laws governing the sale of alcohol and an easing of eligibility requirements for student employment, said Kevin Elmore, senior in computer science and ASK campus director.

A teacher-course evaluation — which will also be discussed during the ASK assembly — is also being considered by the regents. As designed, the evaluation would allow students to rate teachers at the end of each semester and permit publication of the ratings. The evaluation is to be used as a guide for students during course selection and to enhance the quality of education, Elmore said.

Minority groups are seeking to establish a minority student caucus to establish a vehicle "to gain ASK support" and provide a more influential forum for minority opinion, he said.

Assembly discussion will also include: on-campus alcohol policies; hazing activities; student financial assistance; Washburn University's potential admission to the regents system; and academic advising.

A social issues committee will address student activism and how it relates to recent protests against apartheid — the South African government's official policy of "separate, but equal" development, Elmore said.

ASK is a student lobbying organization that works with two full-time lobbying professionals in Topeka to represent Kansas students before the Kansas Legislature.

The legislative assembly is ASK's policy-making body which decides which issues ASK will support, what the organization's platform will be and what priority to assign to student concerns.

ASK is a state-wide system whose members include K-State, Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University, Pittsburg State University, the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Washburn University.

Computers simplify parking

Police study system's merits

By KEVIN SNELL
Collegian Reporter

The University may soon become one of the few in the nation to have a computerized parking system.

The KSU Police Department has recently studied a computer system that would totally computerize operations, said Charles Beckom, chief of the KSU Police Department. The computer would be used in parking registration, filing and ticketing.

The system includes hand-held computers used by officers who issue tickets. The officer would enter data on his computer and it would be stored on a microcassette. The computer would print a ticket and at the end of a day the stored data would be fed into the main computer.

Beckom said the four office workers have to complete the paperwork for about 3,000 tickets a month. The computer system would allow storage and access to data that would otherwise have to be handled by hand. It would also cut down on time spent by officers and eliminate errors.

"You're not eliminating any workers — you're merely providing them the means of producing much more than they're doing now," Beckom said.

Another advantage to a computerized parking system is the reduction in registration time for students and faculty, Beckom said. Faculty must register for parking permits in the office, he said, and it can be a time-consuming process.

"It would get us one step closer to getting registration, for both students and faculty, without any waiting," he said.

Southern Methodist University and some large California universities are now using similar systems, Beckom said. The University of Nebraska is also studying a computerized parking system.

Beckom estimated that $50,000 to $70,000 would purchase a system capable of handling the department's needs. He said he would know more details later this week, when a computer company will be on campus to study the police department's needs and procedures.

Beckom said he hopes to obtain part of the $700,000 now available through the bond refinancing for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum to help fund the program, but he also said that increases in parking fees might help pay for the computer system. Beckom addressed an open forum sponsored by the Students for Educational Awareness Sept. 18, suggesting that part of the money be used for the system.

Even if parking fees are increased, the students and faculty will still benefit from the system through easier handling of tickets and better services, Beckom said.

Beckom said a final proposal will be made some time this year.

Ethics key to media future, editor says

By SUE DAWSON
Staff Writer

Young journalists can expect to encounter a world filled with a blizzard of ethical questions, said Reg Murphy, editor and publisher of the Baltimore Sun.

Murphy delivered the Milton S. Eisenhower Memorial Lecture Thursday in the Union Forum Hall. His topic, "How Can Tomorrow's Media Adequately Inform the Public in an Increasingly Complicated World," was the keynote address of the 75th Anniversary Colloquium of the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications.

"The discussion of ethics is as slippery as playing on a mud bank after a rainstorm," Murphy said. "And it is as dangerous."

Murphy said the responsibility of a newspaper is to attract readers, while still continuing to provide quality news.

"I think it is the responsibility of my colleagues in an ethical way to set a target to grow the circulation of newspapers for the next decade," he said. "We will need the help of young and talented and well-trained journalists to get us there.

"We are talking about a reporting revolution in which we try to help people manage their own lives...We still must give people enough information to decide the important public issues."

Murphy said the fragmentation of television audiences and the specialization of changing lifestyles of the public will be influencing factors on the direction in which newspaper reporting will take.

"It becomes the responsibility of ethical journalists to make certain that we don't target neighborhoods and forget about the need to communicate across broader groups," he said.

As the average American is exposed to an increasing number of media stimuli, Murphy said, the need to publish stories with meaning and interest becomes greater.

"With all (the) competition for attention, newspapers have to tell compelling stories," he said. "Not sensational stories, mind you, but important and interesting stories written well and displayed for easy identification."

Milton Eisenhower, a 1924 K-State journalism graduate, was the honorary chairman of the anniversary committee until his death in May 1985. He spoke with Murphy in Baltimore in 1981.

Murphy said in his talk with Eisenhower, a former University president, they discussed the need for an

Coastal areas prepare for Hurricane Gloria

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Squatters were rousted, trash cans were taken off the streets and the Statue of Liberty's old torch was moved indoors Thursday as New York braced for the unwelcome embrace of Hurricane Gloria.

Two K-State professors, who own property on the East Coast, also have cause for concern.

The hurricane has a chance to become the first this century to smash with full force into the heart of the nation's most populous metropolitan area.

The probability of the storm hitting New York increased 10 percent Thursday "because the storm's stayed on course, and it's closer to New York than it was Wednesday," Edward Yandrich of the National Weather Service in Manhattan, said.

He said it appeared the storm would take one of three courses: inland to the west of the city, losing its strength as it passed over land; out to sea east of the city; or along the coast, maintaining its strength and heading directly through New York City.

The latter would be the most destructive path, Yandrich said.

Neil Frank, head of the National Hurricane Center, said the metropolitan area had not been hit by the full force of a hurricane in this century.

He said forecasters expected to know which course the storm would take around dawn today. At the same time, the storm's effects — heavy rain and strong winds — be felt.

No matter which path Gloria takes, "It's not going to be pleasant day," he said.

At 5 p.m. Thursday, the center of Gloria was near latitude 32.6 north, longitude 76.4 west, 190 miles south of Cape Hatteras, moving north at 20 mph. The storm's forward motion was expected to accelerate, and a hurricane watch was issued from Plymouth to Eastport, Maine, in addition to the hurricane warning.

It was expected to move across eastern North Carolina early today and move up the coast toward New England as the day progressed. Tides up to 12 feet above normal were predicted near where Gloria's center hits the coast.

There was an 82 percent chance the eye would pass within 65 miles of Morehead City, N.C., by 1 p.m. Friday, with Cape Hatteras at 78 percent; Norfolk, Va., at 66 percent; Ocean City, at 50 percent; Atlantic City, N.J., 39 percent; Wilmington, N.C., 31 percent; and New York City, 23 percent.

Gloria, once with 150 mph winds and among only five known Category 5 storms, weakened to 130 mph and was on the borderline between Class 3 and 4, said Robert E. Muller, chief meterologist at the weather service forecasting center at Raleigh-Durham Airport. A Class 5 hurricane is capable of catastrophic damage.

Ken Donovan, associate professor of history, and William Siddall, professor of geography, both own property on the East Coast.

Donovan owns a house in Massachusetts on Plum Island in the mouth of the Merrimack River. The river runs through New Hampshire and Massachusetts and empties into the Atlantic Ocean. The house was built around the turn of the century and was owned by his grandmother.

Dovovan said the 1,000 island inhabitants have been advised to leave and take refuge in a neighboring city.

Blue Key names six finalists for ambassadors program

By the Collegian Staff

The six finalists for the Blue Key Ambassadors Program were announced Thursday by Barry Shotts, junior in nuclear engineering and head of the ambassador program.

The three female finalists are: Vickie Lavezzi, sophomore in business administration; Lori Shellenberger, sophomore in political science; and Rise Frank, sophomore in business administration.

The three male finalists are: Randy Regehr, junior in mechanical engineering; Jeff Suttle, sophomore in business administration; and Terry Hallauer, sophomore in business administration.

Tami Barham, senior in social science, and Will Kirk, senior in agricultural economics, are the current ambassadors.

The finalists were chosen on the basis of general applications, interviews with student leaders and interviews with faculty. Students will vote on the finalists Oct. 2, 3 and 4.

One male and one female will be chosen to represent K-State. The winners will be announced during halftime at the K-State-University of Oklahoma football game Oct. 5. Shotts said the representatives serve one full year as ambassador.

"The ambassadors work very closely with the alumni officer," Shotts said. "They travel all over the state to alumni functions and keep alumni up to date on things going on at K-State — in terms of things like the coliseum.

"They are the liaison between the alumni and the student."

Medical aid 'inappropiate' for fatally ill

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Gov. Richard D. Lamm, who has said terminally ill people have "a duty to die" says giving expensive, heroic medical treatment to AIDS victims is inappropriate because the disease is always fatal.

"There are two types of AIDS patients," he told doctors and nurses Wednesday during a discussion at the University of Colorado Health Sciences Center on rising health-care costs.

"Either you're 'dying' or, you're 'dead,'" Lamm said. "If there's no chance of any (successful) outcome, then you can't order up every possible (medical) service."

Lamm said he did not begrudge AIDS patients treatment "that is medically indicated. If the treatment will relieve pain, add quality of life, or be of medical benefit, I'm all for providing it.

"Given the limited number of health-care dollars we have, money might be better spent on research into finding a cure for the disease, rather than on needlessly cruel and expensive treatment," he said.

In a speech on March 27, 1984, Lamm said people who are terminally ill have a "duty to die and get out of the way" instead of trying to prolong their lives by artificial means.

People who die without having their lives artifically extended are similar to "leaves falling off a tree and forming humus for the other plants to grow up," he said.

Faculty seeks active future role

Planning problems spark interest

By SUE DAWSON
Staff Writer

Concern by a former University architect and the Board of Regents about planning of the $16.1 million Fred Bramlage Coliseum is sparking interest among some faculty to take a visible role in planning future campus buildings.

Robert Jackson, associate professor of architecture and former University planner, said the quality of K-State's faculty is such that they could assist in the planning of on-campus buildings.

"All the expertise is right there," Jackson said. "It's apparent he (President Duane Acker) didn't think about using them."

Jackson said the College of Business Administration could have conducted a market study for the coliseum, which would provide a social, economic and demographic profile of the Manhattan community; and a cash flow study that would provide a picture of the annual revenues and expenses of the building.

The College of Architecture and Design could have been consulted on the coliseum's interior programming and the College of Engineering on a traffic study, he said, and both colleges could have been involved in the site selection.

Several regents at the Sept. 20 meeting in Topeka expressed concern about the quality of professional advice solicited by the University for the planning of the coliseum.

Following two hours of discussion and a 7-1 vote, the original plan to construct a 16,000-seat structure was scrapped, and the architecture firm of Gossen Livingston Associates, Wichita, was given permission to reduce the size by 2,500 seats.

Regent Wendell Lady, a supporter of the coliseum and an architectural engineer, said during the meeting: "The (coliseum) planning has given me concern throughout the whole thing."

Regents John Montgomery, Junction City; Norman Brandeberry, Russell; Patricia Caruthers, Kansas City, Kan.; Lawrence Jones, Wichita; and Dr. Bill Roy, Topeka, also expressed reservations about the University's planning process.

Mark Lapping, dean of the architecture college since August 1984, said faculty in the college could be used as consultants on building projects such as the coliseum.

Lapping said he would like to see consultation between the architecture and engineering colleges, the University planning office and Univeristy facilities.

He said he is optimistic about the Tuesday arrival of Larry Gavin, who has been hired to replace Jackson as director of facility planning. Jackson's contract was not renewed by the University when it expired June 17.

Lapping said he would like to be consulted on campus planning, but responsibility for formulating plans must remain with officials in the planning office.

"We want to participate, but we don't want to be campus planner, campus architect and campus landscape

Girl accuses 'real animals' in beating

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A 17-year-old girl of mixed race whose face was bruised and swollen said Thursday that five officers, behaving like "real animals," beat her for no reason in a Cape Town police station.

The charges came the day after a judge barred policemen from assaulting prisoners in two other Cape Province cities, Port Elizabeth and Uitenhage, where other allegations of brutality have been made during more than a year of protest against white-minority rule.

Cape Town police said they fired on a crowd from which a gasoline bomb was thrown at a police station, killing a 15-year-old black youth. A policeman in the Ciskei tribal homeland shot and killed a black man who was in a threatening mob, authorities there said.

Police headquarters reported a dozen riot incidents during the day, mainly rock-throwing and arson, and said 45 black men were arrested for "public violence" in Queenstown in eastern Cape Province.

Finance Minister Barend du Plessis said in Pretoria that a leading Swiss banker, Fritz Leutwiler, would help the government renegotiate its foreign debt of $24 billion and major creditors had agreed to Leutwiler's

Possible 20 dead in militia fighting

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Rival militias battled from Tripoli in the north to Sidon in the south Thursday, killing at least 20 people. Delegates of Christian and Moslem factions met in Syria seeking an end to the decade-long civil war.

Israeli warplanes attacked a Palestinian guerrilla base in the Syrian-controlled Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, about four miles west of Baalbek near Majdaloun.

The state radio said the raid occurred at about midnight and lasted eight minutes. There was no immediate word on casualties.

Two British women were kidnapped by gunmen from an apartment building in Moslem west Beirut. Security sources identified them as Hazel Moss, a restaurant owner, and Amanda McGrath, an English language teacher at the American University of Beirut.

The apartment house concierge said at least three gunmen took them from the building. There was no immediate indication who seized them.

Eleven other Westerners, all men, are held by kidnappers in Lebanon — six Americans, four Frenchmen and a Briton.

The military command in Tel Aviv said its attacking jets scored hits in the area of a two-story building used by the guerrillas, but did not say whether the building was hit.

Bomb blast kills 3 in New Delhi

NEW DELHI, India — A bomb exploded early Sunday near the railroad station of the capital, killing three people, police said.

A spokesman at the police control room said the explosion occurred in the city's Old Delhi section, but had no further details. He spoke on condition he not be identified.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility.

Some people were injured in the blast, the United News of India news agency reported, without giving details.

UNI said police also recovered booby-trapped transistor radios from the area, but police did not immediately confirm that other bombs were found.

Last May, 85 people were killed in northern India in a series of bombings blamed on Sikh terrorists. The bombs were planted in identical transistor radios.

The Sunday explosion took place after police conducted raids in the capital and Punjab to flush out Sikh terrorists before Wednesday's elections in Punjab.

Kansan gets Congressional Award

WASHINGTON — A Kansas medical student was honored Thursday with a gold Congressional Award for his community service and personal achievement.

Kevin Hoppock, 21, of Wichita, is the first resident of the state to be given the award, which is the highest civilian honor by Congress for excellence by youth in voluntary public service and personal development.

Hoppock, a student at the University of Kansas School of Medicine, was selected because he devoted 1,795 hours to "voluntary community service, personal development and physical fitness programs" during the past three years, according to Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, who presented the medal.

Hoppock was one of 115 people from 22 states to be honored at the ceremony.

Corporation will pay off deposits

TOPEKA — The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. said it will pay off insured depositors in the closed Sedan State Bank because no bids were received to purchase the bank by Thursday's deadline.

The bank was the 11th in the state and 83rd nationally to close this year.

The FDIC said the bank, which was declared insolvent Wednesday by Kansas Bank Commissioner Eugene T. Barrett Jr., had deposits of about $24.3 million in 4,500 accounts. The FDIC estimated that all but about $14,000 of the deposits in eight acounts were within the federal insurance limit of $100,000 or were otherwise secured.

The federal agency said the owners of uninsured deposits would share proportionately with the FDIC the proceeds from liquidation of the bank's assets.

Diane Dierks, a closing manager for the FDIC, said earlier that the bank's failure was mainly the result of bad oil and cattle loans. She said lax lending and collection practices also contributed to loan losses that exceeded the bank's capital.

Sedan, about 80 miles southeast of Wichita with a population of 1,600, is the county seat of Chautauqua County. The bank is the 18th to fail in the state during the last 21 months.

Museum to exhibit Coke space can

ATLANTA — A specially designed can that carried Coca-Cola on the July space shuttle ion will be displayed at the Smithsonian Institution's space museum later this year, the Coca-Cola Co. announced Thursday.

The company issued a statement by Walter J. Boyne, director of the Smithsonian's National Air and Space Museum, saying the can will be part of a new exhibit on space food to be opened in Washington Dec. 5.

The can, developed by Coca-Cola's technical division, was tested by the crew of the space shuttle Challenger during its July flight. A can developed for Pepsi Cola also was tested on that flight.

Air Force missile launch successful

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — An unarmed Minuteman 3 missile was successfully launched in an operational test Thursday, reaching its target 4,200 miles away in the Pacific Ocean, an Air Force spokesman said.

The 1:25 a.m. launch was the 111th in a series of test launches of the Minuteman 3 weapons systems, said 1st Lt. Tom Pander.

After a flight of about 30 minutes, the unarmed re-entry vehicles were tracked to their targets in the Kwajalein missile range, Pander said.

The launch culminated more than three months of work by a task force from Minot Air Force Base, N.D. The 28-person team followed the miss ile through its removal from operational alert, transportation to Vandenberg and its launch from the base 140 miles northwest of Los Angeles.

Senate votes 86-13 for 'Superfund'

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Thursday for a $7.5 billion "Superfund" bill that would expand the toxic waste cleanup effort through a new manufacturers tax that is strongly opposed by the White House.

But the bill's floor manager, Sen. Robert Stafford, R-Vt., said the size of the 86-13 vote to renew Superfund through 1990 was a clear message there is enough support to override a threatened presidential veto.

The Senate bill, calling for a nearly fivefold expansion of a program begun in 1980 with a five-year budget of $1.6 billion, went to the House with less than five days remaining before expiration of the current law's taxing authority.

Thief leaves vehicle at airport lot

FALMOUTH, Mass. — At least one Cape Cod car thief has a heart.

On Sept. 17, a 1980 Chevrolet Chevette was stolen from a parking lot in Woods Hole a few miles southwest of Falmouth. Three days ago, the car's owner received a postcard with a Canadian postmark.

The writer thanked the owner for the use of his car and said he could retrieve it at the Newark, N.J., airport's north terminal, Lot 3.

"It has a full tank of gas and is in good shape," the postcard said. "Sorry for the inconvenience. Thank you very much."

Falmouth police Detective Sgt. Richard Corey said Wednesday that he contacted authorities at Newark Airport and, sure enough, the car was where the thief said it would be.

Europeans receive Southern treats

ALBANY, Ga. — They sampled peanut pie and beer, and stumbled on a snake at a cookout. But a group of European businessmen touring the south Georgia peanut belt drew the line at grits.

Four Germans and three Frenchman are on a state-sponsored tour aimed at promoting Georgia's top cash crop this week.

The snake startled some of the guests at a cookout Monday night hosted by Georgia Peanut Commission Chairman Wilbur Gamble that featured steak and peanut pie. Hartmut Mueller, managing director of the German peanut purchaser Imko-Nuss, stumbled on the serpent near Gamble's swimming pool.

The uninvited guest turned out to be a harmless rat snake, and was hustled away.

The next morning, the group was treated to a breakfast that included that Southern staple, grits. But Mueller was the only one who sampled the cereal made from corn.

"I find it not so bad, but you see I'm the only one who eats it," Mueller said with a laugh.

Correction

Due to an editing error in Thursday's story, "Dole backs ag research legislation," the function of the International Grains Program was misstated. The program's goal is to provide participants with training in the processing and handling of U.S. Food and Feed Grain commodities and utilization of their end products, and with information on the U.S. marketing system. The program is also intended to encourage expansion of existing markets and the development of new markets for U.S. agricultural grain commodities.

Years of study wind down

Duo completing alfalfa work

By BOB SCHEIBLER
Collegian Reporter

Three K-State professors are completing 20 years of work in developing a strain of alfalfa resistant to eight pests and diseases.

Ernst Horber, professor of entomology, Don Stuteville, professor of plant pathology and Edgar Sorensen, professor of agronomy have been working as a team on the project.

Although the professors have been working on the project for a considerable time, they say the project will probably never end.

"It is a never-ending project when you start on plant improvement," Sorensen said.

"Germplasm" is the generic term for an improved seed released by the researchers when they feel the work they have been done will be of use to other researchers and breeders. A "variety" is a strain developed by a breeder using the germplasm. When researchers release germplasm they usually know the work they have done will be improved in the next year or two, Sorensen said.

The germplasm the team has developed is resistant to the diseases anthracnose, bacterial wilt, downy mildew, Fusarium wilt and Phytophthora root rot; as well as to the insects blue alfalfa aphids, pea aphids and spotted alfalfa aphids.

"This spring we have discovered a new disease in Kansas that is severe — Verticillium wilt. Kansas was the farthest south in the United States that the disease had been encountered, so this is another disease that we will begin working on resistance for," Stuteville said.

"We have been encouraged by the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station and the United States Department of Agriculture to release germplasm to breeders so that they can devolop varieties for their particular areas. We are working on resistance to the things that plague the crop here in the southern Great Plains. The diseases bother us here, but at the same time they are bothering crops in other areas even in other countries," Sorensen said.

"To get the maximum production for a variety, you work with a relatively small area, but with the germplasm, you can select resistance that is effective for the particular area that you are working in. The southern Great Plains area is affected by basically one set of diseases and pests," Sorensen said.

The diseases or insects affect the plants in different ways, either by reducing the yield or killing the plants altogether. Some of the diseases produce a toxin that is harmful to livestock.

The important part of this project, is that alfalfa is primarily used for dairy cattle feed. Fungicides and pesticides cannot be used on alfalfa that will be fed to dairy cattle because the chemicals in the pesticides will be passed on in the milk. When a plant is resistant to the pests and diseases no pesticides or fungicides need to be used, Stuteville said.

"People don't understand how difficult it is to get resistant to eight pests. It is very difficult. That is why it has taken 20 years of work to get to the point where we are now," Stuteville said.

ASK introduces financial aid bills

By MARY ROEHL
Collegian Reporter

Two bills to gain financial aid for students were introduced to the Kansas Legislative Educational Planning Committee Sept. 11 by John L. Allen, director of legislative affairs for the Associated Students of Kansas.

One of the resolutions calls for a teacher scholarship program. The bill is intended to award financial assistance to students entering into an education curriculum. The scholarship will be awarded on the basis of academic merit. All Kansas colleges and universities with an education curriculum will be eligible for the scholarship.

Kevin Elmore, senior in computer science and ASK campus director, said the scholarships are actually awarded in the form of loans, which are then considered void if the student remains in Kansas to teach after being certified.

"We're losing teachers from Kansas who are going to other states," Elmore said. "In comparison to other states around us we have lower teacher salaries."

Elmore said 14 states have already created programs like this and other states are considering implementing similar programs.

Favorable committee action on the bill is anticipated because of the demand for new teachers, the anticipated shortages of teachers in the state and the high cost of education, Allen said.

The Board of Regents Distinguished Scholarship program bill is intended to award scholarships to the approximately 125 national merit semi-finalists in Kansas each year. This scholarship is not limited to Board of Regents schools. Independent colleges with four-year progams and Washburn University would be eligible. Students receiving the scholarship must attend a Kansas four-year institution.

Elmore said two-thirds of Kansas national merit semi-finalists attend out-of-state schools.

"We lose good people because we aren't promoting our universities," Elmore said.

ASK's legislative assembly members will discuss the legislation at their meeting Sept. 27-28.

Open meetings necessary

The public's right to know is in question with the decision expected to be made regarding closed Council of Student Affairs meetings.

William Sutton, vice president of educational and student services, said he has made no decision whether all student affairs meetings should be open to the public. He said he will discuss the issue at the next meeting of the Council.

The issue of open meetings was a problem during the alleged hazing incident involving the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, 1632 McCain Lane.

Sutton said he had made the decision that the meetings surrounding the ATO incident should be closed and they will continue to be closed.

With Sutton's earlier decision to make the meeting closed to the public, the proceedings charging and hearing the appeals of the ATOs went on behind closed doors.

Jeff Southard, assistant to the Kansas attorney general, said this case is much like one involving the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity at the University of Kansas.

Although both fraternity cases involved public matters, the case falls under the Buckley Amendment — which states administrators cannot discuss matters of students — and one of the six exceptions to the Kansas open meetings law.

Southard said that in matters relating to students at public institutions there is an exception to the open meetings law. He also said the details surrounding the SAE incident in Lawrence were never made public, and may never be.

Sutton said the University "trys to protect those who are charged as well as those who are charging" and the students involved did not want the meeting to be open to the public.

He said the future of the organization and the future of the young men involved was at stake and he felt this incident can best be handled in the meeting and not in the media.

If the charges are against a student organization, the public has a right to know the facts. The duty of the press is to act as a check on government.

Not only should the state reevaluate the open meetings law and its six exceptions, but University officials should be encouraged to pass policies that make matters concerning students open to the public.

Sutton came to the University to be a administrator for the students, but making policies that prohibit students from gaining information about activities, specifically those of student organizations, is not to the benefit of students.

Ship bombing terrorism

On July 10, Greenpeace's ship, the Rainbow Warrior, was bombed in the Auckland, New Zealand harbor and the ship's photographer was killed. The Warrior was preparing to lead a peaceful protest flotilla to France's nuclear weapons testing grounds in the South Pacific.

Investigations have recently revealed that senior French officials knew about — and may even have authorized — the operation.

Although no one seems to be absolutely sure who gave the order to deal with the Greenpeace ship, fingers have been pointing at officials all the way up to French President Francois Mitterrand.

On Sunday, government officials admitted that agents from the General Directorate for External Security (the French secret service) were responsible for carrying out the operation.

Prime Minister Laurent Fabius said he believed the former defense minister and former head of the secret service "acted under the impulse of their own idea that what they were doing was in the interest of our country."

Even Fabius, who insisted France will never bow to pressure to stop its nuclear testing, is not cleared of guilt in the matter. Michel Noir, a neo-Gaullist deputy, said, "the lies continue. Laurent Fabius knew all about this, and he has denied it."

Greenpeace is an international organization which seeks to prevent destruction of the environment. Their tactics have always been non-violent, and they do not present a threat to those who have respect for nature. Responding to their planned peaceful demonstration by bombing the Rainbow Warrior was an act of terrorism.

The government of France must take responsibility for the bombing, the killing and the subsequent cover-up.

University should offer diverse education

DANIEL GRUBB
Collegian Columnist

Occasionally, each of us should sit down and really consider why we are at a university. Inevitably, this leads to the question of what a university is, and even more important, what it should be. The latter question is becoming more important now that University President Duane Acker is heading toward greener pastures and the issue of his successor is appearing.

First, we should ask ourselves what the main purpose of a university is. It is not, as some seem to believe, to have the best basketball team. In my mind the true purpose is obvious. The most important thing is learning.

Now, learning happens, or at least should happen, at two levels. One is at the level of research; the other is at the level of teaching in the classroom. Both are critical to having a true university atmosphere, but the first seems to be more important.

In research, new ideas, knowledge and techniques are developed that are the core of a university's contribution to society. Without this one, essential activity, the university is nothing more than a trade school; the people involved are only distributors of information, not its discoverers.

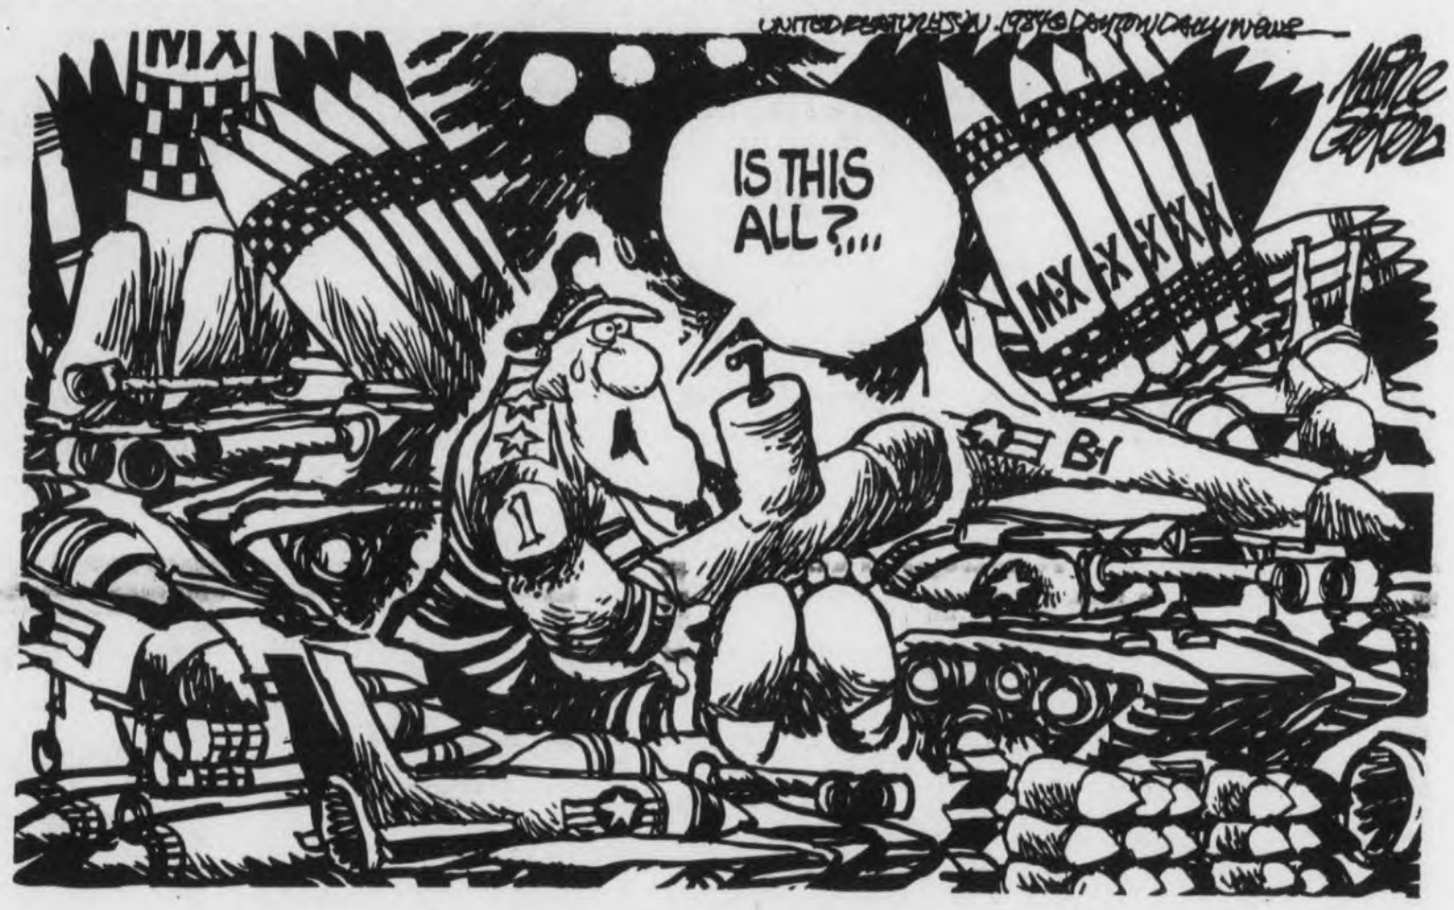
Teaching, on the other hand, is what communicates the fruits of research to those wanting to learn. Teaching is indispensable to train the next generation of professors and investigators.

Of course, training new researchers is not the only use for teaching. Much more obvious to both the majority of students and to the public is the university in the capacity of a trade school.

It is here that many difficulties appear, such as the retention issue. We are funded according to the number of students we teach and keep. Unfortunately, most students are not qualified for the classes they are taking. If we flunk such students, we don't get funded because we don't retain them. If we pass them, we are contributing to the degradation of our educational system. Either way we are criticized.

The final area of teaching is that of direct community service. Professors often act as advisers for businesses in the area or even as counselors for the government.

There are, in addition to learning, several secondary contributions that a university makes to society. A good percentage of the secondary charges can be fitted into the category of "culture." It is in this area that universities are most often condemned as many ideas are corrosive of established wisdom.



In this general category of culture we can see the plays and recitals put on by students, the discussions that occur in the Union concerning world events and all the social influences produced under the umbrella of the university. We can also see several academic courses as serving a secondary purpose in this area. This is why courses in history, psychology, languages, and other areas should be required of every student.

Do I hear moans from the audience?

Yes, I know that many people attending a university are doing so merely to learn a trade. But I feel it to be essential to our society, democratic as it is, to require people to have a minimum understanding of the world around us. This includes a comprehension of the forces that have shaped our society as well as the outlines of current scientific views. The lack of this type of knowledge has devalued our degrees from a statement of a rounded intellectual to a statement of mere technical knowledge.

Finally, the greatest job of a university is to stimulate the curiosity within each of us and to implant a love for the whole landscape of knowledge. A graduate should be able to speak intelligently about history as well as physics regardless of his or her major area of study. To settle for less would be tantamount to accepting a verdict of hopelessness for the human race.

We desperately need scholars of breadth to steer us through the hazards facing us today. The university's job is to produce these scholars. In no other setting is the flux of ideas so strong. We must fight the current trend toward specialization. As someone once said, specialization is for insects. Let's not be insects!

A lesson I learned — a thank-you I owe

RICH HARRIS
Collegian Columnist

I've been around a while now — going on five years — and I've met quite a few interesting characters at K-State. I've made some friends, probably made some enemies and had a pretty good time doing both.

But there is always some person in everyone's life who really makes a difference. Somebody who helps you over the roughest spots and makes the day a lot brighter than it might otherwise be.

These are our friends, our best friends, and we count on them to be there when we need them. They are the people we turn to when it hits the fan, and they are the ones that pull us through when we are ready to pack it in.

I have been lucky enough to have such a friend.

I lived in the dorms for a year before I joined a fraternity. That first semester I went through all the garbage that every freshman does, a little homesick and a wee bit overawed at all the freedom I had. I met a fellow named Mike who was a junior at the time and who seemed to have the respect and friendship of every guy on the wing.

Mike was easy-going, had a dry sense of humor and was always ready to sit down and talk or play cards or watch the game on the tube. He got along well with everybody, even his roommate.

As time went on, I got to know Mike a little better and his philosophy impressed me a great deal. I had never — and still haven't — met anyone as happy just to be himself as Mike.

He didn't complain about much, always had a good word for anyone and knew the right things to say to a freshman getting through his first bad exam or rough time with a coed. Mike was there to be a confidante, adviser and often just a sympathetic ear for me as I bumbled my way through that first year.

Now, I had always had a best friend or two in school; I was used to running around with my partners-in-crime who did not come to K-State with me. I was in the habit of relying a great deal on my friends as a sounding board for my maturity. As we get older, we need our friends to advise and monitor the development of our personality and our philosophy. Without my friends from school, though, I was adrift in a crucial developmental stage...and frankly, I was a little scared.

Mike was there for me as I made some of the hardest decisions of my life, like changing my major. Mike helped me through a protracted period of misery as I wrestled with unrequited love. And as I have slowly, grudgingly gained some insight, Mike has been there to celebrate with me.

One important thing to note is that all along, Mike had most of the answers I have found, but never made any attempt to give those answers to me. The answers to the questions we encounter in life should come from our own experience, not be handed to us by well-meaning individuals who do not realize what they are doing might be detrimental.

Mike has graduated, but lives and works in town, and every so often I see him. It's a lifesaver for me to have a friend with a level head on his shoulders. It helps me maintain some perspective when the chips are down.

Good friends are hard to come by. We seldom realize all that we ask of our friends and take what they give us for granted. We expect our friends to be there when we need them and we expect them to be the same way all the time. When they let us down we are angry and hurt, generally without stopping to think that they have lives, wants, needs and desires of their own. We take so often and give so rarely.

The Lowenbrau ads that show a buddy getting out of bed at 3 a.m. to give you a jumpstart are only part of what I'm talking about. The really important things can't be explained or used to sell beer. The really important things in a friendship not only are hard to say, sometimes there is never any conscious realization that they exist.

When the simple fact is that to be in a friend's presence is sufficient to make a bad day a little better, there is no explaining the reasons or defining the boundaries: it simply is true and all we can do is be grateful.

As we go through life we will have many "best friends." We change our friends as we change our attitudes and meet new problems. There is nothing wrong with changing friends every so often. But when a friend makes an impact on your life, when a friend has helped you grow and made you happier or more able to cope with the rat race — let them know.

Thanks, Mike.

Look at art display; do not touch

Editor,

Re: "Artists exhibit baskets; oils," photo by John Thelander in the Sept. 25 Collegian.

Most people realize that objects in galleries or museums are there to be looked at and not touched. Simply because they are on display does not mean that they are free to be physically examined by everyone who passes by. A perfect case in point was John Thelander's photo depicting a student with her hand on one of the baskets in the Union Art Gallery exhibition.

Seemingly innocent touching or careless treatment can cause considerable damage to works of art, which is sometimes irreparable. Although it is tempting to handle things that are very textural, they are often delicate and cannot withstand such attention. Everyone is welcome to visit the Union gallery and look as long as you like, but if you want to touch, please restrain yourself.

Regents' decision 'appalling,' bill states

Leaders ask for equal representation

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

A resolution calling for equal representation on the presidential search committee was presented to Student Senate Thursday night.

The bill was presented by Mark Jones, senate chairman and senior in management, and Steve Brown, student body president junior in preveterinary medicine.

The resolution states in part that students are "appalled and dismayed" by the Board of Regents' action in adding three alumni to the committee since there was a general understanding there would be equal representation.

The resolution also states that senate should implore the regents to correct the imbalance in order to ensure a selection process which is fair and representative of the "entire University community."

"There was an awful lot of pressure put on the regents by certain factions of the alumni," Jones said. "Certain people wanted certain other people represented on this committee."

Jones said he "realistically" doesn't think there will be a change in the regents' decision. But, he said, it is important to let the regents know about student dissatisfaction with the decision.

Representatives from student senate will attend the special faculty senate meeting Oct. 1 when the equal representation will be addressed.

Senate also heard first reading of a bill closing the 1984-85 accounts of University groups and allowing certain groups to retain monies left in their accounts at the end of the fiscal year. The legislation is sponsored by Senate Finance Committee.

Monies left in accounts totaled $12,013.47. These funds will be shifted to Student Governing Association's Reserves for Contingencies Account.

Groups who appealed to retain money in their accounts are: International Coordinating Council; U-LearN; Graduate Student Council; Arts and Sciences College Council; Student Governing Association; and Shuttle Service. Monies in these accounts totaled $1,804.52.

Senate also heard a bill, sponsored by Senate Operations Standing Committee, to revise SGA's by-laws.

The revision states that should a senator be elected senate chairman, the college left without representation will appoint a new senator.

Senate approved Paul Nelson, sophomore in pre-nursing, as coordinator of the FONE Crisis Center and Carrie Brewer, graduate in education, as the assistant coordinator of the center.

Senate also approved 14 delegates for the Sept. 28 Associated Students of Kansas Legislative Assembly in Wichita.

The delegates will take part in the two-day assembly, at Wichita State University. The purpose of the meeting is to debate policy issues and prepare legislative action.

Home Ec to sponsor 1985 Careers Day

By The Collegian Staff

The College of Home Economics will sponsor Careers Day Saturday, in an effort to recruit prospective students.

Students from across Kansas interested in careers related to home economics have been invited to explore careers in art, business, science, human services and home economics at the 1985 Careers Day.

"Careers Day is an event that we plan to bring high school students on campus to learn about the programs of study in the College of Home Economics and to explore the career opportunities available," said Karen Pence, assistant to the dean of home economics and coordinator of the event.

Invitations to Careers Day were sent to business, art, science and home economics teachers and to counselors in all Kansas high schools, Pence said.

Pence said students attending Careers Day are able to choose two of 10 career sessions designed to inform students about areas in home economics study.

The sessions include apparel and textile marketing; apparel design; consumer affairs; dietetics, foods and nutrition; family and child development; home economics education; housing and home equipment; interior design; and restaurant management and textiles.

Church to hold walk for hunger relief

By JOHN WALKER JR.
Collegian Reporter

The Rev. Bob Ford of the Blue Valley United Methodist Church, 835 Church Ave., is excited about a hunger relief walk.

The Christian Rural Overseas Program (CROP) walk will be held Sunday starting at the First United Methodist Church, 612 Poyntz Ave. The walk is organized to raise funds locally for Church World Service, an international relief, development and refuge resettlement agency comprised of more than 30 Protestant and Orthodox communities in the United States.

Ford, who is serving as publicity person for CROP, said the organization started after World War II, primarily to send farm products overseas to help in relief efforts after the war.

Ford's church is one of 10 in the area plus several campus ministry groups, a group from Fort Riley and interested citizens participating in the campaign against world hunger.

"This non-profit organzation sends food to more than 70 countries," Ford said. Development assistance, in addition to the distribution of food, helps to aid the receiving nations create a better quality of life, he said.

The funds raised during the walk come from sponsors pledges gathered by participants. The sponsors promise various amounts of money for each mile the participant travels. Participants can choose routes of two, five or 10 miles in length and may either walk, jog or ride bicycles. Disabled persons may wheel their wheelchairs to raise funds.

"It's evolved from a walk to people even riding bikes for so much a mile," Ford said.

For the five years Ford has been involved, there have been more than 200 participants each year. Ford said the campaign also helps locally.

"A lot of the money is going into Kansas wheat, (which is) purchased and taken to countries that need it," Ford said. Twenty-five percent of the funds raised come back to Manhattan to assist Manhattan Community Gardens and the Breadbasket program. Last year more than $2,000 was raised locally.

Registration will start at 1:15 p.m., with a starting time of 2 p.m. The walk is supported by the Manhattan REACT Citizens Band Radio Group, the Riley County Police Department and McDonalds.

Interested persons should contact Harris Bredsen at 539-3007 or Randi Dale at 539-5767.

Rescuers search for quake victims

Students' friends in Mexico City safe

By TONI OGLESBY
Collegian Reporter

While rescue workers search through the rubble and debris in Mexico City from last week's two devastating earthquakes, at least three students know their Mexican friends are safe.

The earthquakes that struck Mexico City Sept. 19-20 left more than 3,000 people dead, more than 4,000 missing and many more injured.

Kathy Conradt, junior in modern languages; Deana Hensley, sophomore in psychology; and Sarah Kessinger, junior in journalism and mass communications, lived in Mexico City during the summer and studied at the Universidad de Iberoamericano. While there, they met and became close friends with Hector de Haro, Enrique Ramirez Hernandez and Arturo Mejia Gandolffi, all of Mexico City.

The six friends kept in close contact through letters and telephone calls, after Conradt, Hensley and Kessinger returned to the United States in August.

"I first heard about the earthquake Thursday evening when I was watching the news — I was on campus all day," Conradt said. "I was frantic."

She and Hensley immediately went to Kessinger's house where they watched the news until late in the evening.

"We had been at all the places that they were showing on TV," Conradt said.

They kept trying to direct-dial their friends' telephone numbers, but were unable to get an answer. Each time they tried to get through, they heard the recording: "Due to the earthquake in Mexico City, your call cannot be completed at this time."

Conradt found out from a television news report about a Red Cross number that people could call to find out the status of their families and friends. The three students called and requested information about their friends and the families they lived with while in Mexico City. The Red Cross told them they could notify them in two or three days, but the Red Cross was unable to obtain any information.

Early Tuesday afternoon Hensley was asked to accept a collect call from Mexico City. She accepted and heard a female voice say, "Enrique, Hector y Arturo, todos estan bien." This translates to "Enrique, Hector and Arturo — they're all fine."

Hensley immediately called Conradt and Kessinger to tell them the good news. Hensley said the call came from a secretary of a business owned by a friend of Hernandez.

"All we know is that those three are all right," Conradt said. "That's all we know."

They still haven't received any information about the families they lived with during the summer in Mexico City.

'Creator' lacks imagination, wanders off track

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

It's getting difficult to keep straight all the new movies about young scientists. Summer releases included "Weird Science," "My Science Project" and "Real Genius." Now there's a new film to add to this group — "Creator" — but it's the most unimaginative of the bunch.

It's a little bit of "Frankenstein" and "M*A*S*H" and a lot of "Love Story" and "My Favorite Year." It is pieced together from so many different films that no room is left for any original ideas. Everything about the movie is old and tired. At times it starts moving, but always in the wrong direction, like a senile old man. And it never gets back on track. It wanders between the maudlin and the irreverent, but never gets anywhere.

Peter O'Toole plays a professor, a Nobel Prize-winning scientist, who takes a new graduate student under his wing and teaches him about "The Big Picture."

Film Review

O'Toole is trying to bring back his wife, who died some 30 years earlier. He has preserved a few of her cells so he can clone her. He steals equipment from the university and sets up a backyard laboratory where he will grow his wife in a glass bubble.

Vincent Spano is the young graduate student who assists O'Toole. He falls in love with another young graduate student, but she has a possibly fatal illness. There are subplots thrown in by the dozen. O'Toole must fight with a rival professor (David Ogden Steirs) who wants the cantankerous O'Toole shipped off to a research center that is a sort of old-age home for scientists.

And then there's Mariel Hemingway, who falls madly in love with O'Toole. She just hangs around so she can flash her chest at a football game.

With the exception of Steirs, who's the bad guy, everyone in this movie is so sincere that they're sickening. Everyone is either all good or all bad. There's no in between. Spano mugs for the camera like a love-struck little boy, but he's supposed to be an intelligent young man. His love is so pure that he becomes nothing short of a saint. The only time love like this is seen is in soap operas.

Peter O'Toole walks through his role, simply doing the same shtick he did in "My Favorite Year." In that movie his irreverence worked because he was playing off his own image.

But in "Creator," his irreverence isn't the irreverence of a scientist. His performance is light and fluffy. The movie offers nothing to convince us that this man knows the slightest thing about science. At one point O'Toole gets to make a speech about the research his university is planning, but just as he starts to speak the camera cuts away.

"Creator" is cute in the worst sense of the word; it simplifies life until everything good is saccharin sweet.

Justin Hall rededication honors merger

By The Collegian Staff

Justin Hall is being rededicated at 1 p.m. Saturday to celebrate the merger of the College of Home Economics with Extension Home Economics in Kansas.

Dedication events will emphasize renewal of the college's mission of research and instruction.

Mary Nell Greenwood, administrator for cooperative extension for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, will be the keynote speaker for the rededication ceremony, said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Home Economics.

Greenwood is the top official in the United States in extension, over agriculture and home economics extension.

"We're very pleased to have her come to the campus and not only rededicate the building, but rededicate it to its new function (the merger of the college with home economics)" Stowe said.

Other events include a ribbon-cutting ceremony, a luncheon, tours of the newly renovated Justin Hall, the annual home economics alumni meeting and a home economics careers day for potential students.

The merger will benefit both the College of Home Economics and Extension Home Economics, she said.

"The programs just become stronger if the extension specialists who are faculty members are part of the departmental faculties, therefore helping communication," Stowe said.

"In terms of information it strengthens research programs because the extension people can bring the needs of the state to the campus to help determine what research areas we ought to pursue. So the communication simply strengthens all of the programs, extension research and instruction," Stowe said.

Another benefit from the merger is that students in home economics will benefit from increased opportunities for internships, she said.

"If students want to do this kind of thing (interning) and make their interests known, the likelihood is very good that they can be accommodated," Stowe said.

The merger, completed in 1984, began in 1983 when President Duane Acker established the combination of Extension Home Economics with the College of Home Economics as one of his goals. A 14-member representative committee of campus staff and users of Kansas home economics extension then worked out a plan for the merger that was recommended to Acker and other administrators.

Handicapped artist expresses himself with sense for color

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

There's an artist in the family, that's evident. Window shades, bed sheets, wall hangings and mobiles from the ceiling illustrate John Becker's works.

Rainbow colored markers and pens are lined aside his sketch pad and his entire attention and concentration lie on the blocks of color he is creating. Now and then he snacks on a piece of cheese or wanders in his room to look at some of his previous drawings.

Artist pads are stashed between shelves displaying a collection of elephants. And, as in some boys' rooms, trophies, medals and ribbons decorate the walls. The difference is that John's ribbons were awarded by the Kansas Association for Retarded Citizens. He's 27 years old and has Downs Syndrome.

At the age of four, Georgia Becker, John's mother, said she thought she had turned John off of coloring with crayons because she kept wanting him to stay in the lines. His hand would go limp and he would drop the crayon, she said. When he was 15, John came home from Sunday school with a piece of paper covered with green crayon and it was grass, she said.

"He began to want crayons. I got smart and gave him crayons and paper with no lines," Becker said. "I thought that it was nice that he found something he liked to do. I didn't think of it as art."

It wasn't until John took an introduction to the arts class that he was taken seriously as an artist, Becker said.

"When she (Diane Dollar, art instructor) collected the papers she picked out John's as the best in the class," Becker said. "Then we began considering him to have some talent."

Becker said Dollar influenced her to encourage John to pursue his artistic ablilities.

"He's developed his own style," Becker said. "I do take him to see art galleries and exhibits and he gets visibly interested in the abstract pieces," she said.

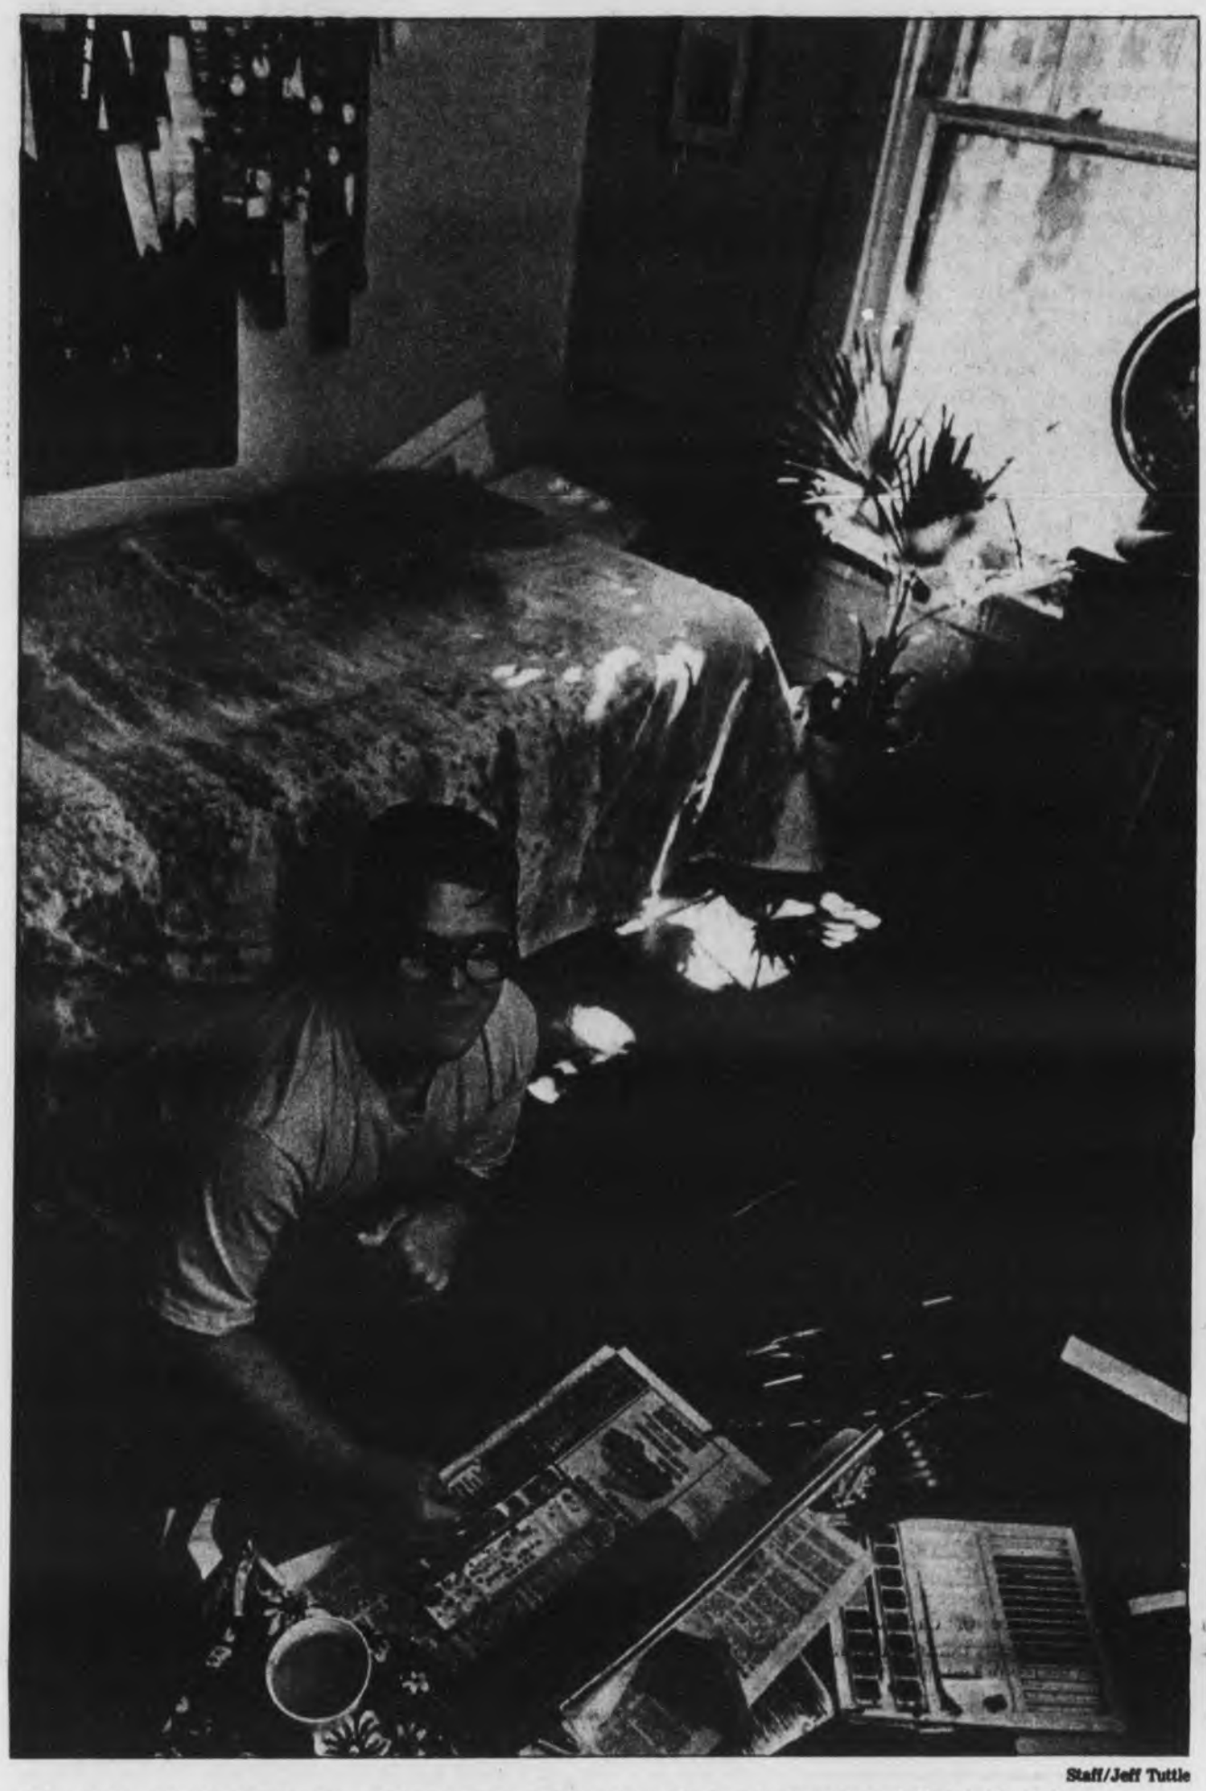
On his own, John has mixed media such as markers, ink pen and colored pencils, Becker said. He gets thoughts and ideas and goes through various phases, she said.

"Now he's in a stripe phase, where everything he does is basically one stroke," Becker said. "I have no idea where it came from."

John's mother works with him melting crayons, cutting out stencils and ironing or sewing, but he has the sixth sense when it comes to colors, she said.

"He has a marvelous memory and is very industrious," Becker said. Even when they are visiting friends John knows where to look for pens and pencils, she said. He'll mix all his markers together with their markers, but when it's time to go he always knows which markers are his and which ones are not, Becker said.

Drawing and painting are activities John does every day, for hours at a time, Becker said. Even on trips, such as last year's trip to Oregon to visit John's brother, John didn't go without his pad. He remembered the colors of the desert or ocean and then identified the appropriate colors and began to reproduce the color schemes, Becker said.



Although John brings out all his pads, colored pencils and markers every day, he doesn't go to bed until he has put everything away again, Becker said.

Through a process of melting crayons and ironing the crayon drops smooth, John, together with his mother, creates designs on blouses, doilies and tea towels. The Beckers sell these items out of their house and have shown them at art fairs and art exhibitions in the Manhattan area.

"When you find a specialty for your child and see him work or perform, then he's not retarded," John's mother said. "He has the same concentration and involvement as any artist would."

It's beginning to occur to those who work with the mentally handicapped that they have hidden potential in a specific field, Becker said.

"They're in the performing arts, dance and tennis," Becker said, "and John, well he has his art."

Theme lacks sparkle

Play overshadows players' abilities

By LISA BOOTHE
Collegian Reviewer

"Why was I born if it wasn't forever...What a joke, What a farce," the king says in the K-State Players' production "Exit the King," by Eugene Ionesco. I can't help but agree with him.

This one act conveyed one and only one emotion — exasperation — and the audience responded predictably to the evocation.

The real shame of the evening was not that the play itself was an incredible bore, but that the talent of the players was wasted on this vacant vehicle. But perhaps this is when actors shine when contrasted to dull, repetitive lines and a lackluster theme.

The play opens with the announcement that King Berenger the First is a dying man, and the next two hours seem an endless episode whereby the king denies, then accepts, then tosses and turns under the falling canopy of his kingdom and his life.

It's rather like happening into the I.C.U. ward during a code blue, but the patient is one whom we know little and care even less about.

Before the king can die "on schedule," he must abdicate the throne, not merely the throne of his kingdom, but the throne of his soul as well. He must do this item by item, giving up the things he craved most in life.

On the positive side, the two principal actors deserve considerable admiration.

Douglas Dickey played the king in a surprisingly professional performance from a freshman newcomer to the players. He brought vitality to the king in spite of the king's endless clamor.

Kelli Wondra, as Queen Marguerite, had by far the most stage presence. Queen Marguerite is an odd mixture of sarcasm, realism and cynicism who acts as a sort of midwife to death. She escorts the king into his afterworld with a compassion she never showed him in his mortal life.

When absurdism is done well, it produces a sobreity that is disquieting and far-reaching. Albee does it well. Ionesco does not appear so skilled in this version of his 1962 French play.

We leave not disquieted about the strangeness of life, but disgruntled about our seeming lack of response to what was supposed to be so deep.

This is a general objection to absurdism. It sets itself up beyond criticism because anything goes within its elastic boundaries. Yet its intentional monotony seems pointless.

Because the set was simple, and rightly so for this genre, some added blocking would pep the tempo a bit. There is even room for taking liberties with the understated humor. The players would do well with this freedom and the college audience would be quite responsive.

This criticism is not to say the play has no value. In fact, director Charles W. Edwards gave considerable dynamism to the dry-bone script.

But regardless of talent, it is difficult to rev Ionesco's play to the energetic caliber to which the Manhattan audience has become accustomed.

"Singer of Songs," Cleo Laine performs a Thursday night concert in McCain Auditorium.

Singer dazzles crowd with energy

By LINDA SCHMIDT
Arts and Entertainment Editor

World-renowned vocalist Cleo Laine, with conductor-composer husband John Dankworth and the Dankworth Quartet, performed a mixture of ballads, jazzed-up ballads and jazz numbers Thursday night in McCain Auditorium. The performance opened the Crystal Anniversary Season for McCain Auditorium.

Dankworth, born outside London, has long been famous in other countries. In his worldwide travels, he said, he "collects" states. The crowd applauded when he said Kansas was his 35th.

Instrumentals and ballads flowed effortlessly from the quartet as they prepared the audience for the star attraction.

In their 15-minute warm-up they played "Princess," a soft and but energizing ballad.

"We're just the wandering minstrels who accompany you-know-who," Dankworth said. And without delay introduced his wife, Cleo Laine.

Laine sent out a curious aura. She was powerful and radiant, yet she could also be timidly demanding. Laine's white floor-length scallop-hemmed dress twirled with her and followed her moves as she made the stage floor her own.

She sang loud and low, soft and sexy. She won the audience with her enchanting voice.

Themes of loves and lovers drifted through the songs "Oh Mistress Mine, Where are You Roaming?," and "Shall I Compare You to a Summer's Day?." Laine could get a smile or a laugh from an audience member with her facial expressions and likeability.

She told the audience her albums were the kind to play when you're at home alone and starting to get depressed. Her songs talked about wonderful weekends followed by Monday missing-you blues.

A humorous, enjoyable "Macbeth," was her finale.

Laine was eager to give audience approval to Dankworth, and he in turn to the band. Band members included Larry Koonse, guitar; Ray Loeckle, reeds; Jon Ward, bass and Jim Zimmerman, drums.

Professor undergoes heart surgery

By The Collegian Staff

William B. Griffitt, professor of psychology, underwent coronary bypass surgery Thursday morning in Stormont-Vail Hospital in Topeka.

Jo Ann Hazzard, nursing supervisor at Stormont-Vail, said Griffitt's condition following surgery Thursday evening was critical. She also said his condition would probably be upgraded to serious later Thursday night.

Griffitt, who teaches classes in sexual psychology and has coauthored a textbook on sexual behavior, returned Saturday from a symposium in San Diego sponsored by the Association of Sexual Psychologists.

According to Jerry Phares, head of the Department of Psychology, Griffitt checked into a Manhattan hospital Sunday evening, complaining of chest pain, and was transferred to Stormont-Vail on Monday.

Coronary bypass surgery involves re-routing the flow of blood through the arteries and veins that serve the heart muscle.

When a blockage of the vessels occurs, portions of the heart muscle may die, creating a myocardial infarction, commonly known as a heart attack.

Bypass surgery is performed to lower the risk of heart attacks.

Stephan says oversight allows diversion pacts

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An oversight by state lawmakers allows city and county attorneys to make diversion agreements with people charged with driving while intoxicated even when the defendants have prior DWI conviction in other states, Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said in an opinion Thursday.

Stephan said prosecutors are allowed under current laws to make the agreements instead of prosecuting a person charged with drunken driving only if the defendant is a first-time DWI offender "in this state."

The agreements usually require a defendant to pay a minimum fine and complete an alcohol and drug safety action program before the drunken driving charges are dismissed.

In the non-binding legal opinion, Stephan said that when 1983 Kansas Legislature amended Kansas' DWI sentencing law to make out-of-state DWI convictions count as prior convictions, lawmakers did not write the new language into two laws dealing with pre-trial diversion agreements.

However, the opinion said prosecutors may not make a diversion agreement if the arrangement would not be "in the interests of justice" or benefit the defendant, if the defendant previously has participated in a diversion program, if the person's blood alcohol content was .20 or higher.

Official wants bigger AIDS budget

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Citing the growing threat of AIDS, the government's top health official said Thursday he asked the White House to approve an additional 55 percent increase in federal spending to combat the deadly disease.

Dr. James O. Mason, acting assistant secretary for health in the Health and Human Services Department, told a Senate subcommittee he has asked the Office of Management and Budget to approve a $70 million increase in the administration's 1986 budget request for AIDS research.

The increase — the second in two months — would bring spending in the fiscal year beginning next week to about $200 million, more than double the amount President Reagan asked for in his first budget proposal in February.

The new total would also be more than three times the amount spent in 1984.

Another witness gave the panel fresh evidence that the disease is spreading to the heterosexual population.

"This disease is the department's No. 1 public health priority," Mason told the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on health. "We will continue to reassess our efforts in order to make maximum progress in our fight against this disease."

Sen. Lowell Weicker, R-Conn., the subcommittee chairman, told Mason the money would be available as soon as the administration formally requests it.

"Whatever you ask for, you got," Weicker told Mason.

Meanwhile, a Harvard researcher cited Army studies showing that 5.4 percent of the U.S. soldiers seeking treatment for venereal disease in Berlin this June were infected with AIDS.

Dr. William A. Haseltine said they got the disease from German prostitutes, who have infection rates of 50 percent or more.

architect...the college has a critical mass of talent and experience," Lapping said.

Randolph Pohlman, dean of the business college, said the college's faculty could have made themselves available for consultation on the coliseum project.

"We would have been able to have students or faculty work on (market and cash flow studies), but I don't think I'm in a position to say that (the administration) should have done it," he said. "I don't think that everyone should be involved in every decision."

Pohlman said he believes the Council of Deans allows faculty to present ideas and get feedback from University officials about building projects.

"We have a dean's council where we exchange ideas," Pohlman said. "It's designed to be an advisery group to the president — a group for information. It gives us an opportunity to communicate with the vice presidents."

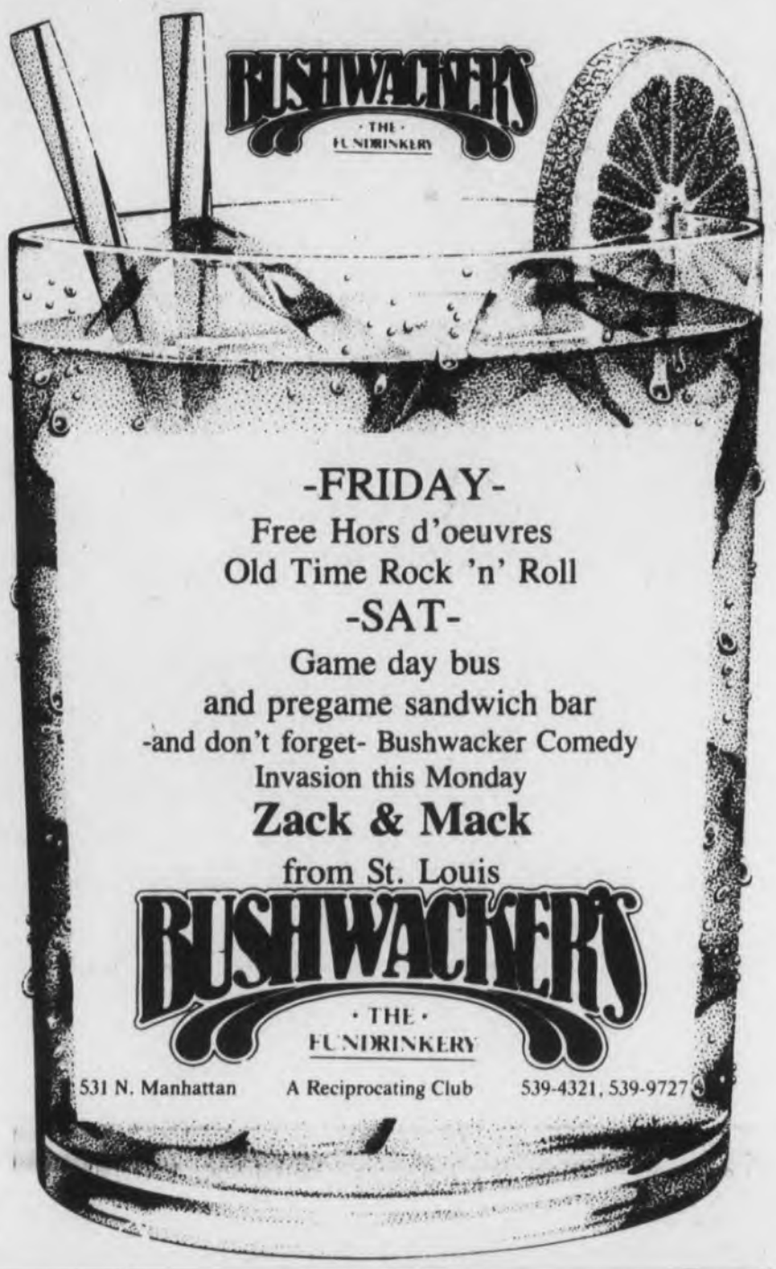
Vincent Cool, associate director of planning, agreed with Jackson and Lapping that the University has a large pool of talented faculty, but that the University attempts to gather input from them.

"We have a broad spectrum of information available here. We'd be very foolish not to take advantage of the expertise."

Faculty are commonly asked for consultations on a spontaneous level, when "we go to the dean or department head to see if they have a faculty member with that specialty," he said. "Then we see if they could advise us."

But Cool added that he believes the faculty should also attend to the positions for which they were hired. Work by faculty members for the planning department would take them away from their jobs, Cool said.

Kenneth Gowdy, associate dean of engineering, said consulting with University facilities could be a possibility if adequate time and compensation are made available to the faculty members.



"We're starting from a basis that all faculty members have full- or above-full loads," Gowdy said. "Time relief or financial arrangements are needed. We would be open to considering the possibility."

Gowdy said there is a lot of expertise within the college that could be used, such as in the traffic planning section.

"We have several people who have done consulting all over the Midwest in various areas," he said.

K-State baseball's run production continued to soar as the Wildcats swept a double-header from Johnson County Community College Thursday at Frank Meyers Field.

The Cats won the first game 17-5 and the second game 13-6. Last year at this time, K-State was 5-3 and had scored 25 runs. This year they are 8-0 and have scored 128 runs.

"We're hitting the ball very well this fall. We brought in a lot of recruits who are doing the job for us," Coach Gary Vaught said.

First baseman Otto Kaifes led the offense in the first game going 4-for-5 with four RBIs and three runs scored. Catcher Jeff Turtle also had four RBIs while going 2-for-3 with one run scored.

Paul Iseman pitched the first four innings in the first game for K-State allowing one run while striking out seven. He gave up three hits.

K-State hit Johnson County pitching with a six-hit, five-run rally in the first inning of the second game. Johnson County scored two in the fourth and three in the fifth, but never came closer than five runs. K-State pitching gave up nine hits in the second game and 12 in the first game.

Third baseman Mike Fletcher and first baseman Ken Carswell both went 3-for-4 in the second game for

K-State set to battle North Texas State

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Two teams seemingly headed in opposite directions will face off Saturday as K-State takes on North Texas State University in a non-conference football game at 4 p.m. in KSU Stadium.

K-State is coming off a 24-22 loss to Texas Christian University and, according to Coach Lee Moon, is playing at a "high level of intensity."

The K-State defense was impressive in the loss, holding TCU to 143 yards rushing and 284 total yards. The Horned Frogs had amassed 355 yards rushing and 497 yards overall in downing Tulane one week earlier.

North Texas State, on the other hand, is coming off a 28-7 loss to Texas Tech University in which they fumbled the ball twice and failed to take advantage of four Texas Tech turnovers.

Quarterback Mike Rhone was able to complete just five of 15 passes for 100 yards in the contest after posting impressive numbers in the first two games.

Moon, however, has cautioned his players and the media against taking the Eagles lightly. He points to North Texas State's 10-9 loss to highly ranked Oklahoma State University as evidence that the game should be a good one.

"From what I've heard, they have a great football team. They had a chance to beat Oklahoma State two weeks ago with a field goal, but they missed it," Moon said.

North Texas State, coached by Corky Nelson, enters the first-ever meeting between the two schools with a record of 1-2. The Eagles opened the season with a 34-14 win over Northwest Louisiana University before dropping the Oklahoma State and Texas Tech contests.

K-State moves into the contest with a record of 0-3. The 'Cats are 0-1 under Moon, who took the reins of the Wildcat program following season-opening losses to Wichita State University and the University of Northern Iowa and the subsequent resignation of Coach Jim Dickey.

The Eagles feature a run-oriented offensive attack while K-State has shown some balance in its offensive scheme. North Texas State has averaged 192 yards rushing in its first three games and K-State has averaged 99 yards rushing and 105 yards passing in its first three contests.

Both teams feature defensive ends who have dominated the line of scrimmage thus far this season. Kevin Humphrey of K-State recorded four quarterback sacks for 24 yards in losses in the TCU game and had 10 total tackles on the day. Tom Middaugh led North Texas State with eight tackles in the Eagles' loss to Texas Tech.

Johnson County.

K-State's offense in the second game was led by shortstop Dusty Eby who went 3-for-5 with a run scored and four RBIs. Kaifes added a home run and had two RBIs.

"I'm really pleased with the attitude of our kids in the dugout. They're all cheering for one another. They're competing with on another, but they're all wanting every one to do good."

K-State's defense made several errors during the two games, but Coach Vaught isn't concerned.

"We're not in a hurry this fall. We were playing with a lot of sore arms, and we had some kids playing on banged up ankles," Vaught said.

"Fall doesn't mean a thing to me," he said. "Sure I'd like to be 20-0, but we're just taking it one week at a time."

K-State will play Labette Junior College Sunday at 1 p.m. at Meyers field.

"Labette's got a good team. They're gonna give us a game. If people come out this weekend, I think they'll see some pretty good baseball," Vaught said.

Saturday's game is up for grabs between Randy Williams and John Welch. Williams started the first three games, but Welch played in the last four minutes of the TCU game and drew the praise of Moon.

A decision on the starting quarterback is not expected to be made until later today, Moon said.

Tennis teams plan open meet

By The Collegian Staff

Entries are being accepted for the 1985 Wildcat Open tennis tournament, scheduled for Oct. 12 and 13 at the L. P. Washburn Recreation Area tennis courts.

The tourney, which is open to the public, will include three levels of competition in the men's and women's divisions. The open division is considered the most difficult and will include players on K-State's tennis teams. The "A" category is for the intermediate player and the "B" division is for novice or beginning players.

There will be singles, doubles and a special mixed doubles competition, which will match a participant with a varsity player. Singles competition begins at 8 a.m. on Oct. 12 with doubles beginning at 11:30. Finals are scheduled for Oct. 13.

Entry fees are $10 for singles and $15 for doubles. A participant may enter one singles and one doubles event, excluding special mixed doubles. Balls will be furnished and awards for the winners and runners-up will be given.

Deadline for entries is Oct. 8.

Entry forms may be picked up at the Cottonwood Fitness Center, 3615 Claflin Road, or from K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau in Ahearn 101.

Tournament draws will be posted at the Cottonwood Fitness Center on Oct. 11 in the afternoon.

Proceeds from the meet will go the K-State tennis fund to support the men's and women's teams.

role. He is former governor of the Swiss national bank and former chairman of the Bank for International Settlements.

Foreign banks have refused to renew loans to South Africa because of the continued uprising against apartheid, the race laws that guarantee privilege for the nation's 5 million whites and deny rights to the 24 million blacks. More than 700 blacks have been killed.

South Africa's currency has plummeted in value during the financial crisis and the government postponed repayment of principal on the debt until January.

Cheryl Phillips, who lives in the Bishop Lavis suburb of Cape Town, told a news conference five policemen beat her at the Brackenfell police station after her detention Tuesday morning under the Internal Security Act. She was treated and released from a hospital Wednesday.

Meanwhile, the Reagan administration has formally decided to ban the importation of Krugerrand gold coins as part of a package of sanctions against white-ruled South Africa, congressional sources said Thursday. Reagan originally resisted imposition of sanctions, preferring to rely on a low-key policy of negotiations known as "constructive engagement."

"I'm having people tape and board up the windows on the house," Donovan said.

Although his house is a five-minute walk from the ocean, he is still concerned because the house is being renovated.

He is hoping the storm will dissipate before it reaches his property.

"Most of the time storms lessen as they continue," Donovan said.

Donovan, who has spent the past 14 summers on the island, said the island is basically a large sand dune. There have been houses that have toppled because the surface is unstable during severe weather.

Siddall owns a house which is more likely to get hit since it lies farther south than Donovan's.

Siddall's house is on Nantucket Island off the southeast side of Massachusetts.

He describes the island as an "extremely windy place." Because of this typical weather, houses are built to withstand storms by using diagonal structural framing, reinforced windows, wooden shingles and nails used in construction are spaced only three inches apart.

"I don't expect much trouble," Siddall said. "The coastal people need to be more concerned."

He believes Nantucket will experience less damage than the coast.

understanding of the historical as well as the ethical aspects of journalism to present an informative and accurate account of news events.

"Dr. Eisenhower said that the press and other mass media must 'Not only reflect what is happening, but they must help people understand all the truth about the causes of key problems and the hard and often self-sacrificing things needed to bring about corrections,'" Murphy said.

Murphy stressed the need for journalism students to have a basic understanding of management practices in order to present the news more efficiently.

"Newspapers have to be managed just the way any other business has to be managed," he said. "We need help in that area and the opportunity will expand dramatically in the next decade."

Before his appointment on the Sun, Murphy was editor and publisher of the San Francisco Examiner from 1975 to 1981. He was a political reporter for the Atlanta Constitution from 1961 to 1965 and became editor of the publication in 1968. While editor, Murphy was kidnapped by political extremists.

Murphy attended Mercer University and studied at Harvard University, where he was awarded a Nieman Fellowship for study in 1959.

Violence continues in London's slum district

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Gangs of black youths set fire to a car and hurled bricks and rocks at police Sunday in London's slum district of Brixton in sporadic violence a day after the worst rioting in the city since 1981.

Saturday's violence, which began after police shot a black woman while seeking a man armed with a shotgun, left dozens of stores gutted by flames and at least 36 people injured.

Scotland Yard spokesperson Frances Walker said Sunday's disturbances were isolated and "completely contained." She said 10-15 people were arrested, but there were no reports of injuries.

Youths, most of them black, had rioted for about seven hours Saturday night and early Sunday . Scotland Yard said 26 civilians and 10 policemen suffered minor injuries and 149 people were arrested in the overnight violence, Brixton's third and worst riot since April 1981.

The racially mixed district in south London was calm most of Sunday until the car was set on fire toward nightfall.

About 50 policemen, wearing helmets and carrying plastic shields, moved in after the blazing car was used to block a road in a flashpoint area of Brixton known as the Front Line.

Police cleared a path for firefighters through a crowd of 200 people who gathered as the car was being set ablaze. Rocks, bottles and bricks were thrown, but police said no one was hurt.

Earlier Sunday, shopkeepers boarded up broken windows and bulldozers shoved other burned-out cars from the streets. Clean-up crews mingled with sightseers gawking at the widespread devastation.

"There is still some friction in the area," said Scotland Yard Cmdr. Alex Marnoch. "Feelings are still running high, and obviously it is something we must monitor."

The Yard said 137 major crimes were reported overnight and 55 vehicles were burned or damaged.

Scotland Yard said Brixton erupted after police, searching for a youth believed armed with a shotgun, burst into a home and shot the suspect's unarmed mother. It called the incident a well-planned operation "that went tragically wrong."

Youths marched to the Brixton police station and began hurling firebombs, paving stones, bottles and pieces of lumber. Stores were looted and cars and trucks were overturned and burned.

Just three weeks earlier, sections of the Handsworth district in Birmingham, home to predominantly West Indian blacks, went up

Disposing of asbestos inadequate

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

University laborers erred in transporting an exposed portion of asbestos-covered pipe in late August, a University official said Sunday.

Laborers, moving an exposed portion of asbestos on a heating pipe from the basement of Waters Hall to a truck near a temporary dump site, about 100 yards from the Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center on northeast side of campus did not follow the correct procedures for moving asbestos, said John Lambert, director of campus safety.

Asbestos has been found in some medical studies to cause cancer.

The Enviromental Protection Agency began investigation in early September about complaints filed by a University laborer that asbestos on campus was not handled in accordance with University and EPA standards, said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, Sunday.

"The laborers cut the pipe apart, cut the asbestos, and took the pipe out (of the basement of Waters Hall). There was wrapped asbestos on the pipe that was taken by forklift and put onto truck and driven off campus to the dump site at the Riley County Landfill," Lambert said.

Miller said he believes there was no asbestos left at the temporary dumping site, but also said he had no prior knowlege of the incident.

"I don't know precisely what happened. I wasn't there. The asbestos was removed from the sites," Miller said.

Lambert said although laborers did not follow the correct procedure for transporting the pipe across campus, he did not believe much asbestos was released into the atmosphere.

"The pipe was wrapped," he said. "The only asbestos exposed, to my knowledge, was the end that they cut. The word I get is that the asbestos on the pipe was well intact when they moved it."

The University, which must obtain authorization from the EPA to move asbestos, has a set procedure for moving asbestos from buildings, Lambert said.

Tax for spirits to rise by $2 per proof gallon

By The Collegian Staff

As of midnight, purchasers of hard liquor products will see higher price tags on their favorite brands due to the implementation of a new tax rate.

The new federal tax, the first since 1951, passed as a part of the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act, affects only hard liquor and not beer or wine products.

The increase, which will raise the price of hard liquor products $2 per proof gallon, is estimated to generate some $149 million in tax revenues in 1985 alone. Long-range estimates predict an increase of $535 million in revenues by 1989.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel's Retail Liquor, 1129 Bluemont Ave., said customers had been talking about the price increases, but he didn't see any real increase in sales by customers stocking up to beat the price increase.

"There was some (increase), but it's hard to say what it was due to," Rickel said, noting two large wedding parties accounted for part of the increase.

Don Stehley, owner of the Stehley Retail Liquor Store, 1229 Moro St., said he had seen "a little increase" in the past three or four days, but "not to any great significance.

"I'm not sure people are aware how much prices are going up...but some are going to be a little shocked," Stehley said.

He also said he expected people to turn toward more beer and wine products, especially with increased advertising by the wine industry reminding consumers their products were not affected by the increase.

For Stehley, the increase in sales was from customers buying only one-half or a full case of their favorite brand before the tax change.

Rickel said he thought people were going to the Kansas City area for large purchases.

"We just can't beat those Kansas City prices," Rickel said.

A story in a recent edition of The Kansas City Star cited examples of orders for 30 and 40 cases of spirits, with bills running up to $700, but not all stores were increasing inventories because dealers will also be charged the new tax on floor stock.

Defense industry trims security clearance total

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The armed services and defense contractors appear to be meeting Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger's three-month goal of reducing security clearances by 10 percent.

Final figures on the crackdown, which grew out of a Navy spy scandal, are not expected until next month. But Weinberger's deadline for an across-the-board, 10 percent reduction in clearances expires today and some preliminary figures have been compiled.

When the cuts were ordered June 11, there were 4.3 million Pentagon employees, congressional aides and contractor employees with clearances ranging from Confidential to Secret to Top Secret.

The idea of slashing the number of individuals with clearances is aimed at both reducing the potential sources of information to the Soviets and freeing investigators to perform more thorough and timely background checks.

L. Britt Snider, Pentagon's principal director for counter-intelligence and security policy, told a House panel last week that "it does appear that DoD will meet or exceed the secretary's 10 percent objective by the first of October."

"As of Sept. 15, we estimate that an overall reduction of approximately 8 percent had been achieved...," Snider disclosed. "Each of the military departments has advised that it expects to satisfy the requirement in a timely manner."

Defense contractors ctors, "had eliminated 149,599 existing clearances, or 10.7 percent of the whole" by Sept. 14, Snider continued. "In short, the overall objective has been met."

But Snider also said the Pentagon approved some exceptions to Weinberger's order. While he declin-

Condemnation procedures meet with City approval

By SARAH KESSINGER
Collegian Reporter

The condemnation procedure of private land for Manhattan's downtown redevelopment project has received the city's approval.

With the Manhattan City Commission's passing of a resolution Sept. 17, and the subsequent approval of an ordinance's first reading, the city now has authority to conduct property surveys to prepare legal descriptions of affected properties.

The properties to be condemned in the mall site area will be leased to Forest City Rental Properties, Inc. and JCP Realty Co., a subsidiary of the J.C. Penney Co. Inc., partners in the mall development following their purchase and site preparation by the city.

Gary Stith, community development coordinator, said the city decided to start the process because negotiations with some property owners were not resulting in contracts. Stith said he was not free to release the city's offers for properties due to federal regulations.

In order to follow Kansas statutes in a case of eminent domain, Stith said, the commission must first pass the resolution.

"We have not condemned the properties yet," Stith said. "We only authorized a legal description of the properties."

After the resolution is approved and published, the affected property owner is notified by mail, although the letter is not mandatory, Stith said.

Instructor offers parking solution

By KAREN MEIS
Collegian Reporter

As a response to the University's lack of parking, Gordon Derr, instructor in civil engineering, has proposed a mass transit system for campus.

If Derr's proposal is accepted by the Student Governing Association, buses will begin running during the spring semester.

Derr presented the proposal during an open forum sponsored by the Students for Educational Awareness last week. The purpose of the forum was to discuss ideas for the use of $700,000 students will receive from the refinancing of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

Derr said the goal of the proposal is to outline a campus bus system demonstration project for the spring semester. He said a University faculty/student committee for traffic and parking had expressed interest in the project in the past, but no proposal had ever been brought forth to be implemented.

"The idea has floated around since the spring of '81 and has been presented to a number of people," Derr said.

Under the supervision of Derr and Bob Smith, professor of civil engineering, a study of a bus system serviceable to the University's students was completed by a class in the Department of Civil Engineering in the spring of 1981. Derr said the proposal presented to SEA was based upon the study.

The proposed bus system would consist of two routes, one serving the campus and the other bringing students to campus. Derr said the campus route would transport students across campus, such as from the Union to the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex, and the off-campus route would bring students onto campus decreasing the need for parking.

According to the proposed guidelines, four buses would serve the two routes during the day, and two buses would be used to transport students during the evening. Each route would have two buses on it from 7 a.m. to 6 p.m. and one bus from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m.

The headway (time between buses) for the campus route would be 7-8 minutes during the day and 15 minutes in the evening. The headway for the off-campus route would be 15 minutes during the day and 30 minutes during the evening. Derr said the proposed bus system would run Monday through Friday, and reduced schedules would operate during registration and finals.

The proposal states, "the University will have to be the contracting agency for the service." Derr said that in discussions with local bus companies, "at least two are interested in this type of service."

Derr said the proposed bus system would be run as a pre-paid service. The proposal states that a student would show University identification to board the bus and ride "where and when he or she desires."

The identification of a faculty or staff member would also be honored "if the University would be willing to add funds for the system equivalent to the share provided from the student monies."

Israel's Peres calls for peace talks

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres Sunday welcomed King Hussein of Jordan's call for direct peace talks, but Peres said the proposal for an international conference would result in "everlasting delays."

In a statement released by his Cabinet in response to Hussein's speech Friday at the U.N. General Assembly, Peres also condemned a proposed $1.6 billion U.S. arms sale to Jordan.

He reiterated Israel's refusal to negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization and criticized Hussein for condoning terrorism by the PLO as the actions of a national liberation movement.

"Violence is violence, and no liberation movement can justify the murder of innocent men, women and children," the communique quoted Peres as telling the Cabinet.

Peres' statement appeared to seek the middle ground between the enthusiatic response to Hussein's address by his Labor Party and the dismissal of the speech by the right-wing Likud Party.

Crews removing rubble at hospital

MEXICO CITY — Heavy equipment crews worked Sunday to remove concrete slabs from the pile of rubble that was Juarez Hospital, giving rescue teams access to lower floors where scores of people were trapped when the first of two devastating earthquakes struck Mexico.

However, prospects were slim that any of the victims, including some 30 medical students and their teachers who were trapped in classrooms when the first quake struck Sept. 19, had survived.

More than 4,600 people were killed in Mexico City when two major earthquakes struck Sept. 19 and 20, toppling buildings and burying thousands in the debris. Another 1,000 people are missing, according to a special interagency commission established by President Miguel de la Madrid to coordinate earthquake recovery.

The commission has said 400,000 people were left homeless and 18,000 were injured in the quakes, the first of which measured 8.1 on the Richter scale, making it one of the country's most devastating earthquakes. The second measured 7.5.

The U.S. Embassy on Saturday said four more Americans were identified as victims of the quake, raising the total number of U.S. citizens killed to nine. Twenty-four Americans are missing.

An embassy spokesman said seven Americans were treated in hospitals for quake-related injuries and released.

The Education Department, which had hoped to reopen city schools Monday, said Sunday that classes would start only in the universities and eight of the city's 16 districts.

Schools originally were to remain closed for only two days after the first quake, but as the enormity of the disaster became known, the return to classes was postponed until last Wednesday, then until Monday.

Water supplies remained a critical problem as surveys turned up dozens of damaged lines.

Honor farm escapees still at large

LEAVENWORTH — Two inmates who walked away from a minimum-security honor farm at the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth were still at large Sunday, prison spokesman Carl Hackle said.

The two men, Larry Everett Brown and Benjamin Chambers, were discovered missing about 10 p.m. Saturday, Hackle said.

"They're not dangerous or armed or anything like that," he said. He added that local and federal authorities had been notified but had not found the men.

Brown, 36, whose last address was in Leavenworth, was serving four years for mail fraud, said Deputy Doug Davis of the Leavenworth County Sheriff's Department.

His discription, age and sentence matched those of a Larry Everett Brown, convicted in March of trying to defraud insurance companies in February 1984 by drinving his truck into the Missouri river to fake a drowning.

After the reported drowning, Brown's wife submitted a claim of more than $200,000 on some life insurance policies.

Brown was a fugitive for several months until federal officials arrested him in Texas. He had been on parole from a state fraud conviction.

Davis said Chambers, 45, whose last address was in Atlanta, was serving five years for bank larceny.

Con backfires into $1,300 mistake

MANSFIELD, Ohio — Police are looking for two women who tried to con an elderly woman out of more than $700 but wound up giving her $1,300 by mistake, authorities said.

No arrests are anticipated because "it isn't hardly a crime for someone to give you money," police Lt. David Messmore said Friday. However, officers are looking for the two women who tried to pull an old con called the pigeon drop, he said.

The scheme preys on people who think they are doing a good deed by helping find its owner. In return, they agree to keep some of the "found" cash and split it, or they may agree to split an expected reward, police said.

However, the target of the scheme is asked to put up some money as a sign of good faith. The "found" money and the target's money are supposedly put into two envelopes, but one has cash and the other paper, which is given to the victim.

On Thursday morning, the two women approached an elderly woman behind the Mansfield Square Shopping Center and gave her the pitch about finding a wallet with money, police said.

Police, who declined to identify the elderly woman, said the pair drove the woman to a bank in nearby Ontario, where she withdrew $724 from her account.

400,000 gallon oil spill causes mess

CLAYMONT, Del. — More than 400,000 gallons of crude oil from a grounded Panamanian tanker fouled the Delaware River on Sunday, and the Coast Guard closed the waterway to navigation as crews worked to clean up the mess.

The slick stretched 15 miles from where the 761-foot Grand Eagle ran aground late Saturday near Claymont, on the Pennsylvania border, said Gov. Michael Castle. Many water fowl were coated with oil, he said.

The Grand Eagle lost about 435,000 gallons of oil, or about 10,400 barrels, after running aground after losing power around 11:30 p.m. Saturday, said Coast Guard Lt. Robert Mitchell.

Any spill of more than 100,000 gallons is considered a major accident, said Mitchell.

The ship, which drifted onto the Cherry Island flats in the center of the river, later proceeded under its own power to the Sun Oil Co. refinery at Marcus Hook, Pa., said Clark Jester, head of Delaware's Emergency Management Office.

Actress desires 'South Pacific' role

NEW YORK — Actress Glenn Close hasn't been hungry for work lately — not with two movies in back-to-back release and a Broadway play opening this season — but what she'd really like to do is star in "South Pacific."

"My earliest memories are of listening to that score, singing along with it," she said in a Daily News interview published Sunday. "I love the Rodgers music, the Hammerstein lyrics."

Governor's part marks stage debut

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Wearing little more than a hat and oversized underwear, Gov. Bob Graham took the stage and sang his way into his first, and possibly last, theatrical appearance.

"We were very fortunate to get him," Florida Repertory Theater artistic director Keith Baker said before Graham's Friday night performance in "The Fantasticks."

In fact, the audience loved Graham. When he delivered his first line — "I could tell you a great deal about myself" — the audience roared with laughter and continued laughing through his second line — "I am a man of experience.

Baseball team owner bids highest

SPARKS, Nev. — Buying a used car is not everyone's notion of how to spend $1 million, but to Detroit Tigers owner Tom Monaghan the 1929 Duesenberg looked like a honey.

Monaghan, also founder and president of Domino's Pizza, made the record bid at the two-day Harrah's Automobile Collection auction this weekend, said organizers.

More than 300 antique vehicles, including many child-size toy cars, were sold at the auction, which brought in $10.5 million.

Hostages on TWA jet cite press 'harassment'

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — A couple aboard the TWA jetliner hijacked in June by Shiite Moslem terrorists say they felt harassed and manipulated by the media following their release.

"You're at the mercy of a horde of reporters asking you many, many questions," said George Lazansky, 53, who said that that "our little community of Algonquin was taken over by the media."

He said matters got so bad that his mother-in-law, riding in a car past a group of reporters, "rolled down the window and said, 'You vultures.'"

Lazansky and his wife, JoAnn, were among a group of 36 residents of Algonquin and nearby communities on the flight. The group, from three Roman Catholic churches, was returning from a pilgrimage to Christian holy sites in the Middle East when the jet was hijacked between Athens and Rome.

The terrorists freed most of the passengers shortly after the hijacking, but Lazansky and 38 other American men were held hostage for 17 days, spending most of the time on the ground in Beirut.

Included among those hostages were Capt. John Testrake of Richmond, Mo., Arthur Toga, of St. Louis and Bob Peel Sr. and Bob Peel Jr. of Hutchinson.

Lazansky was released after three days and came home. "At that time, I didn't want people to know when I had a good day and when I had a bad day," she said Saturday. "...I wanted my privacy; I wanted to be left alone."

The Lazanskys' sons, Michael, 24, and Thomas, 26, said the family was constantly pestered by reporters.

"'How do you feel?' I was asked that question maybe 20 times a day," said Michael Lazansky. "What am I expected to say? 'How do you feel?' 'What are you doing?' These questions are so redundant, it's idiotic."

The Lazanskys were joined by Warren Lupel, an attorney for Gary Dotson, for the panel discussion on "Victims of the Media?" held at the annual meeting of the Illinois AP Editors Association.

Dotson, convicted in 1979 of raping Cathleen Crowell Webb, was the subject of national news coverage this ... when Webb recanted her allega... against him.

Home ec, Extension ceremony celebrates merger of programs

By JANE KRIEGER
Collegian Reporter

Rainy weather forced the ribbon-cutting ceremony of Justin Hall's rededication into the Union Ballroom Saturday. The ceremony celebrated the merger of the College of Home Economics with Home Economics Extension.

"Proud past, Promising Future" was the theme of the event.

"This is truly an occasion of celebration," said Mary Nell Greenwood, administrator for cooperative extension for the U.S. Department of Agriculture. "Research and the application of the results to solve problems are unique and critical functions of a land-grant university. When home economists and researchers team up, usually problems can be better addressed."

Greenwood was the keynote speaker for the rededication ceremony. She is the top official in the United States in agriculture and home economics extension.

During the summer remodeling of Justin, necessary for the merger of the College of Home Economics and Home Economics Extension, the University dealt with unanticipated expense and problems such as telephone connections and noise.

Now that the College of Home Economics and Home Economics Extension are one, research is easier, said Kathy Jilka, Home Economics Council president and senior in foods and nutrition in business/community service.

Students encountered some problems with the Justin renovation, Jilka said.

"During one of my classes last semester, they were drilling and hammering during class," Jilka said. "It was really hard for the teacher to communicate, especially because it was a large class. I remember going to class and having the teacher yell the lecture rather than speak it. Despite all the noise and the hassles, we're really happy with all the changes and the merger."

Along with the hassles for students, there were also some unexpected costs. At the ribbon-cutting ceremony, Acker commented on the cost of the renovations.

"Things always cost more than you would expect — even coliseums," said President Duane Acker. "It's (the additions to Justin Hall) a good investment in Kansas State University and the campus."

Judy Mai Colebank, 1960 home economics club president, who cut the ribbon in the 1960 ceremony opening Justin Hall, handed Jilka the scissors and said, "I am proud of the college's progress in the last 20 years, I hope the proud tradition continues."

The merger will benefit the students, faculty and extension specialists, said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Home Economics, last week. Communication and an economy of resources will be the main benefits.

"There is an economy of resources for people that are working on the same topics, (for example) information needs for the people of the state whether they're teaching them in the classroom, deciding their research project or delivering the information out in the state when these people all work together," Stowe said.

"The benefits to (extension specialists) are that they are in closer contact with the people... all across the state," Stowe said.

Rivals clash in South African violence

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A mob burned a black man to death Sunday in the second straight day of clashes between rival black groups near Durban, and anti-apartheid violence spilled into white areas for the third day in a row, police said.

Police also reported they shot and killed a black man heaving a gasoline bomb in Dordecht in eastern Cape Province.

An es were guests at a "children's day," but no one was injured.

Peter Davidson, owner of the Executive Hotel in Umlazi, a black township west of Durban, told The Associated Press: "We don't know who would have done it. I am not involved in politics."

The youngsters, ranging in age from 9 to 15, were gathered for a party the hotel sponsors on Sunday afternoons for parents and their children. Police said there was little damage.

The death toll from Saturday's street battles between rival black groups in Umlazi was unclear. Police said four people died, but the independent South African Press Association reported six deaths.

Gangs of Zulus loyal to hereditary leader Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, a black moderate, had fought black followers of the United Democratic Front, the largest multiracial group opposed to apartheid. The Front calls Buthelezi a sellout to the black cause.

New battles that appeared to stem from Saturday's killings broke out in Umlazi on Sunday. Police stressed they were not connected to the explosion at the hotel.

They said a black mob attacked two black males there, "burning one man to death and seriously injuring the other with knives."

Police said they killed an unidentified black man throwing a gasoline bomb in Dordecht, a small eastern Cape Province town 298 miles south of Johannesburg.

Ninety miles south, near King William's Town, a black mob ambushed two white men riding in a car on the national highway between Cape Town and Durban, police said.

The crowd burned the vehicle and stoned the men as they ran into the bush. Both men were wounded, one seriously, said the spokesman for the national police department in Pretoria.

Police have nearly quelled 13 months of rioting in the black and mixed-race townships, but whites have been attacked in the last three days in Johannesburg's suburbs, near Cape Town, East London on the Indian Ocean shore and near Port Elizabeth, 500 miles south of Johannesburg.

The African National Congress, the banned black guerrilla group trying to overthrow the white government by force, broadcast appeals from radio stations in black-ruled Africa telling blacks to spread unrest into white neighborhoods.

More than 700 people have perished since Sept. 3, 1984, but only seven have been white.

Negligence not acceptable

Not long ago, asbestos was highly regarded as a fire-resistant, durable mineral used in fireproofing and electrical insulation.

Today the word asbestos holds a much more traumatic connotation. After determining products made with the substance could cause cancer, schools and other public institutions have been ordered to remove the material.

Of concern to the University is the questionable practices followed during removal and storage of asbestos materials from Waters Hall. The asbestos, removed in August, was transported, against University and governmental policy, to an area near the Hoeflin Stonehouse, a child-care center north of campus.

Two main problems exist in asbestos removal.

First is the increased chance of breathing in asbestos fibers during removal. Secondly, a safe place must be found for permanent disposal.

Whether the problem in the Waters Hall project came from poor communication, lack of knowledge of proper disposal or lack of concern for individuals may be difficult to ascertain. But that does not mean there is no problem.

Perhaps one problem came from using University work crews, instead of specialized crews to remove the materials. The University has spent a lot of money for projects of less crucial importance, and tight budgets are not acceptable excuses for negligence.

The Waters Hall project was not the first on campus. An example is the Union asbestos-removal project this past summer, with no reported "mess-ups."

So why was this project handled differently? Or is it really safe to assume there have been no other "mess-ups" just because there were no previous reports of mishandling asbestos materials?

Excuses and/or negligence simply cannot be condoned in the handling of such material. An approved site, available during the project for permanent disposal, should be a priority with the removal crew.

If the final investigation indicates negligence on the part of the University or its employees, action must be taken. The workers of the University, and children attending day-school should not have to suffer from negligence. Any fines imposed by the Environmental Protection Agency would never be enough to ensure no similar acts in the future. A sense of responsibility must accompany the future handling of harmful materials.

Farm awareness increases

With BandAid, USA for Africa, LiveAid and most recently FarmAid, some people are bound to be tiring of hearing about the efforts of entertainers to bring relief to the needy.

While some people may have had enough of the media exposure generated by these people and events, we shouldn't lose sight of the fact the efforts of these groups have generated millions of dollars to help many of those who need it the most and also increased social awareness among the population at large.

Some people have questioned, and perhaps rightly so, the motives of some of the performers in the aid efforts. Without question, the aid efforts have enhanced the careers of some of the entertainers who participated in them.

However, the fact that some of the performers may have been putting their own interests first in the aid efforts is irrelevant.

For too long, many of us who are more fortunate have ignored the plight of the hungry and homeless. If the performers in the aid efforts, by finding for themselves a prominent place in the public eye, have increased social awareness about these problems, then they have served their purpose.

With FarmAid, the public may have reached its saturation point. Organizers of the event in Champaign, Ill., predicted they could raise $50 million. The actual amount pledged by the national audience viewing the 14-hour concert totaled between $8 million and $10 million.

It is a shame more money wasn't pledged to FarmAid. Despite the fact the actual money raised won't significantly help many members of the farm community, people who discount FarmAid are missing the point.

While part of the purpose of FarmAid was to raise money to help farmers, the primary focus of the event was to raise public awareness about the plight of the farmer.

On that note, the event can be considered a success.

Clock radio ownership — alarming facts

A. SCHARNHORST
Managing Editor

There was a point in time — not so very long ago — when I considered the electric clock radio (with alarm and snooze option) to be the greatest thing man had invented since the mood ring or the ginsu knife. The clock radio combined the two things I liked most about those items — function and beauty.

From the beginning, the clock radio was something after which I aspired greatly — in quite the same manner a thrift-shop sales clerk might aspire to purchase a new Chevy Luv truck. I longed to be kinda now, kinda wow, kinda G.E.

When I was in grade school, my older sister lorded over me with her multi-functional clock radio (AM-FM with illuminated digital-dial — big stuff for the mid-'70s), while I was confined to a Snoopy watch and a blue ball-and-chain Panasonic radio that bounced when I rolled it down the basement steps. If I needed to get up at a certain time, my mother would open the door to my room and turn on the Panasonic to simulate the effect of my sister's clock radio.

The envy I had for my sister and her radio could only be compared to Cain and Abel. I wanted a clock radio, and I wanted it badly.

I will never be able to answer the question I used to ask myself over and over: Why couldn't my parents buy me a clock radio if they could buy my sister one? It wasn't that I came from a poor hillbilly family that had to take baths in the creek. We had money enough to take the family station wagon on a three-week trip each summer. Certainly we could have given up the week on the East Coast getting rained on through the canvas of our fold-up Starcraft camper (in the tail-end of Hurricane Beth) in order to buy a clock radio.

One fall I thought I had the problem licked. My father used to be a salesman — (no, he doesn't look like Dustin Hoffman and he isn't dead yet) and had won a trip to somewhere for selling lots of stuff. The trip fell through for some reason, and he was given the opportunity to "take the rest on account" as Chuck Woolery would say, and order an equivalent amount of goods from a catalog that was midway between L. L. Bean and Speigel. I was in heaven when I heard him discussing ordering an electric clock for me from the catalog.

But, alas, all was not solved. He didn't lie, it was an electric clock, but nothing like the glorious clock radio I had imagined would keep me awake with a red luminous dial and blast me out of bed in the morning with strains of Alice Cooper's "School's Out" or Elton John's "Bennie and the Jets." It was a simple electric clock that kept me awake at night not with its luminous dial but with the clunking noises it made as the digits rolled over.

Just as my electric-blue Panasonic radio was replaced by an Astrex AM-FM stereo with record player (not turntable, this didn't qualify as a turntable...), my noisy electric clock was replaced by a quieter one — still sans radio. I stepped up to stereo equipment and in time-keeping ability, but it still wasn't the wonderful clock radio about which I had dreamed for so long.

I have upgraded my stereo equipment several times since then (much to the delight of my sisters and roommates and to the betterment of my albums). A number of timepieces have replaced my lemon-yellow Snoopy watch. In fact, I can think of a number of watches — and alarm clocks — that have been given to me over the years by well-meaning friends and relatives who got tired of hearing me whine if I didn't manage to awaken on time and was late to an appointment.

As time went by, a clock radio became lower and lower on my list of priorities — for Christmas or my birthday I was much more interested in begging for the latest J. R. R. Tolkien biography or a briefcase or Silly String — something practical. I had plenty of alarm clocks, another just wouldn't be functional.

It wasn't until last spring, when all of my alarm clocks had ticked their last tock or blinked their last blink, that I broke down and purchased a clock radio for myself. After years of aspiring to be the proud owner of a bedstand jam-box with a timer, I finally had one.

Unfortunately, my proud purchase has yet to keep me from whining about sleeping through class or an important meeting. After 13 years of begging for a clock radio, I have finally learned the inevitable — I was never meant to own one.

Some people, like my sister, have the ability to wake up to music. I don't possess that quality. In order for a radio to wake me up by 7:30 a.m., I must set it to ring at 5. When the radio pops on, I inevitably press the snooze option (oh, that glorious snooze option) at least 15 times before I can even begin to come to my senses.

If there is a song on the radio I like, I tend to subconsciously listen to it before hitting the snooze. If it is one I hate, I slap the button violently and roll over with a groan. Neither musical category has any effect whatever on prying my prone body off the mattress and into a vertical position.

Aside from the obvious lessons my clock radio has taught me (I'm a lazy lout who should have learned a lesson from watching "Father Knows Best" on afternoon independent-television re-runs), I have learned an important lesson about American radio. The general programming of an average U.S. radio station in the mid-1980s isn't as hair-raising as many parents would suggest. It doesn't raise my hair a millimeter.

Associate professor's classroom sermons unnecessary

Editor,

Surprise! Now instead of going to church, we can go to Associate Professor Stanley Ehler's agronomy class.

After reading the article in the Sept. 26 Collegian "Godly instruction focus of crop course," I began to wonder about the position the agronomy department holds on those two important controversial issues of religion and sexism in the classroom.

Are they really intrinsically related to weed management? Is it necessary to give Ehler's "secret" of life to first-day freshmen? If it is, then why isn't his course listed by Manhattan Christian College instead of by a secular, state-run university?

Consider the cost of in-state, undergraduate tuition at K-State. If one assumes that an undergrad is carrying four classes per semester, then a single class costs in the neighborhood of $80. If I had paid for a class in grain production and got a little grain production, a little religious philosophy and a little patronizing opinionating about the motives of women at the University, I'd be cheated.

After all, for far less money I could wander down to any Aggieville pub and have a rousing discussion of women's motives, and the next day I could attend the church of my choice.

While Ehler's testing method of essay writing and his emphasis on study are, to say the least, appreciated by everyone who believes in scholarship, one can't help but wonder what it is he's asking his students to study. Ehler believes that women are here to "do what they are supposed to be doing (finding a husband)," and said that "there is a difference between men and women and to instruct them in the same way may be a mistake."

So how is it done? Do the girls get different textbooks — "How to catch a man in 10 days or less," "Total Woman" or "25 new weed salads for your man?" Yes, as you say, "Women are just different." We wear dresses.

We also, when we take a class in weed management, expect to learn only weed management, just like our male counterparts. I suggest that next time you begin to sermonize in the classroom, you consider who is paying your salary.

Police end caper

Editor,

Earlier this month my parking permit was stolen from my car, and on Sept. 12 I wrote a letter to the editor crying "shame!" and saying the person would be found.

I want to thank the KSU Police Department publicly because they did find the person and the permit. Many letters to the editor say how unfair the department is, but I say thanks and right on!

Committee protests 'sneaky' vote

Editor,

The Committee for Just Compensation protests the way the business item covering condemnation of property in the Downtown Mall was added to the agenda at a recent City Commission meeting.

The item was not on the regular agenda, it was not announced in the paper, but it was presented to the commissioners just before the meeting as an addendum item. The commissioners did consent. However, a representative of the Just Compensation committee there to speak against any such action if it came up, arrived after the swift action and did not know of it. It was not announced again and no agenda addendum was printed.

The representative left thinking nothing was coming up for discussion. The commission was able to pass the motion at the end of the meeting without giving protestors or property owners an opportunity to speak.

A very clever move but certainly does not show much character, openness or business-like actions. The mall project is costing Manhattan citizens a lot of taxes and not only the owners of downtown buildings, but others might look into such sneaky performances.

Cities elect the type of leadership they wish to reflect. Does Manhattan like its image?

Bar owners adjusting to state drinking laws

By JANE KRIEGER
Collegian Reporter

Changes in drinking laws for both Manhattan and Kansas this past summer have caused Aggievilles tavern owners and managers to look for methods to enforce the new laws.

The current law is that all persons born after July 1, 1966, must wait until they are 21 to purchase cereal malt beverages.

Some tactics to prevent violations include a new hand-stamping system and increasing ID checks due to increased use of fake IDs.

In an effort to reduce the impact of the loss of customers in the 18-year-old market, the Manhattan City Commission this past summer passed an ordinance that would still allow 18-year-olds to enter taverns.

"This year, when the law changed (the legal age) to 19, they (the city commission) said the reason they would allow 18-year-olds to stay in (the bars) was so that they wouldn't be denied the atmosphere," said Joe Barcia, manager of Dark Horse Tavern, 616 N. Manhattan Ave.

Eighteen-year-olds "shouldn't be denied the privilege of some place to go on Friday and Saturday night," Barcia said.

Some Aggieville taverns are letting 18-year-olds in by using a double stamping method to separate the drinkers from non-drinkers. Double stamps are used on legal-age drinkers and single stamps are used for those under age.

At Mr.K's, 710 N. Manhattan Ave., "our bartenders, waitresses and floorwalkers monitor the drinking," said Rusty Wilson, manager.

Sgt. Larry Freeby, Traffic and Patrol Supervisor of the Riley County Police Department, said "our enforcement is above average for the state. We are very diligent in the apprehension of that type of offense (underage drinkers).

"In a university town or near a military installation, we pretty much have to be on top of it," Freeby said. "Once word gets around that it's not being enforced, then we have major problems. That's exactly why we have foot-patrol officers every night."

Members of the RCPD also monitor bars to check IDs, to determine if drinkers are of legal age. Wilson said the police may check "every night four, five, six, sometimes seven times."

Freeby said "if we have reason to believe that someone is underage then we do have the power to ask them to produce some type of identification. If they fail to do that we can take them into protective custody."

The Rockin' K bar, 712 N. Manhattan Ave., does not use the double-stamp system because persons under 19 years old are not admitted.

"It's too much of a hassle monitoring them," said Steve McKenzie, owner of Rockin' K.

Several managers of Aggieville bars said their employees have confiscated several fake IDs, which are turned over to the police, who decide whether or not to take legal action.

"We return those (borrowed drivers licenses) to the state," Freeby said. "The state can suspend the license, which is what usually happens."

According to the new law, those violations are misdemeanors, punishable by a fine of not less than $100 but not more than $250, by 40 hours of public service or both.

Though the penalties may seem stiff, many under the legal age try to get in with fake IDs. Dave Aycock, manager of Kite's Bar and Grille, 619 N. 12th St., said "at least 15 or 16 (minors) a night on weekends" try to get in with the fake cards.

Although 18-year-olds can legally enter most Aggieville taverns, managers said business is not as good as in the past.

"Kite's has always been a place where the freshmen Greeks come and will get drunk their first couple months of school... they always come here and hang out," Aycock said. "It's (the new drinking laws) hurt a lot and it's just going to get worse next year."

But Geoff Gobble, Manager of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro, said "It really didn't affect us that much. We had an older following to start with and so we weren't hurt really as much by the 18 (to) 19 change."

Assembly meets in Wichita

Financial aid concerns ASK

By MARK MCDERMET
Collegian Reporter

Fifty-five Associated Students of Kansas delegates met Sept. 27 and 28 at Wichita State University during a legislative assembly to discuss student-related issues.

ASK members divided into committees to study position papers. Each delegate represented 1,000 students.

ASK members are seeking an easing of eligibility requirements for student employment in alcohol-related settings. They also want to make the law more consistent for serving cereal malt beverages.

Specifically, ASK members want laws governing employment in 3.2 cereal malt beverage establishments consistent with those governing employment for private clubs and establishments where at least 50 percent of the revenue comes from food sales.

"If you're 18 you should be able to work in a cereal malt liquor establishment," said Kevin Elmore, K-State ASK director and senior in computer science.

ASK members also discussed the possibility of an increase in the number of scholarships available and the amount of scholarship funding through the state scholarship program.

Delegates discussed increases in work-study funding which would enable more students to be eligible for the program.

ASK is also seeking a merit-based loan program for students entering the teaching field. Students who remain in Kansas to teach after certification could void their loan, thereby changing it to a grant.

ASK is seeking merit-based financial aid, enabling the working student more time for academics and favors a similar program for part-time students.

ASK is also in favor of an increase in student salaries employed by departments on campus. This would not include work-study students, but those who have displayed outstanding merit on the job, Elmore said.

The ASK legislative assembly recognized a minority student caucus at the session in order to provide a legislative forum for minority students.

Condemn

The description is then filed with the city clerk and an ordinance is prepared and presented to the commission. Two ordinance readings, and votes, are required before it becomes law. The first reading was at the special city commission meeting Tuesday afternoon, with the second scheduled for Oct. 1.

A petition is filed in Riley County District Court and the property owner is notified by mail, Stith said after the readings. The court then appoints three appraisers, who must be residents of Riley County.

After the appraisals, a hearing date is set. The three appraisers will present their findings, and the court decides the final property value to be paid to the owner, Stith said.

When the city pays the court the amount decided, the land becomes property of the city. If the city or the property owner is dissatisfied, they may appeal to a higher court where a jury will decide on the compensation, Stith said.

Stith said an appeal could go on for years, but would only concern the money offered for the property. Ownership of the land is no longer a question after it becomes the city's.

Voting against both the resolution and first reading was Mayor Suzanne Lindamood who said condemning the land for one private business to turn it over to another is a violation of property rights.

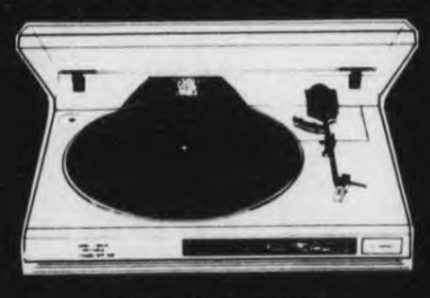
"I think it's a different case of eminent domain than if they are taking property for a (public) road. It's giving property to another private business," Lindamood said.

Lindamood's argument "is not with me or the commissioners," Stith said. A state statute, which calls to eliminate "slum and blight and to encourage economic development of a community" is looked at as taking private property for the public good, Stith said.

"Without the power of eminent domain this kind of project would not be possible," he said.

Among the properties listed as possible condemnation site include land owned by Robert Sager.

Sager's properties include the present Sherwin-Williams Co. building at 204 Poyntz Ave., the Comprehensive Educational Training Act office at 201 Humboldt St. and two tracts in the 100 block of Poyntz Avenue. Another is the current site of Jack's Body Shop, 111 Humboldt St.



Sager said the offer made to him by the city was "nowhere close" to what the value of his property is.

HOMECOMING KICKOFF 1985

RIDE THE TIDE KSU OF PURPLE PRIDE

"Ride the Tide of Purple Pride"

Ride the tide into Homecoming 1985! Blue Key has planned an exciting week of activities and fun for all K-Staters in preparation for the Homecoming game against Oklahoma this Saturday, October 5. Kicking off the celebration is Union Day this Thursday with activities scheduled all day in the K-State Union Courtyard. Included are the Body Building and Yell Like Hell contests, musical entertainment and balloon give-aways. Manhattan Merchant Discounts will be available all week with the purchase of a Homecoming button. Thursday night at 10 p.m., the annual Homecoming bonfire will be held in the old stadium. Special features include Pant the Chant competitions, cheerleaders, Larry Travis and the burning of the Oklahoma mascot. "Everyday is K-State Day" and this year's special K-State Day will be in the Union on Friday. Come relax, watch the final living group competitions and enjoy the musical entertainment. Saturday's the big day starting with the parade through Downtown and Aggieville at 9 a.m. K-State Ambassadors and Homecoming winners will be announced at halftime during the grand finale—the Wildcats against the Sooners of OU! So join the students, alumni and friends who will be showing their purple pride this week during the best K-State Homecoming celebration ever!!

Students Select K-State Ambassadors

An important part of K-State's Homecoming activities is the selection of the K-State Ambassadors. The Ambassador program, now in its ninth year, combines student representation to the K-State community with the traditional Homecoming royalty. The K-State Ambassadors represent KSU through the state at various alumni and University functions. This year's ambassadors were Tamara Barham and Will Kirk.

The path to becoming an ambassador involves interviews with students, faculty, staff and alumni. Finalists are selected on the basis of their enthusiasm, knowledge of the university, communication abilities, personal presentation, and campus and scholastic achievements. Finally, two students are selected K-State Ambassadors in an all-student election to be held this Wednesday, Thursday and Friday in the Union.

Blue Key rewards the Ambassadors for their service to K-State by scholarships presented at the annual Spring banquet. We urge you to be part of the K-State Ambassador program by voting Wednesday, Thursday or Friday in the Union. Remember your fee card!!

Yaddo establishes creative experience for colony's artists

By The Collegian Staff

It's a creative experience, an artist's colony, an escape.

It's called Yaddo. Yaddo is an environment established in Saritoga Springs, New York, for novelists, poets and artists to encourage free flow of creativity. The Yaddo environment was created by Katrina and Spencer Trask of New York. Yaddo consists of the Trask home and four lakes around the estate.

Antonia Pigno, coordinator of special collections in Farrell Library, spoke to about 20 women on "Yaddo: A Creative Experience," during the weekly Friday Focus on Women, sponsored by the Women's Resource Center.

As a poet, Pigno spent more than a month at Yaddo in January and February.

"It was my dream to go to Yaddo," Pigno said. "At first you are glad to be there. You are not interrupted, and are asked not to interrupt. There is so much time alone, you don't know what to do."

With the meshing of all of the creative minds at Yaddo, Pigno said things get a bit tense.

"This is a place where you are involved only in your work," she said. "It's a very egotistical environment. There is conflict and it is an intense situation. You can also develop intense friendships."

Pigno said the Yaddo experience was new for her because she had her own room and lots of time by herself.

"When I went to Yaddo, I was left with just me. Going there was not as big of an adjustment as coming home," she said.

Pigno said returning home was difficult because she had to do household chores as well as working on poetry.

"Henry James talks about how he has to talk to the maid, the gardner — but we (women writers) are the maid, the gardner and the Henry James," she said.

Pigno said even after she was accepted at Yaddo, she hesitated to call herself a poet.

"I'm really modest. If you say you're something, you have to commit yourself to it. I love poetry, it's my life. It goes beyond being a poet. I knew if I was going to call myself a poet, I had to be good."

Math-science sessions in demand

Students obtain free tutoring

By MIKE ROBBINS
Collegian Reporter

Educational Supportive Services offers free math and physical science help sessions as well as free tutoring to students who are qualified.

Deborah Boone, assistant for the Center for Student Development, said the math/science tutoring program has been offered to qualified students since the early 1970s and the help sessions have recently been implemented to meet student need.

Boone, who determines if a student is qualified for the tutoring program, said a student must meet certain criteria before they are eligible for the free tutoring program. Each student meets and discusses with Boone their eligibility requirements.

"If a student is a 'majority student' he or she would have to be physically limited, be in a low-income bracket or be a first-generation student (a student whose parents did not attend college) to be eligible for the free tutoring," Boone said.

She said any ethnic minority student who is a resident of the United States is eligible for the tutoring program.

"What we try to do foremost is classify students under the (federal) grant. Either a student has a low income, is physically limited, is a first-generation student or is of ethnic origin," Boone said.

Shalhla Nikravan, math/science coordinator for Educational Supportive Services and graduate in education, is in charge of the tutoring program and help sessions. Nikravan said once a student is considered qualified for the tutoring program, she meets with the student to learn their educational background.

"When students come in that qualify for the program, I schedule them on the average of two hours a week with a tutor," Nikravan said.

Usually there is "one-on-one" tutoring, Nikravan said, but sometimes students are divided into groups of no more than four.

The tutors, who are generally students themselves, cooperatively tutor most of the math courses offered by the University as well as physical science courses. Tutors are required to have received at least a "B" in the courses they tutor. Nikravan said this ensures quality assistance by the tutors.

The time between the student and tutor is contracted, Nikravan said, so "a student cannot just call in and say they don't feel like meeting this week. The student should be responsible enough to let somebody know if they are sick and can't attend, but otherwise they must attend."

Evaluations of the tutoring sessions are filled out by both tutor and student every week.

"By using an evaluation we can find out how we are doing. It tells us if our services are really working or not...We like for students to share with us how they feel about the tutor program and an evaluation accomplishes that," Nikravan said.

Nikravan said the demand for extra tutoring before exams increased so much since last year that group help sessions are needed.

Nikravan said the walk-in help sessions began Sept. 16 and are open to all students. Since the tutors are paid by the hour, Nikravan said it is more resourceful to help as many students as possible.

The math and science walk-in help sessions are twice a week in Holton 207. From 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. on Mondays, math, physics and computer engineering are taught. From 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. Tuesdays, chemistry and genetics are taught.

Air crash kills all 17 passengers

By The Associated Press

JENKINSBURG, Ga. — An airplane filled with parachutists crashed on takeoff from a private rural airstrip Sunday, killing all 17 people aboard, officials said.

The single-engine Cessna 208 Caravan crashed in a pasture around 12:30 p.m., said Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Roger Myers.

"The airplane was apparently climbing out after taking off and a witness stated that the engine stalled," said Preston Hicks, a National Transportation Safety Board investigator who was on the scene.

Grady Wyatt, who lives near the crash site about one mile from the West Wind Sport Parachute Center, was out in his yard when the plane flew over just above the treetops.

"The plane came up and looked like it could hardly stay up. A few minutes after that, I heard a crash, what sounded like a crash," said Wyatt.

The plane came to rest on its back, its cockpit destroyed but the wheels intact, said Butts County Fire Chief W.L. Vaughn.

Jenkinsburg is about 60 miles south of Atlanta.

"The first report to us was that there were 17 persons on board and all were injured fatally," said Myers.

Rescue workers spent two hours pulling bodies from the wreckage, which were taken to a National Guard Armory in nearby Jackson, said Hicks.

The Caravan is an unusually large single-engine aircraft introduced by Cessna in 1982 and marketed as a cargo or passenger aircraft.

Professor improves after bypass operation

By The Collegian Staff

William B. Griffitt, professor of psychology, was listed in satisfactory condition Sunday evening following coronary bypass surgery performed Thursday morning at Stormont-Vail Hospital in Topeka.

Griffitt was admitted to Stormont-Vail Sept. 23 after complaining of chest pain Sept. 22. Griffitt was admitted to a Manhattan hospital that evening and transferred to Stormont-Vail.

Griffitt, who teaches classes in sexual psychology, had returned Sept. 22 from a symposium held in San Diego by the Association of Sexual Psychologists.

Stormont-Vail would not speculate on how long Griffitt would be hospitalized. No family members were available, and the hospital declined to add any further information.

Following Griffitt's surgery Thursday Jo Ann Hazzard, nursing supervisor at Stormont-Vail, said that his condition was listed as critical.

Coronary bypass surgery involves re-routing the flow of blood through the arteries and veins that serve the heart muscle. Bypass surgery is performed to lower the risk of heart attack.

Victory slips out of 'Cats' fingers

By TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

And now comes the hard part.

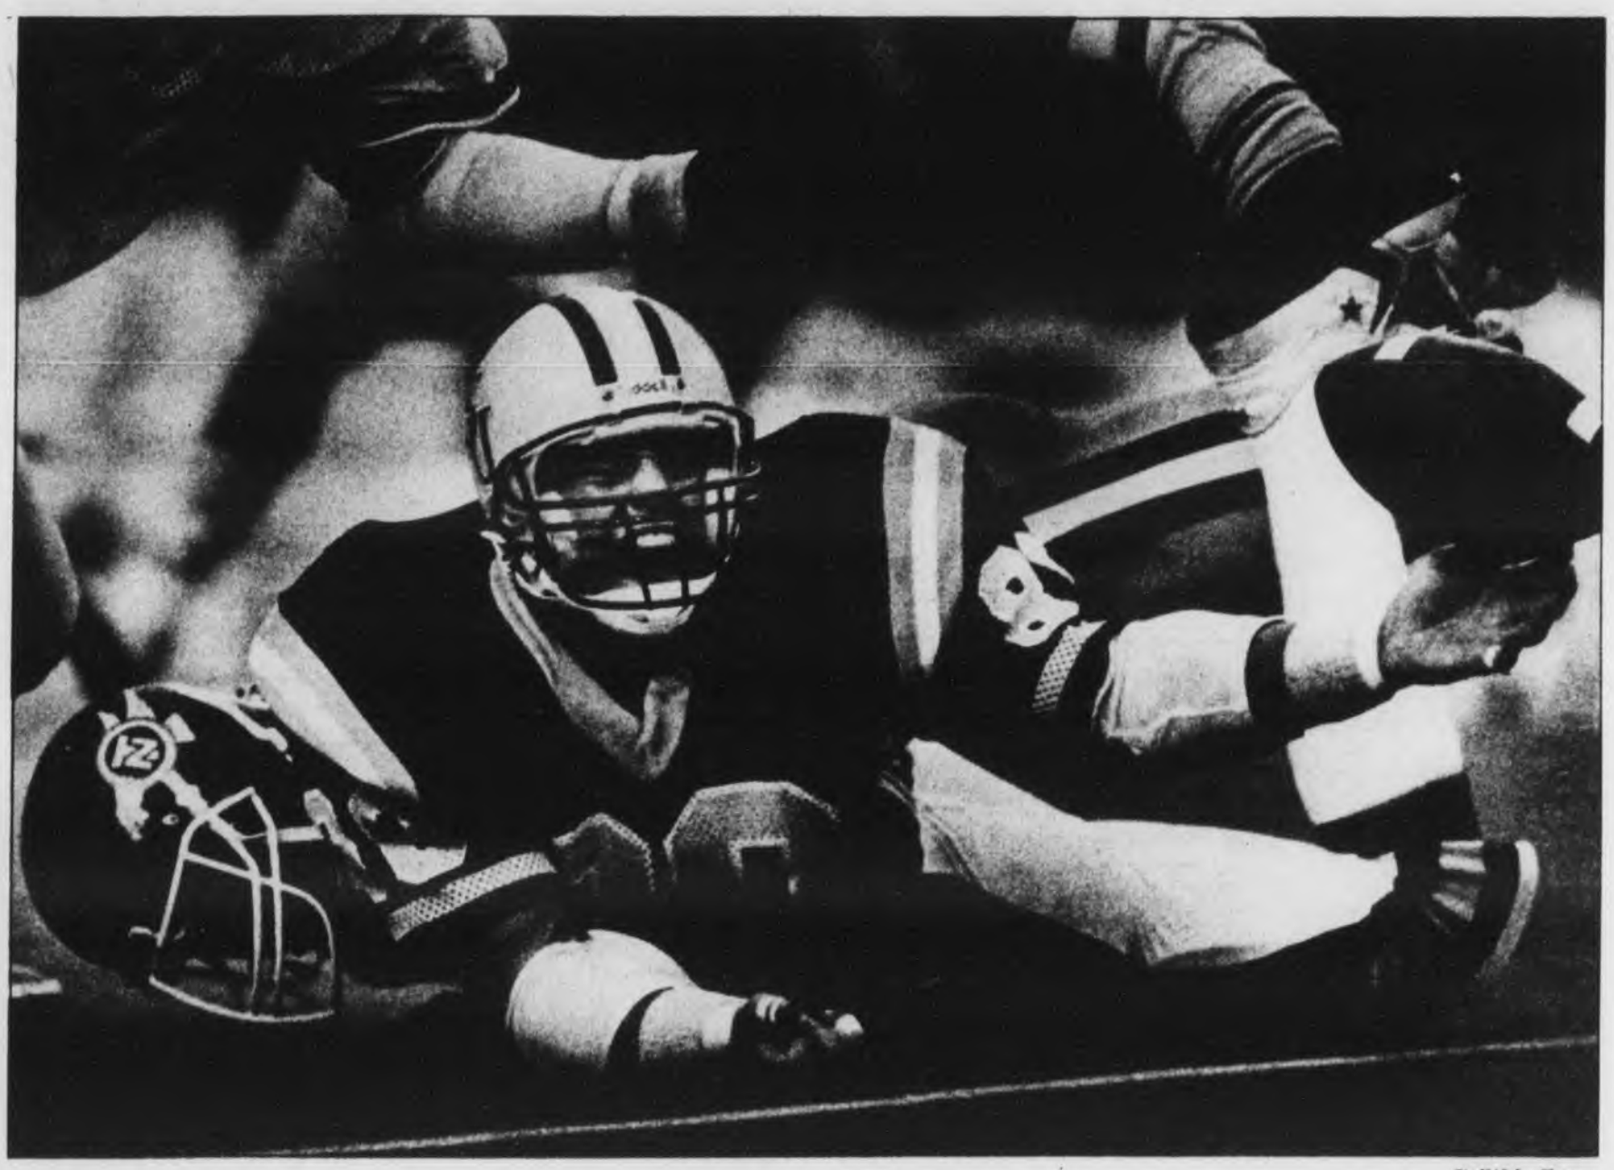
With Saturday's 22-10 loss to North Texas State University, a NCAA Division I-AA school, a part of the record books, K-State must face Big Eight opposition for the remainder of the year.

Four consecutive losses to non-conference opponents, including three losses to teams the Wildcats were favored to defeat, has K-State interim Coach Lee Moon and Wildcat players searching for answers on how to approach the rest of the season.

"Like I told them before the (North Texas State) game, we had eight opportunities to win. Now we have seven," Moon said. "We're just going to have to face that and try to come out and play as hard as we can and try to get better."

Moon now faces the task of preparing K-State for next week's Homecoming game against the University of Oklahoma, The Associated Press' pre-season choice as the No. 1 team in the nation.

"It's going to be tough," Moon said.



K-State players seem to realize the situation isn't going to become any easier as the season progresses into the Big Eight portion of the schedule and the Wildcats face teams like Oklahoma.

"Truthfully, my confidence is pretty shaky," free safety Barton Hundley said. "We just got beat by a I-AA school and now we're going to go up against the possible national champions (Oklahoma). We're having a hard time right now. We came back and played a good game against TCU (Texas Christian University). We're capable of playing a good game against Oklahoma."

Quarterback John Welch said he believes the team's attitude needs to improve in order to compete more successfully.

"Regardless of where we've been, we have to raise our mental aspect of the ball game," Welch said. "To play somebody as good as Oklahoma, you

"Slip sliding away. Slip sliding away. You know the nearer your destination, the more you're slip sliding away."

Paul Simon wasn't in attendance at Saturday's game between K-State and North Texas State University, but if he had been chances are he would have found new meaning for the lyrics he put to music several years ago.

On a day that began with a light drizzle and temperatures in the 50s and ended in a wind-blown downpour with temperatures hovering just above 40 degrees, things started poorly for K-State and seemed to get worse along with the conditions.

The result was a 22-10 win by North Texas State and yet another setback for a Wildcat team that seemed so close to turning things around last week against Texas Christian University and now has seemingly seen their hopes of turning things around begin to "slide" away once again.

The score resembled a baseball score early with the visiting Eagles jumping out on top 2-0 and later 5-0.

North Texas State went up 2-0 in the first quarter after Eagle defensive lineman Tom Middaugh blocked a punt by K-State's Troy Faunce and Faunce knocked it through the end zone for a safety.

The blocked punt seemed to set the tone for a day that would be filled with dropped passes and special teams mistakes, K-State Interim Coach Lee Moon said.

"The kicking game hurt us and to me that's the key," Moon said. "With the weather like it was, the kicking game became a real factor. They (NTSU) were able — even if the ball hit the ground — to still get the ball off and get great punts and great bounces.

"We, however, mishandled a snap and ended up giving them two points. Things should have been a lot worse at halftime with as poorly as we executed."

Following a free kick by K-State's Danny Helmer after the safety, North Texas State moved downfield on the strength of the passing and running of quarterback Mike Rhone and put three more points on the board on a 38-yard field goal by Todd Smith to take a 5-0 lead.

Rhone, who rushed for 91 yards and two touchdowns on the day and threw for 69 additional yards, earned the praise of Eagle Coach Corky Nelson.

"The play of Mike Rhone was probably the difference in the ballgame. He made some key plays when we really needed them," Nelson said.

Rhone's 57-yard bomb to running back Greg Lee midway through the second quarter set up a two-yard touchdown run by Rhone to give the Eagles a 12-0 halftime advantage.

K-State, however, came out for the second half fired up defensively.

Strong safety Don Cliggett caused a fumble that was recovered by defensive tackle Les Miller at the North Texas State 23-yard line less than one minute into the third quarter, and K-State's offense took advantage of the good field position and punched the ball into the end zone.

Tailback Demetrius Scott's dive over the top of the line from one yard out capped the seven play drive. Fullback Ray Wilson did the bulk of the work on the drive, carrying four times for 15 yards. Wilson led K-State in rushing on the day with 51 yards on 14 carries.

Two sacks by K-State on the next Eagle possession led to nine yards in losses, and a North Texas State punt traveled only 29 yards to put K-State in good field position again at the North Texas State 30-yard line. Once again the offense was able to take advantage.

After four carries for 17 yards by Wilson and another carry by Todd Moody, K-State was forced to settle for a field goal of 29 yards by Mark Porter to cut the North Texas State lead to 12-10. The points would be the last scored by K-State in the contest.

But neither quarterback John Welch nor Moon were overly impressed with the way the offense responded on the drive — or on the day.

"It was very frustrating out there today," Welch said. "Offensively we just didn't execute. It wasn't the weather — we just didn't hit our assignments. Dropped passes at inopportune times killed us."

Moon agreed with Welch, but wouldn't blame the quarterback for the offensive miscues.

"I don't think John was a factor in whether we won or lost the game. When he threw the ball to our receivers, we dropped it," Moon said. "We just couldn't get anything going. We started out slow and couldn't function.

"You just have to take advantage of the wind when you have it. We didn't score when we had the wind at our backs in the second quarter, and

Men, women harriers capture first place at Emporia meet

K-State men's cross country team leads the pack during Saturday's Emporia Invitational. The men took first place out of 12 teams and the women took first place out of 23 teams. The men and women will travel to Stillwater this Saturday for the Oklahoma State Invitational.

As expected, K-State's men's and women's cross country teams ran away with team victories Saturday in the Emporia Invitational.

What wasn't expected, however, were poor weather conditions that left the course, located on the north end of the Emporia State University campus, less than ideal for running. The race was run in cool, rainy weather.

"The course was extremely muddy — actually, it was treacherous and dangerous," K-State Head Coach Steve Miller said. "We were hoping to get out without and injuries."

The 'Cats did avoid injuries and Miller made sure of it by keeping Jim Knudsen out of the race. Knudsen, who placed ninth at the University of Missouri Invitational Sept. 21, had a slight sprained ankle and Miller decided not to run him because of the poor conditions of the course.

The conditions, though, didn't bother the K-State harriers.

K-State's women's team made a clean sweep by placing runners in the top five spots for a team total of 15 points.

All-American Jacque Struckhoff led the way by finishing first in a time of 18 minutes, 43 seconds. Alysun Deckert and Anne Stadler both crossed the finish line in 18:56 but Deckert was just ahead of Stadler and finished second. Stadler was third. Lisa Wakem (19:12) and Nancy Hoffman (19:34) were fourth and fifth, respectively.

The 'Cats' Cathy Rochford placed ninth in a time of 20:27.

"We approached the meet as a workout," Miller said. "Our plan was to lead the first two miles and run from there. It worked out very well...Obviously, we're very happy."

Northwest Missouri State University was second with 85 points, followed by Fort Hays State University with 89. Other teams were Haskell Indian Junior College (96), Emporia State University (123), Southwestern College (125), Hutchinson Community College (139) and William Jewell College (139).

The men's team, although not as dominating as the women, still finished first with 28 points. Northwest Missouri State was the closest challenger with 42 points.

Mike Rogers, Bryon Lopez and Bryan Carroll each finished with a time of 26:20 with Rogers placing first, Lopez second and Carroll third.

Ron Stahl (26:49) was seventh, David Pulford (27:22) 14th, Rob Hayes (27:54) 27th and Pat Hessini (28:13) 38th.

"We approached the meet as a workout for the men, also," Miller said. "We ran hard every other mile. It ended up working our very well."

In the men's division, Haskell finished third with 80 points. Central Oklahoma (123), Emporia State (169) and Fort Hays State (196) were the other teams.

"It was a meet we needed," Miller said. "It wasn't too far (to travel) and after a tough meet last week (at Missouri) and a pivotal meet next week. It was perfect for us."

The 'Cats travel to Stillwater, Okla., Saturday to compete in the Oklahoma State Invitational.

Women's tennis team goes 1-1 in home meet

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's women's tennis team split a pair of dual matches, defeating Bethel College 9-0 and losing to Oral Roberts University 8-1 in the K-State Invitational Friday at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Area tennis courts.

K-State was scheduled to play a dual Saturday morning against Creighton University, but it was rained out and postponed to an unannounced later date.

Lena Svensson, at No. 1 singles, was the lone winner for K-State in competition against Oral Roberts. Svensson defeated the Titans' Vicki Martin 6-2, 6-4.

"Lena played a girl that she was capable of beating and went out and did it," K-State Coach Steve Bietau said.

Bietau also was pleased with the play of No. 2 singles player Sigrid Ivarsson who lost to Terri Button of Oral Roberts, 7-6, 4-6, 6-0.

"Sigrid played well," Bietau said. "I was pleased with the way she carried herself in singles."

The other Wildcat singles players, Kristy Line at No. 3, Judy Miller at No. 4, Lisa Creighton at No. 5 and Sabrina Skulborstad at No. 6 all lost straight set matches to the Oral Roberts opponents.

Bietau called K-State's performance in doubles against Oral Roberts "very weak" and "quite a disappointment."

The K-State doubles teams of Svensson and Ivarsson at No. 1, Line and Miller at No. 2 and Creighton and Skulborstad at No. 4 all lost straight set matches to the Titans.

The Wildcat women lost only one game in singles and one game in doubles in sweeping every match from Bethel.

In the only change from the Oral Roberts match, Esther Olson played at No. 6 singles and No. 3 doubles against Bethel. In singles, Olson replaced Skulborstad, who moved up to No. 5. In doubles play, Olson teamed with Skulborstad.

Bietau said his team "tried not to lose any points" against Bethel and was generally satisfied with K-State's team play.

"We worked hard when we didn't have to," Bietau said.

have to be high. You have to be high mentally. You have to be high physically."

Despite the frustration of the non-conference season, defensive tackle Les Miller said the K-State team isn't ready to give up on the season.

"We're just going to have to pull our heads up and play another week," Miller said. "We can't stop playing now. We have a whole season left.

"If we stop playing now, we might as well close K-State down," Miller said. "But I know there isn't anybody on the team that's going to do that."

At this point in the season, K-State hopes they can raise their level of competition to that of their Big Eight opponents like they seemed to do in the TCU game.

"Maybe we play better against better competition," Welch said. "That's kind of far-fetched, but it's hard to say. I guess we'll find out next week."

Hundley said this week's practices and next week's game against Oklahoma will give a glimpse of what might be in store the rest of the season.

"We're just going to have to see what type of people we have on the team this week," Hundley said.

Eagles

probably wouldn't have in the third if it hadn't been for our defensive play."

Moon said the defense was one of the lone bright spots in the contest.

"I thought we played very aggressively defensively. We made the plays and gave the offense the ball on several occasions," Moon said. "But your defense can't be on the field all day with their backs against the wall."

Defensive captain Barton Hundley, who recovered a fumble and intercepted a pass to help spark the defense, agreed with Moon.

"I'm not knocking the offense, but it seemed like the defense was on the field an awful long time today. I know that's our job, but it's still tough to have to go out there so many times with your backs pinned to the goal," Hundley said.

Yet another special teams mistake — a fumble by punter Matt Jacobs early in the fourth quarter — led to the fourth North Texas State score.

After a five play drive that netted but one yard because of a strong effort by the K-State defense, the Eagles settled for a 27-yard field goal by Smith to take a 15-10 lead.

A fumble by Welch when he was hit from the blind-side while attempting to throw a pass led to the final North Texas State score of the day, a one-yard run by Rhone with 43 seconds remaining in the game.

Although he was discouraged by the play of the 'Cats on this particular Saturday, he refused to say the season would be a write-off as the result of one game.

"The last time I looked, the schedule said we still have to play seven ballgames no matter what," Moon said. "I told our players that they're going to have to come out and play as hard as they can and get better.

"At this point, that's all we can do."

Paige, Cherry lead Chiefs to 28-7 win over Seahawks

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bill Kenney fired two scoring passes to Stephone Paige and Deron Cherry tied a National Football League record with four interceptions Sunday in leading the Kansas City Chiefs to a watery 28-7 victory over the fumble-fingered Seattle Seahawks.

A cold rain fell throughout the day as the Chiefs hiked their National Football League record to 3-1 and plunged Seattle to 2-2.

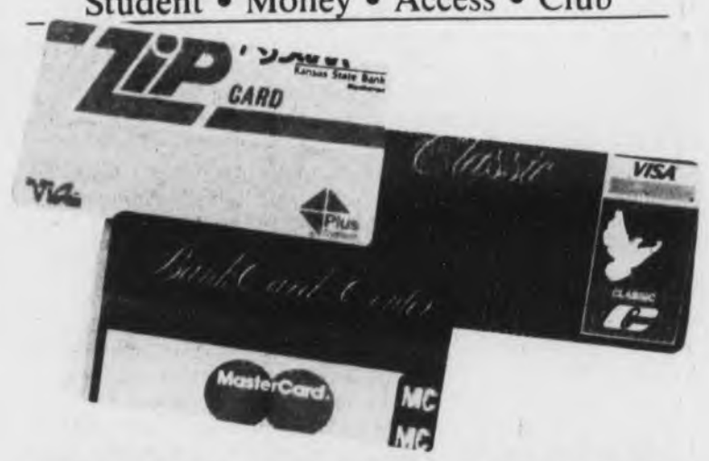
The Seahawks, six days after a lopsided Monday night loss to the Los Angeles Rams, killed themselves with mistakes.

Herman Heard scored Kansas City's first touchdown early in the game on a 2-yard run after Danny Greene fumbled away a Chiefs' punt on the Seattle 5.

The Chiefs went up 28-0 midway through the third period after Cherry stole a Dave Krieg pass and ran 24 yards to the 14.

Loss knocks KC out of lead

By The Associated Press



MINNEAPOLIS — Kent Hrbek drove in three runs and Mark Salas homered Sunday as the Minnesota Twins completed a three-game sweep with a 6-3 victory over Kansas City that knocked the Royals out of first place in the American League West.

The Royals fell one game behind California, which beat Cleveland 9-3. The Angels begin a four-game series tonight in Kansas City.

John Butcher, 11-14, pitched 6⅔ innings for the victory and Ron Davis got the final two outs for his 25th save.

Mark Gubicza, 13-10, took the loss.

College selects student council

The Dean's office in the College of Arts and Sciences announced the selection of Sheila Farrell, junior in medical technology; Tim Fitzgerald, senior in journalism and mass communications; and Sumedha Labhsetwar, senior in biochemistry, to the Arts and Sciences Council.

Alternates are Debbie Cawley, junior in family life and human development; Mike Morris, junior in journalism and mass communications; and Judi Walter, sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

The Arts and Sciences Council is the student-elected organization responsible for promoting the College of Arts and Sciences. Among other duties, the council allocates monies to arts and sciences clubs from student government, organizes and executes the TeleFund and TeleStudent efforts to raise money and recruit students, and formally recognizes outstanding students and faculty members.

Biology professor wins recognition

Richard A. Consigli has been named a silver medal award winner in the 1985 Professor of the Year competition sponsored by the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education.

Consigli, who joined the faculty in 1962, is a research virologist, oncologist and distiguished professor in the Division of Biology. President Duane Acker will present the CASE award at a luncheon in Consigli's honor October 23 as part of festivities for National Higher Education Week. CASE cited Consigli for "achievement in creative planning, producing and promoting of programs and communications" for the University.

A nationally known research scientist, Consigli has attracted more than $2 million in competitive research money since he came to campus. He also serves as a senior scientist with the Mid-America Cancer Center and the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Consigli's research program on the "Biochemical Studies in Polyoma Transformed Cells: Virion Proteins," has been funded for almost two decades by a major grant from the National Institute of Health.

Veterinary department head retires

Harry D. Anthony, head of the Department of Veterinary Diagnosis and director of the Diagnostic Laboratory for the College of Veterinary Medicine will retire June 30.

"Dr. Anthony has directed the Diagnostic Laboratory since 1967, during which time it has grown immensely in both volume and technology, and is recognized nationally and internationally," said James Coffman, dean of veterinary medicine. "A Chinese trade delegation designated KSU's Diagnostic Laboratory as one of two in the Midwest from which they will accept results."

Anthony is a native Kansan and received his DVM from K-State in 1952. He was in private practice in Aurora, Ill., from 1952-1955 when he returned to the University and subsequently received a master's degree in pathology in 1957. During his tenure he acquired international recognition in the area of livestock disease diagnosis, particularly in the areas of shipping fever, ulcerative keratitis (pinkeye), anaplasmosis and salmonellosis. He is a forerunner in research of Sudden Death Syndrome in feedlot cattle.

Anthony's contribution to veterinary medical education and support of both the companion animal and livestock industry, and public health programs in inestimable, Coffman said.

Mt. Re-Sale was one of 17 sand structures built at the Third Annual Sandcastle Charette by architect students Friday at the Broken Arrow Ranch on Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The event was sponsored by the American Institute of Architecture Students.

Sand makes for creative constructions

By BECKY WILEY
Features Editor

Friday's unexpected warm and sunny weather, along with the sand and water at the Broken Arrow Ranch at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, created ideal building conditions for 55 enthusiastic architecture students.

For four hours, 17 teams molded the wet sand into various architectural structures at the 3rd annual Sandcastle Charette sponsored by the K-State chapter of the American Institute of Architecture Students.

"They were all hoping to win the Golden Pail award," said Marty Meyer, senior in architecture and president of AIAS. "The pail has no monetary value, but the sentimental value is endless."

The winning design this year was The Danger of Erosion Parts I and II created by Richard Scheluemer, junior in architecture, Meyer said. Scheluemer used a Dominoes® cup to make forms at various places on a grid. The slope of the sandbar caused some of the gridded cones to slide into the mud, which made them look as if they were eroding and getting smaller.

"Most everybody has a scheme planned out verbally and then ad-libs the design," Meyer said. "But, I'm sure Richard had his idea down pat before he came."

Most of the creations resembled medieval castles, Meyer said. However, a design he was especially proud of was called Happy Feet.

"It (the sand structure) was a superhuman bare foot kicking a soccer ball," Meyer said. He added that the design paid tribute to a soccer team called Happy Feet, which is made up of architecture students, including Meyer.

The contest is called a Charette because the word has come to mean "a mad-dash competition," Meyer said.

L'Ecole de Beauxarts was an architectural school in France founded by Louis the 14th. During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, L'Ecole was the place to study, Meyer explained. Most people had studios in the city and went back to the school for their critiques. They worked until the last minute. Some students put their drawing on a cart, called a charette.

Group helps with adolescent worries

Actors, audience work together

By BECKY WEBER
Collegian Reporter

Dealing with adolescent social problems and issues is what Norman Fedder's newest idea in theater is all about.

Fedder, professor of speech, and Debbie Myhre Bettencourt, graduate in theater, have developed the Theatre of Values. The group plans to perform plays to help local senior high, junior high and elementary students deal with the problems they feel are most serious.

Through TOV, Bettencourt and Fedder hope to increase student awareness of today's social problems by offering a creative, nonthreatening and entertaining approach. The program will use theater games and improvisation to bring the actors and students together, Fedder said. Audience participation will be used, in that the students will come up on stage with the actors to act out possible solutions problems.

Fedder said he got the idea from the Creative Arts Team, a group of performers from New York, who worked with high schools and elementary schools in the area. "Touch," a play about child abuse, was done by actors in Orange County, Calif.

Fedder said that the Theatre of Values, with the help of guidance counselors from Manhattan High School, will be taking actual problems from the students here in the Manhattan community and developing the plays accordingly. The first TOV performance will be in October at the high school.

"We are not bringing in a product, but are developing one from their needs," Fedder said. A team of two men and three women will develop the plays and perform them for students in the Manhattan area. "We must rely on the guidance counselors, though, for we are the artists and not the experts," Fedder said.

"When you use the abbreviation TOV, the word tov is Hebrew for good. In the Bible, God looks at the world and says it is good," said Fedder. "And we're concerned with what is good. We deal with the bad, but are looking for good. We're not a religious group but one of values, how we live good lives."

Fedder said he would like the student organization to become a part of the theater program at the University and eventually develop TOV into an advanced creative drama class.

"I've always wanted to do something other than acting," Bettencourt said. She said she took a creative drama class last spring and liked using her theater talents with people that are not actually involved in theater. Bettencourt said she also became interested in TOV when she worked with a 4-H group last May.

"The community response to the project has been very supportive," she said.

Idaho recognizes poet with centennial project

By The Associated Press

HAILEY, Idaho — One of the most controversial literary figures of the 20th century, Ezra Pound was praised as the artist who untethered modern poetry, scorned as a traitor and reactionary and pitied as a man who languished in a mental hospital.

He was the polemical native son who achieved only patchy recognition in the state where he was born Oct. 30, 1885. Still, Idaho's centennial project for the poet, critic and translator has attempted to warm the public to Pound.

Born to the manager of the federal land office in Hailey when the area was booming with its first silver strikes, Pound died in Italy in 1972 after being charged with treason for his pro-Fascist broadcasts during World War II, declared insane and committed to a mental institution for 13 years.

The simple house in Hailey where Pound spent the first two years of his life still stands not far from the center of town and bears a plaque to mark it. The town's museum includes a Pound display, the University of Idaho maintains a Pound collection and there have been a few Idaho articles about the poet whose literary achievement was darkened by a partisan cloud.

The state known for its patriotism and conservative bent has had a hard time accepting the man hailed as the father of modernism, who influenced a generation of poets with his dictum, "Make it new," and encouraged such writers as T.S. Eliot and James Joyce.

"Some of the oldtimers around here — you mention Pound and they kind of growl at you," said Bob Waite, director of the Ezra Pound Centennial Project.

The project, which began in late summer and runs through the fall, includes Pound classes in several Idaho towns, poetry readings on the lawn of the former Pound residence, papers about the poet and a performance of his opera, "La Testament." Events will culminate on Oct. 4 with a Pound symposium attended by scholars and the poet's daughter, Mary de Rachewiltz, who lives in Brunnenburg, Italy.

Pound's anti-Semitic statements and wartime broadcasts espousing the philosophy of Italian dictator Benito Mussolini will be discussed at some of the sessions.

"We've got to confront it head-on," Waite said. "Organizing a program like this and ignoring that part of his life would be a real disservice."

Astronomers search with antenna for alien life

By The Associated Press

HARVARD, Mass. — With the touch of a lever, "E.T." director Steven Spielberg on Sunday inaugurated a search for real-life extraterrestrials, switching on a giant antenna that astronomers hope will detect radio signals sent from outer space.

"This marks the beginning of a really powerful search that has a decent chance of finding something," said Paul Horowitz, a Harvard University professor who designed the 84-foot communications dish, part of the most powerful radio-scanning system ever used to hunt for aliens.

The dish, capable of scanning 8.4 million radio channels, marks an escalation of such efforts by The Planetary Society, which scans the skies for signs of life from its Oak Ridge Observatory in Harvard, a small town northwest of Boston.

Since 1983, the space-watching group had been searching with a simpler scanner, which picked up only 180,000 radio channels.

The new antenna, known as Project Meta, was built with the help of a $100,000 grant from Spielberg, the science fiction filmmaker whose credits include "Close Encounters of the Third Kind" and "E.T.," which featured a lovable alien.

Spielberg whisked into Harvard just long enough to flip on the antenna with the help of his infant son, Max. The communications dish hummed as it rotated skyward.

"It's the most sophisticated search for extraterrestrial intelligence in human history," said Carl Sagan, the popular science writer and president of the Planetary Society, who joined Spielberg, Horowitz and other astronomers at the observatory to dedicate the antenna. Afterwards, they toasted the event with champagne.

Horowitz said the antenna was capable of reaching to the edges of the known galaxy. If there is life on other planets, he said, "this kind of communications system can do the job." He said he will visit the observatory once every two weeks to check on the project.

The scanner, which took two years to construct, is more versatile than its predecessor and includes changes that should increase the chances of raising alien messages. The antenna is hooked up to a computer room, which records all radio signals emitted from space.

Asbestos

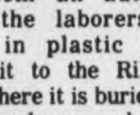
"We are authorized to take the asbestos out there, (to the landfill)," he said.

Lambert said the University contacts the EPA and tell them they will be moving asbestos. The EPA then issues them an authorization number, the laborers put the asbestos in plastic bags and transport it to the Riley County Landfill, where it is buried.

Other employees who work in Waters Hall will probably not have come in contact with any asbestos dust, Lambert said.

"There was no danger to the individuals who work in Waters," he said. "The complainant said there was dust where he was working, but the dust was not all asbestos dust. If there was dust, it was just dust."

Miller said there was only one laborer at the site, and two plumbers.



Lambert said he inspected the temporary dumping site near the University child-care facility and did not discover any asbestos.

"I wasn't contacted until after it occurred. Two or three weeks ago when I looked over the dump site, (near the child- care facility) there wasn't any asbestos there," he said.

Lambert said he would visit the site again today.

Beverly Briggs, director of KSU child-care programs, said she had a few inquiries from parents about the asbestos being dumped at the site near the facility.

Dog's allure could cause overbreeding

By The Associated Press

The Labrador retriever is becoming increasingly popular as a show dog and pet and this could doom the breed as a hunting dog.

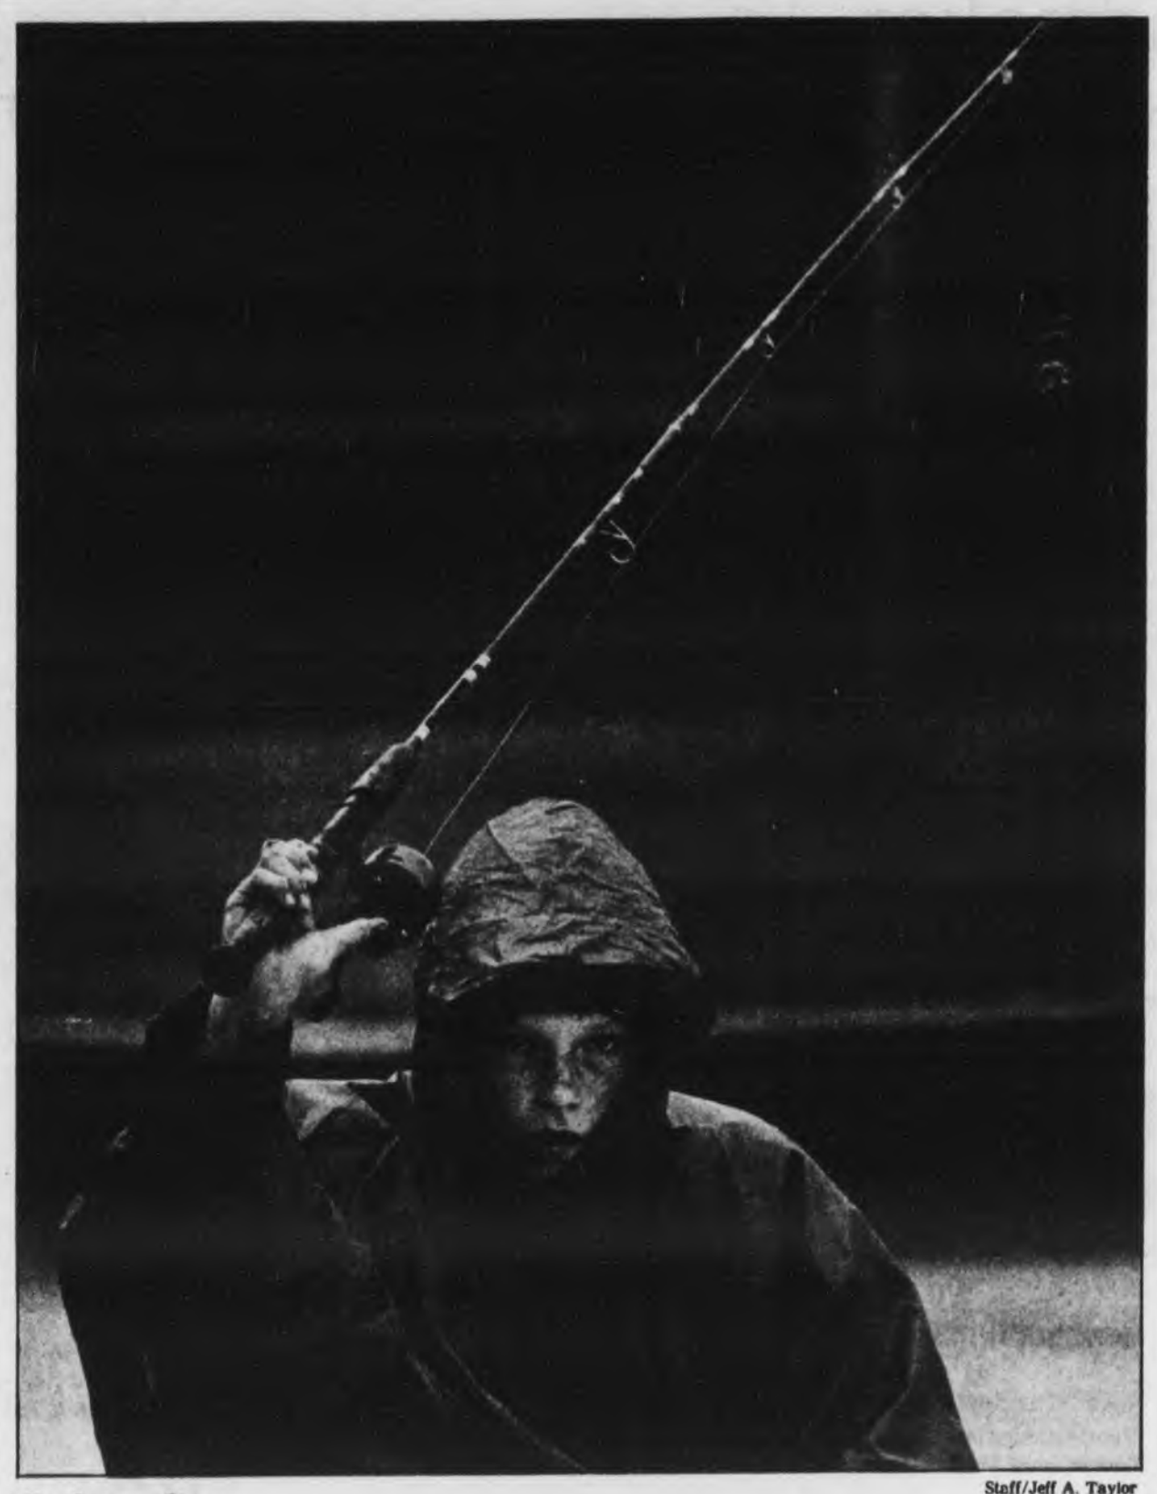
The Labrador is the third most popular breed of dog in America, according to an article in the October issue of Connoisseur, but its very popularity could lead to overbreeding.

The American Kennel Club registered 6,500 Labrador puppies a year 25 years ago, while today that figure has increased to well over 70,000.

Of those 70,000 pups, 96 percent come from pet or show lines, and 4 percent are hunting dogs.

There remain about 1.8 million Labradors working in the duck and goose blinds, retrieving downed game. The dogs are prized by hunters for their almost human understanding of their work and excellent performance in teamwork with hunters. They are intelligent, gentle and hard working.

Hunters fear their popularity as pets and show dogs will ruin the breed for field work, as has been the case with the cocker spaniel, the poodle and the Irish setter.



The American cocker spaniel is the most popular dog in America, but its hunting instinct has been bred out, its hunting coat has been ruined, its disposition is uncertain, and it couldn't hunt its way to the meat counter in the supermarket.

The second most popular dog is the poodle, who once worked with hunters in the duck marsh.

It survives as a magnificent friend, but its hunting instinct has been bred out, and it now belongs in the boudoir instead of the field.

The Irish setter no longer has a hunting nose. It is high-strung and its silky coat that flows almost to the ground would be a mess in the woods.

Breeding for the field takes concentrated effort and only the best hunting stock should be used.

Suicides of Indians baffling authorities in Wyoming cases

By The Associated Press

ST. STEPHENS, Wyo. — In less than two months, eight young male Indians have hanged themselves on the Wind River reservation, a sparsely populated, 2 million-acre tract of barren plains and rolling hills in central Wyoming.

The suicides have galvanized mental health agencies, educators, priests and social workers, but they admit they are at a loss to explain the deaths.

Counselors who have lived here all their lives say they have never seen such a mental health crisis before. Since the beginning of the year, there have been at least 48 reported suicide attempts, compared to fewer than 30 last year.

The suicides have focused a glaring spotlight on this tight-knit community at the base of the Wind River Mountains, where the unemployment rate among 6,000 Indians is nearly 80 percent, where many teenagers have no prospects of going to college, where most of the people have a drinking problem, and where there are few recreational facilities for youths.

The rash of suicides began Aug. 12, when a 20-year-old jailed in Riverton for public intoxication hanged himself with his socks. Four days later, 16-year-old Donovan Blackburn hanged himself with his sweatpants from a tree.

Several days after Blackburn killed himself, Darren Shakespeare, 14, hanged himself from a tree with baling twine. Shakespeare had been at Blackburn's wake and threatened he would be next.

This month, five men and teenagers committed suicide, all by hanging. The latest was discovered Saturday.

Stone says many students felt Blackburn's suicide was a courageous act. It makes her job tougher to show them the difference between courage and cop-out.

On a recent Friday, Stone was preparing for a suicide prevention session with some students. She apologized for not having an organized program, explaining she had spent the morning admitting one student to the mental health hospital in nearby Lander and was making arrangements to admit another. The two students had threatened suicide.

Students in her session complained there was nothing for them to look forward to that weekend, that all the tribal recreation money went for bingo, that they had no cars in which to go into town to cruise.

There is no mall on the reservation, no shopping center, no movie house.

Stone tried to persuade them they weren't any worse off than the youths in nearby Riverton or Lander, who also are bored on weekends. But the Indian students weren't convinced.

At least four of the suicides occurred while the young men were under the influence of alcohol. Studies show 51 percent of the students have a drinking problem and 47 percent have tried drugs.

St. Stephens administrators applied unsuccessfully for a federal grant for an alcohol education program. They are offering programs anyway on a shoestring budget. Students have been trying to support each other since the suicides began, while teachers and counselors give special attention to high-risk cases.

Pat Stoehr, with Fremont Counseling Service in Riverton, a city bordered by reservation lands, emphasizes that teen suicide is not unique to the reservation.

Teen-agers across the county are under mounting pressure from parents and peers. Death is perceived as an escape rather than as permanent departure, she says.

Household numbers show increase

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Offering good news for homebuilders and merchants, the Census Bureau reported Sunday that Americans are setting up housekeeping at a sharply higher rate than the nation's overall population growth.

While the population grew 4.2 percent between 1980 and 1984, the number of households jumped 7 percent, the new Census Bureau study said.

Changes in the nation's age structure were cited by the report as leading to this shift in living arrangements.

The so-called Baby Bust, occurring as the post-World War II Baby Boom generation postponed families to pursue education and careers, has resulted in fewer youngsters in America, and a population tending to age overall.

A larger percentage of the population over age 18 results in more and more young folks leaving their parents homes to set up housekeeping on their own. This trend increases demand for apartments and later houses, plus furniture, cooking utensils and the many sundry goods needed to run a home.

Households grew by 920,000 in 1982 and 796,000 in 1983, and then began to rebound as the economy improved. Household growth totaled 1,682,000 in the year ending July 1, 1984.

The overall trend is nearly universal across the nation, with household growth exceeding population growth in every state except Utah and Wyoming, the new Census study reports.

Recovery of No. 3 carmaker results in adaptive portrayal

By The Associated Press

HIGHLAND PARK, Mich. — Since its spectacular recovery from near-bankruptcy, Chrysler Corp. has portrayed itself as leaner and quicker than other automakers, better able to react to the fickle tastes of the motoring public.

The No. 3 domestic carmaker, which employed 168,000 people in the early 1970s compared with U.S. employment of about 95,000 today, owes much of its leanness to the computerization and automation which swept the industry at the same time the company was pulling its feet from the grave.

But Chrysler got lean in another big way during its uncertain years, 1977 to 1983 — by tossing factories overboard.

Two of its nine U.S. car and truck assembly plants were permanently closed. Perhaps more significant, Chrysler shut down 14 of its 39 automotive parts plants.

Now, the sound of those slamming plant gates is echoing at the bargaining table at company headquaraterer has skinned back enough and the union will stand for no more.

The matter could become a strike issue when the UAW contract, covering nearly 70,000 U.S. blue-collar workers, expires Oct. 15, the union said.

Marc Stepp, the union's chief bargainer, said Chrysler now makes 30 percent of the parts for the cars it sells; the rest are made by other companies in the United States and abroad.

The federal government required cutbacks before bailing out Chrysler during the dark days, and they helped the company straighten its balance sheet, Stepp said.

But he said company Chairman Lee Iacocca has made the union's problem worse by continuing to seek outside suppliers and by using Chrysler profits to finance research and development by outside companies.

Chrysler hasn't responded to Stepp about the subcontracting of parts work, known in the industry as outsourcing.

However, the company confirmed that Chrysler's chief negotiator, Thomas Miner, would sit on the company's outsourcing subcommittee, across the table from Stepp.

It is unusual for the top negotiators to sit on the various subcommittees that bargain the national contract in piecemeal fashion. But Stepp said last week the move reflected "a considerable amount of anger...among our members as the result of this corporation's outsourcing activities."

Chrysler has been vocal on its targeted major issue — work rules and job classifications.

The company wants to shed the strict system of rules prohibiting workers from doing jobs set aside for other workers. Chrysler complains it is saddled with more than 100 job classifications in its assembly plants and more than 500 throughout the corporation.

Despite the plant closings, Chrysler retains some of the oldest brick and mortar in the auto industry.

Chrysler wants to make those old factories more efficient by reducing the number of job classes to eight or fewer.

The Japanese usually have two or three job classes in their plants, allowing for a smaller workforce with employees who can do a variety of jobs. Stepp has said that reducing the number of job classifications at Chrysler would allow the company to eliminate thousands of jobs.

Pay is believed to be a lesser issue. Chrysler workers, during the bad years, received more than $1 an hour less than their counterparts at General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co.

However, the expiring 1982 Chrysler contract provided for large cost-of-living raises, and the average Chrysler worker, now making $13.23 an hour, is just 6 cents an hour behind GM and Ford.

The company is expected to ask for wholesale changes in health care benefits. Retirees are big users of health care and Chrysler has one retired hourly worker for every two who are working, giving it the biggest health-care cost burden of the Big Three.

Club shares native dances

By KRISTI YEARGIN
Collegian Reporter

The International Club went beyond Manhattan to all corners of the world Saturday night.

Members of the club shared costumes, music and dances representative of their native countries, or countries they have visited. The dance was sponsored by the International Student Center.

This dance, and other events sponsored by the club, help bring international students together and provide American students the opportunity to learn of other cultures, said Roberta Nelson, graduate in public administration and International Club president.

"I think it was a great way of bringing the international and American people together," said Sudeep Dharan, sophomore in computer science.

Membership to the International Club and its activities is open to all students at the University, regardless of nationality, Nelson said.

"I think a lot of Americans on campus don't think they can come to these parties," said Ann Powell, senior in computer science and accounting and treasurer of the club. However, they are encouraged to come and interact, Nelson said.

In addition to providing a means of cultural exchange, the club's activities provide support for some international students, said Juanita Gutierrez of Colombia, graduate in journalism and mass communications.

Gutierrez has been at the University for only one month. The people and activities in the club have helped her get over her homesickness, she said.

Dance and costume contests were held at the dance with judges Douglas Benson, associate professor in modern languages, Fayez Husseini, assistant professor in pre-design professions, Donna Davis, head of the International Student Center and Nelson.

Moh'd Qarqash, senior in civil engineering, and Korotoumou Quattara, both from Jordan, tied for first place for best native costume. In the dance contest, Gabriele Hecker from West Germany, graduate in computer science, and Ahed Awad from Palestine, senior in electrical engineering, won as best dance couple.

Godfather's #1 PIZZA PURSUIT
Ridiculous facts concerning pizza and its origins...
Pizza was actually invented in 1623, when the wife of Luigi Pizziliano accidentally sat on a large ball of bread dough left to rise on a chair. The resulting pancake had such an interesting, saucer-like shape that she spread it with tomato sauce, tossed on some cheese, and popped it into her stone oven. Later, when pizza had become a Pizziliano family staple, Luigi's wife took to throwing it at him, frisbee style, when he didn't come home on time. The first pizza delivery!

Congress, farmers to assess industry's future

250,000 to visit 33rd annual progress show

By The Associated Press

KNIGHTSTOWN, Ind. — More than 250,000 farmers, businessmen and agriculture officials are expected this week for the 33rd annual Farm Progress Show, sometimes called the "World's Fair of Agriculture," which begins Tuesday.

A trade exhibition for farmers, the show will continue through Thursday on two farms just west of Knightstown.

Show manager Kevin N. Wheeler said most farmers are not financially sound and have seen their cash flow constantly eroded.

"They'll be asking questions," Wheeler said, explaining that participating farmers want to know what bankruptcy trends and industry mergers hold for them.

Farmers will seek out equipment manufacturers more than dealers because they want to know if a company will be around several years from now to provide parts and service for its implements, Wheeler said.

"We are one of the few shows at which farmers buy," Wheeler said. "That is the reason there are so many exhibits. There will be 320 this year. Each show brings in a new crop of farmers. Most come to buy and get information. It is a selling atmosphere, not a fair."

The event is sponsored by Farm Progress Cos. Inc., a publisher of several farm magazines. The show's site alternates among Illinois, Indiana and Iowa.

Harvesting and fall tillage equipment will highlight field demonstrations, which allow farmers to make side-by-side comparisons of competing machinery brands under actual field conditions.

Wheeler said conservation tillage demonstrations, which were popular at last year's show, will be repeated. They include no-till and ridge-till planters and cultivators at work.

Several state and federal agencies also will have exhibits at the fair. The state of Indiana will have a tent with the theme, "Working Now for a Better Tomorrow," which will feature displays from 21 state agencies and organizations.

House nears vote on portion of farm bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — For the second consecutive week, the shape of future agriculture programs dominates action in the U.S. House of Representatives, and a vote is expected Tuesday on a bitterly contested provision in the 1985 farm bill that would give grain farmers the right to decide between two options for how their crops are subsidized.

That section of the bill, written by Rep. Berkley Bedell, D-Iowa, would put wheat and feed grain price-support systems to a national vote. Producers could choose between the declining support prices and frozen income supports in the bill, or an alternative featuring strict marketing controls and sharply higher support prices.

The Reagan administration, which suffered suprisingly lopsided defeats on sugar and dairy price-support portions of the bill last week, was taking aim at the Bedell referendum.

"It sounds harmless," said Agriculture Secretary John Block. "Just letting the farmers decide what they want to do. But I think the program, if adopted, would be devastating to American agriculture."

Block contends the alternate plan's high price supports would send U.S. grain prices shooting so high that no foreign customer would be interested in buying them. Grain farmers are now heavily dependent on exports to soak up their surplus production.

"The kinds of problems a bill like this would create are almost endless," Block said.

Bedell contends his legislation would bolster farm income at a time when farmers — particularly those in the grain belt — are suffering from serious economic problems. And he argues that export subsidies built into the bill would offset the high support levels and maintain overseas sales.

Other confrontations expected when farm bill work resumes on Tuesday include an amendment to scrap the national peanut quota system and one to rescind the income support freeze written into the bill by the House Agriculture Committee.

ed to offer figures, he said the goal won't be met by the National Security Agency and the Defense Intelligence Agency because their employees "have an undisputed need for a clearance."

As for chances of new cuts, Snider said: "I do not anticipate further across-the-board reductions at this time."

Snider also noted, however, that Navy Secretary John F. Lehman Jr. has set a goal of reducing Navy clearances by 50 percent as soon as possible, and Weinberger also ordered a 10 percent reduction in the number of new requests for security clearances during fiscal 1986, which begins Tuesday.

The Navy's higher goal of 50 percent was a direct response to the so-called Walker family spy scandal, which erupted in May with the arrest of John Anthony Walker, a retired warrant officer, who was accused of passing Navy secrets to the Soviet Union over a 20-year period.

Because of Lehman's special crackdown, Snider said the service had revoked or reduced the number of security clearances by at least 26 percent since the scandal began. A Navy source who requested anonymity said Friday the actual total might be as high as 45 percent, but reports were still being received from the field.

Before the crackdown, the Pentagon said about 2.5 million military personnel, civilian employees and congressional aides had clearances. Another 1.4 million individuals employed by defense contractors held clearances, along with 400,000 members of the Guard and Reserve forces.

Of the 4.3 million total, some 622,000 individuals held a Top Secret clearance in June, while 3.6 million held Secret clearances and the remainder Confidential.

in flames in a riot that black leaders said was prompted by a police crackdown on drug trafficking.

"Brixton is a cauldron which has been simmering for a long time," said local councilor Paul Boateng.

"It took this incident for it to boil over," he said. "But it could have happened any time because there is a lot of bitterness and alienation felt by young people who have no status in society."

The injured woman, Cherry Groce, 38, spent the night in the intensive care unit at St. Thomas Hospital with bullet fragments in her spine. She was trasnferred to a general ward Sunday and reported in stable condition. Doctors said it was too early to tell whether she was paralyzed.

Boateng, who is a lawyer and who visited the family, said Groce would sue the police.

Ag Careers Day introduces students to job possibilities

By ALICE KUNSHEK
Collegian Reporter

Students from across the state observed the curriculums in the College of Agriculture, and encountered possible jobs in that field of study, at the annual Agricultural Careers Day Saturday.

About 500 students from 50 high schools and community colleges attended the event presented by Ag Student Council and the College of Agriculture.

"The purpose of this day is for high school students to get a chance to get an idea about the careers and jobs they can expect to have in agriculture," said Mary Sobba, ag careers day coordinator and sophomore in agricultural economics.

In a general orientation session, students were welcomed to K-State and the College of Agriculture, and were encouraged in their pursuit of a career in agriculture.

"Agriculture is a production-based industry," said Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture. "If we didn't produce, agriculture wouldn't exist."

Only 2 percent of the United States population live and produce crops and livestock on farms, Woods said. That figure is increased to 20 percent when those in the production delivery system are included.

Woods answered the question "What is Agriculture?" for those attending careers day.

"Agriculture depends heavily on science and the knowledge of the understanding of production," he said.

Woods also talked about what employers of agriculture graduates look for when hiring: They must be able to communicate; they must know about economics; they must accept a challenge, and they must be willing to continue to learn, he said.

David Mugler, associate dean and director of resident instruction in the College of Agriculture, addressed the students in the general session, giving them three primary reasons to come to K-State.

The first reason Mugler cited was the agriculture faculty.

"They are some of the best in the country and have been recognized by those in their field," he said.

There are 18 major fields of study in the College of Agriculture, Mugler continued, and "there are quality programs in each."

The third reason was "the opportunities which await our graduates."

"Last year we were 8,000 graduates short in agriculture (demand) across the United States," Mugler said. There was a need for 59,000 graduates total.

Students were dismissed from the general session to make departmental visits of their choice for the remainder of the day. They were encouraged to visit the two departments which interested them most.

NASA pursues 'super' jet

Craft may move at Mach 25

By The Associated Press

The White House and Congress have told NASA to produce the world's fastest airliner by the 1990s, which could mean an American supersonic aircraft soon will be outflying the British Concorde.

By the turn of the century, according to an article in the October issue of Popular Mechanics, NASA and the aerospace industry expect to come up with a Trans-Atmospheric Vehicle (TAV) that travels above the atmosphere at speeds approaching Mach 25 (25 times the speed of sound).

The Supersonic Transport (SST) has become more attractive in the 10 years since Congress scrapped America's SST program as too costly, too noisy and too marginal in benefits, leaving the field open to the British-French Concorde. The French later dropped out of the project.

The Concorde, modified over the years, has outlasted its predicted operational life. But the American SST would use new technologies and materials for a new breed of airplane now on the drawing boards and in the wind tunnels.

McDonald Douglas is developing an Advanced Supersonic Transport or AST that could carry 350 passengers at Mach 2.2 by 1990.

Lockheed, which was working on SST concepts before the Concorde, plans a plane that would achieve Mach 2.55, fueled by liquid hydrogen to cut the high cost of jet fuel.

Two more SSTs are under development at NASA, each cruising at between Mach 2 and Mach 3.

One would carry 400 passengers at Mach 2.7. New aviation materials could handle the heat of supersonic speed. The Concorde handles heat by expanding nine inches in flight. The other NASA design has an oblique wing that could pivot up to 80 degrees from the centerline of the fuselage to cut high speed noise and drag.

These craft could compete with the Concorde within 10 years, but NASA and the aerospace industry want to go hypersonic — to five times the speed of sound and more. Two possibilities are the Hypersonic Scramjet and the TAV.

The Scramjet takes off on rocket power. When it reaches Mach 2 the forward speed of the aircraft rams air into the engine, so no turbine is needed.

The TAV now on the drawing board also would use the scramjet concept and could be launched on a rocket platform or dropped from the belly of a space shuttle. It is being designed for speeds beyond Mach 20 — perhaps as high as Mach 25.

The arrow wing may replace the Concorde's delta wing on the American SST. The delta provides quick lift but its weight limits the jet's range to 3,250 miles. With new lightweight materials, the arrow wing can withstand extra lift without adding wing area and has a range of 3,800 nautical miles.

The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency is developing an engine for horizontal takeoff that can operate at 150,000 feet. The engine could be tested on a plane by 1988. The White House envisions a Mach 3 airliner before the end of the century.

The aerospace industry, according to Sheldon M. Gallager in Popular Mechanics, is on the verge of producing an American SST to compete with the Concorde, with even higher flying plans by the end of the century.

Rabbits infesting Cal State campus

By College Press Service

Officials at Cal State-San Bernardino have considered everything from installing electronic noise devices to spraying the grounds with hot sauce to drive away hordes of wild rabbits that are devouring campus greenery.

"Nobody has anything against them, but they do hop all over campus and chew up the vegetation," said Robert Lohnes, San Bernardino's assistant director of plant operations.

"It's impossible to come onto campus and not notice them running around," he said. "They co-mingle with students, they drink out of the campus water (hoses), and they love to uproot our grass."

Indeed, "this is a very dry, arid region of the state," said Jerry Rosen, spokesman for the San Bernardino Humane Society, "and the lush, green campus is probably very attractive to the rabbits."

Urban sprawl has driven the hares out of their natural grasslands and forced them to feed off of local lawns and gardens, including the spacious San Bernardino campus, Rosen said.

The same rural development has pushed out much of the other wildlife that once preyed on the rabbits, causing a tremendous increase in the bunny population, Lohnes said.

"Coyotes used to keep the number of rabbits down," he said, "but the area has built up so much that the predators have left, and the rabbits have it all to themselves. And they proliferate you know."

Campus officials have been searching for a way to get the rabbits off campus without hurting them or interfering with the local ecosystem, Lohnes said.

"But so far, every option has either been flatly denounced by environmentalists or too expensive, or both."

At one time officials even considered dousing the campus greenery with hot sauce to make it distasteful to the rabbits.

"Well, there's certainly plenty of hot sauce here in southern California," said the Humane Society's Rosen.

Transit

campus mass transit system would be about $95,000, Derr said. The figure is based on a price of $22 per hour of operation quoted by a Junction City bus firm. The estimated hours of operation are 4,000 per semester, which include 32 hours per day during registration and finals days and 54 hours per day during regular class days. Derr said the cost of the system per student for the semester would be about $6.

Derr said the major benefit of the proposed bus system would be increased mobility. He said students on campus would find the ease in getting across campus using the system to be worth their portion of the funds. Also, the students who live beyond the area served by the system would find looking for a parking space less of a problem, as well as the benefit of the increased mobility the system would provide while they are on campus.

"On-campus bus systems are quite common at various colleges, and they apparently work," Fred Ferguson, executive director of the Division of University Facilities, said. "One possible difficulty of implementing the system at the University, however, is that we have a generally pedestrian campus. Under proper conditions, though, the system could be quite effective."

Derr said a second benefit of the proposed bus system is also involved — an educational benefit.

"Many students have not been involved in a bus system before," he said. "Interaction with the system will help them understand what a system can and cannot do."

Employee blames facilities division for asbestos event

By WAYNE PRICE
Managing Editor

A K-State employee said Monday that the Division of University Facilities is at fault — not laborers — for the mishandling of asbestos in late August and early September.

Mark Innes, a construction laborer with the University, said he notified University Facilities about an asbestos problem in the basement of Waters Hall the second day a crew began working to remove a portion of ruptured heating pipe.

A University statement released Sept. 26 read in part, "Employees making emergency repairs to a steam line did not follow established University rules and instructions on the handling of asbestos materials."

Innes, who said he's been an employee at K-State for about five years, disagreed.

"We did not follow the correct procedures, but we did not know the procedures," Innes said. "In five years, I have had no training on how to move asbestos."

Asbestos has been found to cause cancer in some medical cases.

The Enviormental Protection Agency is investigating the incident after receiving complaints by Innes earlier this month that asbestos on campus was not handled in accordance with EPA standards.

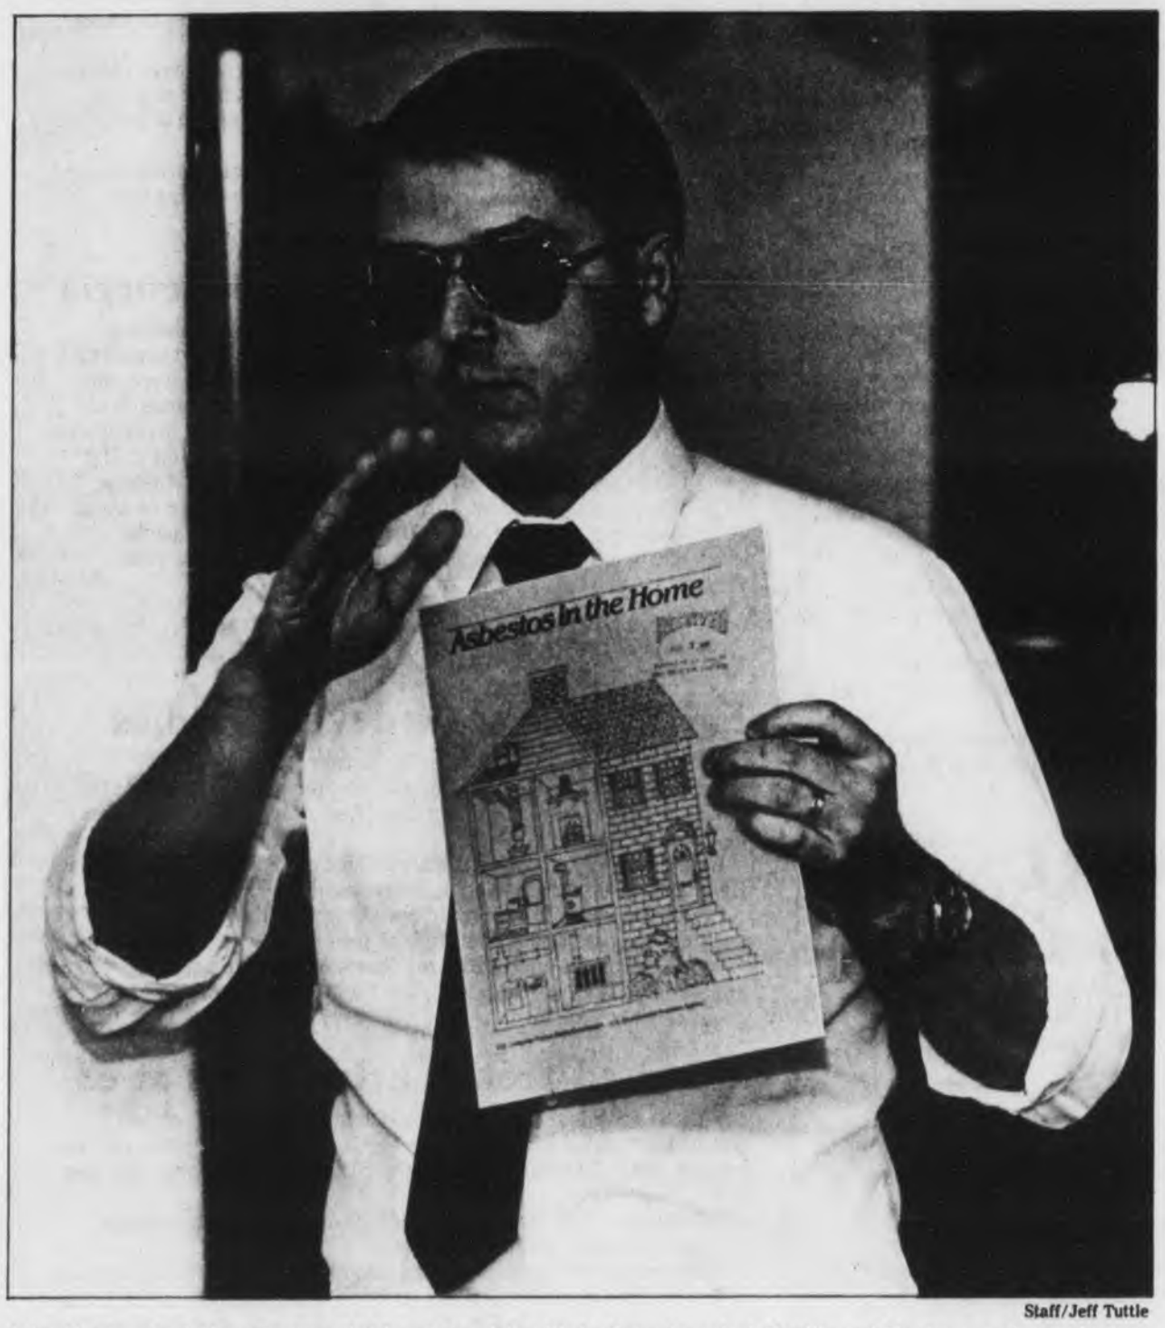
Innes said he was unaware of University standards regarding the handling of asbestos.

Laborers began work in late August to move a section of asbestos-wrapped pipe from the basement of Waters Hall to a temporary dump site about 100 yards from the Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center on the northeast side of campus.

"They're blaming me for the job when we complained to them," Innes said. "We called the hierarchy — the administration — and nothing was done."

Innes said he notified his supervisor of the asbestos problem, who in turn instructed Innes to talk with Jack Watson, general supervisor of shops for University Facilities.

Innes said Watson arrived at the work site the morning following his complaint. When Watson was told of the asbestos problem, Innes said, "He (Watson) threw his hands up in the air and walked in Waters Hall. He didn't say anything."



Watson said he "doesn't remember" if he discussed an asbestos problem with Innes but the incident Innes described as taking place outside Waters Hall was "absolutely false."

"I walked past that area," Watson said. "But to my knowledge he never did ask me anything about an asbestos problem."

Watson said he put out a booklet in April for University workers concerning new procedures on handling asbestos.

Innes said he has never seen such a manual but John Lambert, direc-

Environmental official denies local asbestos risk

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

Parents concerned about asbestos found at a dump site 100 yards from Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center met Monday night at the center to question officials about the incident.

John Erwin, chief of enviromental toxology at the State Department of Health and Enviroment, told about 10-15 parents that even if the children had been exposed to asbestos fibers, the amount would not have been a significant exposure risk.

"In my view the asbestos that was found at the site near here would not cause a dangerous exposure risk unless someone was up there (dumpsite) beating it," Erwin said.

Cheryl Troup, 217 N. 14th St., said she was concerned about how much asbestos would be an exposure risk after officials at the Enviromental Protection Agency told her that "even one fiber could cause health risks."

John Lambert, director of campus safety, said the "one fiber," is a health risk comparable to cigarette smoking.

"They say one cigarette can cause cancer, so you smoke all your life and how do you know which cigarette caused the cancer?" Lambert said. "One asbestos fiber can pose a health risk, but you ingest many a day, how can you say that you will have health problems because of the asbestos?"

Erwin said the EPA standards allow ingestion of 20 million asbestos fibers a day for a worker at a job five days a week and eight hours a day.

"We are still concerned about those levels of ingestion," Erwin said.

Troup said she had considered taking her child out of the Stonehouse, and was still concerned about the situation.

"My concern is that there are so many different answers. I got different answers from these people (Lambert and Watson) yesterday," she said. "I'm not real confident with their answers tonight, they might change."

Troup said her child was still in the Stonehouse program, but she was still considering taking him out.

Heckler to consider resignation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan asked Health and Human Services Secretary Margaret Heckler on Monday to give up her Cabinet post for the ambassadorship to Ireland, the White House announced.

Heckler, who launched a campaign in recent days to save her job at the helm of the government's largest department, asked for and was given a few days to think about it, presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said.

Heckler met with Reagan alone in the Oval Office for 50 minutes Monday afternoon to try to talk him out of reassigning her.

But Speakes said the president, who denied earlier in the day that he would fire the HHS secretary, urged her to accept the job as "a promotion."

Earlier, Reagan had declared himself satisfied with the performance of Heckler, whose management ability and loyalty to conservative principles have been questioned by top administration officials.

Heckler, after leaving the White House, ignored reporters' attempts to question her. She returned to HHS headquarters after the session and met with some members of her staff. A spokeswoman said the secretary would have no immediate comment on the session with Reagan.

Reagan, who had never asked a member of his Cabinet to step down, apparently was convinced by his chief of staff, Donald T. Regan, and other advisers that Heckler should be moved out of the leadership of the giant bureaucracy. But Speakes insisted the president was not dissatisfied with her performance and that she was not being fired.

Asked if she had the option of remaining in her post, however, the spokesman replied, "I do not have an answer to that."

Speakes said Heckler has "served with distinction as a member of Congress and as a member of the Cabinet" and, as a woman of Irish descent, "she would make a valuable contribution in U.S.-Irish relations and be able to work toward solving problems in the region."

"Mrs. Heckler has asked for a few days to consider the president's offer and will respond at that time," the spokesman said. "Meanwhile, she

Blacks denied voting rights

Botha passes rights concessions

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — President P.W. Botha offered some concessions to South Africa's black majority Monday, including the possibility of seats on the advisory President's Council, but ruled out full voting rights. He said the lesson of black Africa is that one man, one vote "means the dictatorship of the strongest black group."

Botha declared his commitment to a united nation that allows for black rights, but said any future system must protect the rights of whites and other minorities in South Africa, which has been swept by more than a year of violence against white-minority rule.

The 60-member President's Council advises the government on legislation. It was restructured last year to include mixed-race and Asian members, after legislative bodies with limited power were established for those minorities. But whites remain in control.

Rioting continued in black townships. Police said mobs killed three blacks and set fire to their bodies in the latest outbreak of black-against-black violence.

More than 700 blacks have been killed since rioting began against apartheid, the race laws that guarantee privilege for South Africa's 5 million whites and deny rights to the 24 million blacks. Most died at the hands of police, but some are victims of other blacks who accuse them of being informers or of cooperating with the white government.

Botha offered no specifics in his speech to a congress of his ruling National Party in the Cape Province city of Port Elizabeth. He said details must be negotiated.

It contained none of the bellicosity that characterized his remarks to the Durban party congress Aug. 15, in which he said full voting rights for blacks would take the white minority "on a road to abdication and suicide."

Disappointment over the tone and contents of the Durban speech caused international reaction that thrust the country deeper into financial crisis and sent its currency to new lows on world markets.

The president said in Port Elizabeth that structures must be built to give blacks effective power over their own communities, in cities as well as tribal homelands, and a say in matters of concern to all people of South

State treasury receipts fall short

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Slumps in sales and corporate income tax revenues during September left state treasury receipts between $5 million and $5.5 million short of the estimate for the first quarter of Fiscal Year 1986, state Revenue Secretary Harley T. Duncan reported Monday.

Sales tax collections were 9 percent below what had been expected during September, while corporate income taxes fell 13 percent short of projections during the month. In dollars, sales taxes were off $3.96 million and corporation income taxes were down $3.01 million from estimates made last March.

In addition, individual income taxes sagged $1.92 million, or 3 percent, below what had been expected and the mineral severance tax was down $316,000, or 4 percent, for the month.

The combination of all four of the state's biggest revenue producers having an off month left the state $8.31 million short of the estimate for September.

The shortfall for the month wiped out what had been modest excess over the estimate through August receipts, and left state government $5.53 million, or 1.5 percent, behind for the quarter in tax collections.

Duncan said receipts from interest income on state idle funds and other minor income sources would reduce the shortfall a little, perhaps to $5 million.

"It was pretty modest growth in September," Duncan said of the tax receipt figures. "Sales and individual income taxes were about like they have been since late in the 1985 fiscal year. The new feature is the softness in corporate income taxes."

69 percent of GTAs pass English proficiency exam

By BECKY WEBER
Collegian Reporter

Some University graduate teaching assistants will no longer be allowed to teach classes because of new requirements by the Board of Regents.

In an attempt to improve GTA teaching ability, the regents are requiring graduate students to pass competency tests in spoken English.

New GTAs from non-English speaking countries were required to take the Test of Spoken English, administered by the University Aug. 20. The test is standardized by the Education Testing Services, a national organization from the University of Princeton, said Robert F. Kruh, dean of the Graduate School.

The results of the exams were released Friday by James Armagost, associate professor of speech.

Of the 45 GTAs who took the exam, 69 percent of the GTAs passed the test with the required score of 220 out of 300; 18 percent passed with the score of 190 and are allowed to teach this semester, providing they are enrolled in English classes and will retake the test in January.

The remaining 13 percent of the GTAs failed the exam, Armagost said. Those who failed the exams are not allowed to teach, but can work in research within their department.

During the last week of July, the regents notified the University that all new GTA's from non-English speaking countries would have to pass the exam to teach during the fall semester.

Kruh said several years ago the University required non-native English speaking GTAs to take an English speaking test, before being allowed to teach. About six years ago, a faculty panel was set up to review the new GTAs language proficiency in the classroom.

Kruh said he believes the Test of Spoken English exam is more standardized and less subjective than the panel method used before. The exam requires the GTA to be taped for about 30 minutes, speaking in complete sentences, describing different items or pictures. The tapes are then reviewed by two of four linguistic specialists trained by Armagost to evaluate the exam.

The GTAs must have a good vocabulary and fluency, without much hesitation in their speech. If the scores given by the two liguistic specialists are not close, a third specialist must also review the tape to gauge the level of proficiency.

"I don't think this will eliminate complaints" from students that enroll in classes taught by non-English GTAs, Kruh said. "Despite our best efforts there will still be students who will report problems in understanding their instructors. In any event, it is our responsiblity to make sure students can understand and I feel the ETS system has worked well."

Lebanese gunmen kidnap 3 Soviets

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Gunmen dragged three Soviet diplomats and an embassy doctor out of their official cars, fired bullets at their feet and kidnapped them Monday in Moslem west Beirut, police and witnesses said.

Radio reports said the Soviets were seized from two embassy cars that later were found abandoned near Beirut airport. Witnesses said one of the cars was intercepted by several gunmen.

They dragged two Soviets out, the witnesses said, fired handguns at their feet, pushed them into a white Mercedes and drove off. The other two Soviets were seized from a second car, police said.

An embassy spokesman confirmed the kidnappings but declined to give details.

They were the first Soviets known to be kidnapped in Beirut since gunmen started seizing foreigners in January 1984. Thirty-five foreigners have been abducted since then and 14 other foreigners are still missing — six Americans, four Frenchmen, three Britons and an Italian.

Lebanese authorities identified the Soviet diplomats as Second Secretary Valery Kornev, Commerce Attache Oleg Spirin, Cultural Attache Arkady Katakov and embassy physician Nikolai Versky.

London surveys riot wreckage

LONDON — The streets of riot-torn Brixton were calm Monday as insurance experts surveyed burned and looted buildings and estimated that property damage could exceed $7 million.

London's city council announced Monday it would invest $1.4 million in new housing in the racially mixed Brixton neighborhood following weekend violence sparked when police shot and wounded a black mother of six.

After sporadic incidents Sunday night that led to 48 arrests, police lifted a security cordon around the rundown south London district Monday morning.

The latest riot, the worst in London since 1981, injured 36 people, gutted four buildings, left dozens of others looted and led to 220 arrests, police said.

Electrical rates may increase Friday

TOPEKA — It likely will be Thursday or Friday before new electricity rates take effect for customers of Kansas City Power and Light Co. and Kansas Gas and Electric Co., a spokesman for the Kansas Corporation Commission said Monday.

The commission approved last Friday interim rate increases totaling $131.7 million for the two utilities to begin paying the costs of building the $3.05 billion Wolf Creek nuclear generating plant now in operation near Burlington.

Campground explosion kills one

NEWTON — One woman was killed and 23 people were injured when propane gas explosion destroyed a campground office Monday, authorities said.

The blast occurred shortly after 10 a.m. at the Spring Lake Camping Resort about 10 miles west of Newton on U.S. 50, a Harvey County Sheriff's office spokesman said.

"It was just a big explosion and the roof just really started falling in," said James Hansen of Towanda. He was inside the building with his wife listening to a sales presentation.

Liquor tax prompts run on stores

Vodka, whiskey and scotch disappeared from store shelves across the country Monday as customers put in a final rush to buy their booze ahead of an increase in federal liquor taxes.

"We're having a mad rush," said Mike Bordenave, a St. Paul, Minn., liquor store clerk as people carted out cases of liquor and cordials. Stores around the country reported sales up from 30 to 50 percent.

The sales rush peaked hours before new federal rules went into effect, increasing taxes by an average 19 percent. Starting at 12:01 a.m. Tuesday, drinkers were taxed $12.50 for each gallon of 100 proof booze, up $2 from the old rate of $10.50 a gallon.

"Customers have been aware of the increase," said Harold Kraun, manager of a Hamilton, N.J., liquor store. "The customers that can afford it are doing the heavy buying."

Shooting protesters riot in Georgia

ASHBURN, Ga. — Hundreds of blacks protesting the shooting death of a black prisoner who tried to escape from police began hurling rocks and bottles downtown Monday night, breaking store windows and injuring at least two passing motorists, authorities said.

State troopers and agents from the Georgia Bureau of Investigation were called in from surrounding areas to help restore calm in the town of 4,500 people, said Turner County Sheriff Lamar Whiddon.

The disturbance broke out after 6:30 p.m. when a crowd of about 350 to 600 people gathered at the Turner County Courthouse to demonstrate following the slaying earlier in the day of Robert Wright.

Earthquake scale developer dies

PASADENA, Calif. — Charles F. Richter, the pioneering seismologist who helped develop the Richter scale to measure the power of earthquakes, died Monday after a long battle with heart disease. He was 85.

Richter died of congestive heart failure at 12:30 p.m., said Jerene Hewitt, Richter's friend and spokeswoman.

Before his death, Richter had been aware of the giant Mexico City earthquakes that killed thousands of people on Sept. 19 and 20.

"Yes, one of the nurses told me Thursday that he had been watching television and listening to the Richter scale ranking of the earthquake," she said.

Admired French actress dies at 63

PARIS — Simone Signoret, whose long career as an actress, political activist and writer made her one of France's most admired women, died of cancer Monday at her home outside Paris. She was 64.

"She fought until the end. She died as she lived, with courage," said her daughter Catherine Allegret.

Allegret, the actress's only child, said her mother died at 7:30 a.m. at her country home. Signoret's husband of 34 years, actor and singer Yves Montand, was filming in the south of France and his agent's office said he returned to the home at Autheuil-Authouillet, in the Eure region west of Paris.

Signoret's roles in more than 40 films ranged from the husky-voiced blond beauty of Jacques Becker's "Casque d'Or" in 1951 to the aging prostitute in Moshe Misrahi's "Madame Rosa," which won the 1977 Academy Award for best foreign film.

Student architects win national honors

By CONRAD EASTERDAY
Staff Writer

The Department of Landscape Architecture recently broke an awards record it set in 1983.

This year, instead of producing two student winners in the American Society of Landscape Architecture's Distinguished Student Awards, the department produced three.

Two of this year's winners, Elizabeth Mingle and Dennis Decker, both of whom graduated in landscape architecture in May and now work for firms in the field, won awards as undergraduates. The third winner is Steven Rodie, graduate in landscape architecture.

The only year two students from the same school won the award was in 1983, when the University captured the honors. Now, K-State has become the only school of 50 nationwide to have three students win, the maximum number Society rules allow, said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

"For architecture, this is the equivalent of the Grand Slam (of tennis), the World Series and the Super Bowl rolled into one," Lapping said.

About 60 students competed in the Society's national design competition, which decides who will receive the awards. Formal presentation of the awards will take place at the Society's national convention Oct. 12 in Cincinnati.

To qualify for one of the awards, students must be graduate students or in their final two years of study and have a 3.2 grade point average for undergraduates and a 3.5 for graduate students, Lapping said.

Each student must also present a self-chosen design project at the state level before competing in May at the national competition. A panel of jurors evaluates the projects without knowing the project's designer or school.

"I don't have any idea why K-State students were three of the six (students chosen)," said Ray Uecker, the awards jury chairman of the design awards competition and president of the Fort Lauderdale, Fla. landscape architecture firm, Uecker Land Team. "It wasn't a very easy decision because we were looking at the cream of the crop."

Uecker said the design projects' "excellent graphics" and students' presentations were the things he noticed first in his evaluations.

Rodie attributes University students' winning 12 of the 40 awards handed out since the competition began — twice the number any other school has won — to the overall excellence of the program.

"In terms of landscape architecture, I know in talking to professionals we (K-State) are regarded very highly," Rodie said. "I think all the awards have shown that."

The three's design projects and those of the other winners are to be featured in this month's Landscape Architecture Magazine, Uecker said.

Rodie and Decker will travel to Cincinnati to formally accept the awards at the society's national convention. Mingle, who is working in San Francisco, said she would be unable to attend.

Farmers may use crops as collateral

By VICKI REYNOLDS
Government Editor

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., is cosponsoring an amendment to the 1985 Farm Bill establishing a resource marketing loan program and targeted deficiency payments for farmers.

The amendment, scheduled to be introduced on the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives today, "has a 50-50 chance — it will be close," said Renee Wessels, press secretary in Slattery's office.

The marketing loan provision would allow farmers using their grain as collateral for a government loan to repay the loan for less than the original rate if market prices fall below the original loan level.

The loan program is based on the wheat marketing concept, Wessels said.

The current farm bill proposal would give Secretary of Agriculture John Block the option to use the marketing loan program. The amendment makes the implementation of the program mandatory.

"This amendment is a bold step to help family farmers," Slattery said. "The marketing loan provision sends a message to the international market that American farmers will be competitive. Yet, family farm income is protected at the same time."

Under the amendment, formulas using average market prices of recent years would set basic loan rates for the program. Decreases in the loan rate, if crop prices decline, would be limited to 5 percent per year.

The amendment assumes the same wheat and feed grains limits on loan amounts with no limit on differential payments.

A targeted deficiency payments program for farmers is also established under the amendment.

"The targeting provisions would direct scarce federal funds to those middle-sized family farms most in need of assistance," Slattery said. "It's ridiculous that 43 percent of farm program resources are going to only 10 percent of our farms."

Targeted deficiency payments would be established at $4.50 per bushel of wheat on the first 15,000 bushels and $4 on additional production. For corn, the targeted payments would be $3.10 per bushel on the first 30,000 bushels and $2.80 on additional production.

The amendment states there would be no payment on crop bases less than 15 acres. Maximum program benefits are targeted to the middle 85 to 90 percent of farmers with wheat bases from 15 to 500 acres and corn bases from 15 to 325 acres, Slattery said.

Other sponsors of the amendment are: Dan Glickman, D-Kan.; Pat Roberts, R-Kan.; Tom Daschle, D-S.D.; and Arlan Stangeland, R-Minn.

The marketing loan and targeted deficiency payments provisions meet federal budgetary guidelines set by President Reagan.

It is not known when House members will vote on the amendment.

Professionals reject economic predictions

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government said Monday that its main economic forecasting gauge registered a strong increase in August, but while the Reagan administration hailed the news as evidence the economy is back on track, private analysts were not so optimistic.

A new survey of the nation's business economists found them predicting only a modest upturn in growth in coming months with more than half expecting the country will be in a new recession by the end of next year.

The Commerce Department's Index of Leading Indicators, meanwhile, rose 0.7 percent in August, the fourth consecutive advance for the index, which is designed to predict future changes in the course of the economy.

The August advance matched a revised July gain and was the strongest performance for the index since last February.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the leading indicators provided "further evidence that a rapid improvement in economic performance is under way in the second half."

The administration is forecasting a surge in economic growth to a 5 percent annual rate for the final six months of the year, far above the anemic 1.1 percent pace in the first half of 1985.

But in its latest survey of 350 economists, the National Association of Business Economists said its members foresee only modest growth in coming months as the U.S. economy continues to be held back by soaring federal budget deficits.

The business economists forecast growth this year of only 2.2 percent followed by only a slight rebound to 2.8 percent growth next year, giving the country two years of very sluggish economic activity. The economists predicted that both unemployment and budget deficits will rise because of the weak growth.

The administration, by contrast, is calling for economic growth of 3 percent this year and 4 percent next year with unemployment and the budget deficit declining.

In an even more ominous prediction, 52 percent of the economists said the country would be in a recession by the end of 1986, brought on in part by the federal government's inability to control deficits.

Other private economists also disagreed with the administration's rosy interpretation of the August rise in the leading indicators.

"It looks like a stand-pat policy with interest rates staying about where they are," said Allen Sinai, chief economist for Shearson Lehman Brothers.

Costs of utilities increase

The Kansas Corporation Commission, after lengthy hearings during the past few months, decided to reduce the original rate increases requested of Wolf Creek users.

In what The Associated Press called a "historic Wolf Creek nuclear power plant rate case," the commission decided to grant first-year rate increases of only 30 percent of the amounts requested by the three principal owners.

As a result, customers of Kansas City Power and Light Co. will face increases of 14.7 percent; customers of Kansas Gas and Electric, headquartered in Wichita, 36.7 percent and retail customers of the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative will face increases of 20 to 25 percent.

In addition to the rate increases, other conclusions of the commission include the final report stating that due to skyrocketing costs, the plant should have been abandoned in 1981.

Also, the commission report stated that 61.2 percent of KG&E's share, and 58.9 percent of KCP&L's share of the power plant's output was unneeded.

Another fact brought to light was the original reason for delays in construction.

Those delays, now blamed for cost increases, began at the request of Ralph Fiebach, president of KG&E, supposedly to allow the utility to improve its cash flow, thus reducing the need for outside capital. This statement was made in September 1974.

Eleven years later, following the Friday announcement, Robert Rives, KG&E vice president, said the increase granted was "disappointing and potentially serious."

Although the commission should be commended for keeping the consumer in mind in restricting the amount of increase, there should always remain the question of whether or not a private, stock owner-controlled company have dividends guaranteed by the commission.

In view of these findings, the commerce commission should look into future increase requests with the same intensity — and results — as with this hearing.

Consumers should not have to pay for the greed and ineptitude of management.

Anyone can get a license to hunt on campus — a permit to hunt for a parking place that is.

There were two proposals that would attempt to alleviate the parking crunch given during the open forum of the Students for Educational Awareness last week. The SEA was taking proposals for use of $700,000 students will receive from the refinancing of bonds.

One proposal was a mass transit system proposal from Gorden Derr, instructor in civil engineering, and the other was a computerized ticketing proposal from Charles Beckom, campus police captain.

The mass transit system would cost in the neighborhood of $95,000 — compared to $183,305 collected last year in parking violations

The computerized ticketing proposal, at a cost of $61,000 to $62,000, would make it easier and faster for campus police to ticket vehicles violating a parking regulation.

More ticketing will result in only a few more open parking spaces, thus it is not much of a solution to the parking problem.

The mass transit system, at a per student cost of approximately $6, would serve off-campus and on-campus students by escorting them to and around the campus.

Parking is a frustrating problem for students. Being late for class, paying fines for illegal parking, fear of bodily harm and many other problems are a pain in the neck for the campus parking space hunter.

Instead of assuming that more parking spaces, a mass transit system or higher ticket prices would alleviate the problem, it's time the University took a long hard look at the problem and the feasible answers before rushing half-cocked into "solutions" that don't help.

Friendship more important than treaties

DANIEL GRUBB
Collegian Columnist

Lately, New Zealand has been, if not a central character, at least an important offstage news personality. The policies of this small country have led to what some are calling the "French Watergate" and to a reevaluation of American policy in the South Pacific.

It all started in July 1984 when David Lange was elected Prime Minister on a platform committed to eliminating all nuclear technology from New Zealand. This, of course, did not please the nuclear nations that have to deal with the country.

France, for example, has refused to stop its atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons in the South Pacific, an action that has irritated inhabitants of the area, including our friend New Zealand.

Well, when a nuclear free zone was declared by several nations, France, or at least some of its officers, decided to get tough. A Greenpeace protest ship, the Rainbow Warrior, was sunk, killing a photographer on board.

While the French would have cheerfully accepted this as a matter of national security, the resulting cover-up has threatened the government of President Francois Mitterand in a way similar to the way Watergate threatened our former President Richard Nixon. Whether the consequences will be similar is yet to be seen.

But while Mitterand is dealing with one aspect of New Zealand policies, the United States is dealing with another. The United States has a policy to never, under any circumstances, reveal which of our ships have nuclear arms and which do not. New Zealand, on the other hand, now has a policy of never letting a ship dock at its ports unless it is definitely not armed with nuclear weapons.

The whole issue came to a head Feb. 4 when a U.S. Navy destroyer was denied a port request on the grounds that "the vessel requested was unable to meet the criteria of New Zealand policy." In other words, if it definitely does not have nuclear weapons, they assume it does and deny port privileges.

President Reagan, with his typically warhead attitude, then became upset. Never mind that the South Pacific is not a strategically important area. Never mind that Lange's action had wide popular support in New Zealand. Never mind that New Zealand is a working democracy. No, if they don't do as WE say, they can't be good guys.

The United States cancelled upcoming military exercises on Feb. 19, arguing that nuclear weapons are an indispensable part of our defense. While this may be true in general, in the South Pacific there seems to be little reason to demand that nuclear weapons be used when conventional ones are sufficient.

Of course, Ronny was looking at the strength of other anti-nuclear movements in other countries. Germany, for example, has a very strong movement. Japan also has had a ban on nuclear arms but has allowed ships to dock.

One issue that arises is whether a democracy has the right to choose its own foriegn policy even when much more powerful nations want it not to. Does the United States have the right to determine New Zealand's nuclear policy and punish the New Zealanders if they don't behave?

Obviously not. Lange is not a Communist, and has in fact, rather rudely rejected Soviet advances after the U.S. withdrawal. The government of New Zealand is committed to the preservation of democracy at any cost, even if it conflicts with U.S. imperialism.

Yes, U.S. imperialism. When we decide other countries' policies for them we are being imperialistic, whether we do it for Nicaragua or for New Zealand.

In some instances there are legitimate national concerns at stake, but not always. As citizens of this country we have to learn the difference. In the case of New Zealand, no overriding national security issue was present. We have simply used this island nation as a test case for our nuclear policies. Considering the laudable goal of making the South Pacific nuclear-free, the U.S. actions seem completely irresponsible.

Just recently, Lange said it is better to keep the United States as a friend than it is to keep intact the military treaties that are damaging their friendship. Hopefully, Reagan will eventually see the logic of Lange's proposals.

Children offer simple answers to question

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

For the last couple of weeks, nearly everyone has been talking about what to do with $700,000 that has surfaced for reallocation from the refinancing of student bonds.

Students, instructors, administrators and even this columnist have offered their ideas. If you're like me, however, you may be getting tired of the whole matter.

Hence, in an effort to bring a fresh look to the issue, I recently visited Lee Elementary School, 701 Lee St., and asked several grade-schoolers what they would do if they had $700,000 to make school more fun or just spend on themselves.

I wish everyone could have watched as the children's eyes lit up and the smiles came across their faces as soon as I asked this question. It immediately made me feel good, and I remembered a quote I once read in a good book, "And a little child shall lead them." I hope their replies brighten up your day as much as they did mine:

— "A sportscar for everyone, a merry-go-round, answers to every spelling test, longer recesses, a banana tree for everyone, school at home and the warmest coat in the world."

— "A bigger music room, better playground equipment, refills at lunchtime and plain paper to draw on."

— "An ice cream machine, a pop machine, more drinks, a bigger library with lots of stuffed animals."

— "Put in a football field and send $10 to me." This student included his address.

— "Get more recess equipment, and let students go to a store and buy things they want and eat them in the classroom."

— "Buy ice cream, hamburgers, hot-dog stands, roller coasters, dugouts and have break-dancing lessons."

— "Well, I would buy 10 computers for the school at $100 each. Then I would buy a salad bar for $10,000. Next I would buy food for the salad bar that would be $2,000 a year. I would buy a new air conditioner and give the rest to the people who needed it most."

— "Make swimming pools for each classroom and buy all the shops in the city."

— "Get more books for everyone in the school, but give all our math books to another school because we don't want them."

— "Make the gym bigger; buy a semi, a car and a mini-bike."

— "I would buy three computers for each room and a robot."

— "I would like to have an ice cream parlor and the ice cream would be 50 cents a scoop. I would like to have a limousine and buy a mansion for my house."

— "Make more playgrounds and have more P.E."

— "I would have a party every day, wear dangling earrings and buy a Cabbage Patch Kid and a castle."

— "A sled, a Monopoly game, a limo and a little pony."

— "A computer for math, a jogging suit for P.E., lots of candy, four watches and go on trips."

— "Have different desk chairs, improve lunch, add lots of animals to the school like horses, dogs, cats, goats, rabbits — any animal that is friendly. And if I had any money left over, I'd pay somebody to beat up my 14-year-old brother, but not too bad 'cause then I'd be embarrassed to have him for a brother." This student included a small drawing of a face with the word "pow!" written beside it.

— Finally, "I would buy a pop machine and some video games, and give everyone in the school $50."

No, I didn't tell him to say that, and no he's not my son!

Isn't it amazing what the needs of children are today? I wish I could remember when things were that simple, when I could be concerned more about what I was having for my next meal rather than HOW I was going to pay for it.

There was a time when I could live for days on the emotional high received from beating the girls in kickball during recess. Those were the good old days, and I'm glad to see they still exist in the children of today.

Search committee represents special-interest groups

Editor,

The Board of Regents, without any debate, stacked the committee to select the next president of K-State heavily in favor of the alumni.

Those who have a special interest in the University should participate in choosing its leader. However, it is an entirely different matter when in effect such a special interest group is given veto power over faculty, administrators and students who are most directly affected by the change in leadership.

A university is foremost an academic institution and must not become a tool for narrow special interests. Traditionally, to prevent this from occurring, the Regents have appointed presidential selection committees that were carefully balanced, giving no one group undue influence. This assured a process whereby the committee had to decide upon candidates based upon a consensus and not the power of veto.

I regret to say that the hasty action of the board may turn the selection process into a blatant political battle — a battle the University can ill afford.

One can only hope that the bankers and businesspersons on the committee will select a president who will protect the academic integrity of K-State and not foster the interest of special groups.

Students get hands-on training at zoo

By MIKE ROBBINS
Collegian Reporter

Sunset Zoo is offering a training program which teaches its participants aspects of zoo management and animal nutrition.

The participants in the training program are called docents, said Don Wixom, education coordinator for the Sunset Zoo.

"In different zoos a docent has different meanings, but the basic meaning is a volunteer teacher," Wixom said.

Wixom said the docent program, which began in the fall of 1981, is offered to anyone 18 years old or older. As many as 25 docents are allowed in each class, but this fall's classes are not yet full.

Most of the people who get into the docent program are pre-veterinary medicine students who want additional animal experience or want to learn about exotic animals, Wixom said. But generally all who participate in the docent program come because they like zoos and animals, Wixom said.

A number of zoos use a docent program as a tour guide program, Wixom said, but the Sunset Zoo has expanded the docent program to provide people with a little more experience in caring for the animals, he said.

"What the public sees when they come to the zoo is the animals and exhibits. They don't realize how much there is underneath. It's like the old iceberg theory: There is a lot more underneath than meets the eye...the docent program allows the participant to see underneath the surface," Wixom said.

The docent program teaches many zoo management skills, including animal nutrition, animal transportation techniques, and methods of tranquilizing animals, Wixom said.

The docent training program requires 22 weeks to complete and has a one-time fee of $10. The docent class meets one hour per week beginning today.

Wixom wrote the docent training manual used in the docent program so a docent can adequately explain to the visiting public how the zoo works.

Besides giving tours of the zoo, docents also help with live animal presentations which are given at area high schools and nursing homes, Wixom said.

Docents also take part in animal pregnancy watches.

"We have a few animals which have problems caring for their young or because of weather conditions the babies may have to be taken away from the mother," Wixom said.

An example of this pregnancy care is the emu pregnancy watch. An emu is a large flightless bird from Australia which resembles an ostrich.

"In Australia the emu's summer is our winter and that's when they breed," he said. "The emu is a species that really has gotten into women's liberation because the male sits on the eggs. She lays them and he does the rest. Even after the eggs hatch out he is the one who raises the babies."

But the problem is the male won't sit on the eggs because it's too cold, Wixom said. During an emu pregnancy, docents stay overnight at the zoo to ensure the safety of the egg.

"Docents gain a very quick appreciation for zoos and sometimes the docent program leads beyond just docents. Often we get students who end up applying for our internship program," Wixom said.

Mike Quick, senior in wildlife biology, was a docent two years ago and is a zoo management intern this year.

"As a docent I learned all aspects of zoo management," Quick said. "I took the class because I was interested in the zoo.

"The internship takes you a step further than the docent program. Primarily you are able to work closer with the zoo keepers which gives you a practical experience in zoo management."

New York ferry boat adrift in rush hour

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A Staten Island Ferry boat went dead and adrift with more than 4,000 rush-hour commuters aboard as it neared the southern tip of Manhattan Monday morning.

No one was injured and passengers landed about an hour late.

The 6,000-passenger ferry, the Samuel I. Newhouse, had left Staten Island at 7:40 a.m. It lost its power when the oil pump system failed and the engine shut itself down automatically, the city Transportation Department said.

When it lost power near the end of its trip, skipper Fred Wight called the Coast Guard for help, said Al Silver, a department spokesman.

The Newhouse passed within 200 feet of the ventilation shaft of the Brooklyn-Battery Tunnel and was bearing down on Coast Guard docks on Governors Island when it was snared by a Coast Guard tug, he said.

It was nudged into its slip at 9 a.m.

The Twenty-First Century Overture

Where will time take us next?

To an information utopia where knowledge belongs to everyone? To an age when the computer becomes one with communications and thought travels everywhere, anywhere and at anytime? To a brave new world where electronic intuition solves the impossible problems that have followed us through history?

Getting to this future first is our mission.

We're Bell Communications Research (Bellcore), established as the central source for the research and technologies that will enable the Bell Operating Companies to meet the needs of the future.

We are working in areas that include software development; applied research; information systems; systems engineering; network planning services; and equipment assessment.

Our purpose is to know more, understand more, see more so that we can provide others with the expert advice they need in many different technical and scientific areas. Our mandate is to provide leading edge answers. The Bell Operating Companies look to us for the software and technologies they need to operate efficiently.

We are a 'brain trust' that imagines a new tomorrow.

We have opportunities at our northern and central New Jersey locations for individuals with PhD, MS or BS degrees in Electrical Engineering, Computer Science, Mathematics, Operations Research, Chemistry, Physics, or Human Factors Psychology.

Mastering the art of hair design

A student practices her hair-setting technique as part of her practical training.

Students at Crum's Beauty College are classified as freshman for the first two months they are at the school. In these two months, students like freshmen Annie Marie Brotz, Susan Bloom and Donna Tiemeyer spend six hours a day in the practical classroom learning the basics of hair design and two hours a day in Freshman Theory class.

There are freshmen, sophomores, juniors and seniors. They come from all over the area and they all come for one reason, to learn. No, this isn't K-State, these students are attending Crum's Beauty College.

Crum's Beauty College, co-owned by Lucille Crum Jelinik and her son Chas Crum, opened in 1956.

"I always knew, in the back of my mind that I was going to have a beauty college some day. In 1956, I was an operator for Marcelle's Beauty Salon, which is where the Town Crier is now. I was walking home, and there was a building right beside the Chamber of Commerce building. It had 'Liquidating sale' in the window.

"I walked in and asked if they were quitting business, they said yes, and I rushed to the telephone to call my husband and tell him I'd found the spot where we were going to open our beauty college," Jelinik said.

Crum's Beauty College opened three to four months later and moved to its present location in 1958 after a fire destroyed the first building.

To be admitted to the school, an applicant must be at least 17 years old and have a high school diploma or GED equivalent. All students must have a physical.

There are currently 160 students enrolled at the beauty school, four of which are males. Each student must complete a program of 9 months or 1,500 hours in length to be a licensed beauty operator in Kansas, said Starr Pugh, senior theory instructor.

"It's different being a guy in the program because you have women come in and say 'a guy is going to do my hair?' when it can be perfectly done," said Jim Hess, senior at Crum's.

"I came to Crum's because I'd always liked messing with my own hair," Hess said.

Hess, who will be graduating in December, said he believes cosmotelogy is more difficult for guys because they have never used a curling iron or rolled their hair.

"I almost burned my girlfriend once when I was curling her hair with a curling iron.

"I think more men ought to look into cosmetology; it's a growing field for men," Hess said.

The first two months a student is in the program they are in the practical classroom, Pugh said. During these two months, they are learning the basics of hair sculpturing and design.

"They learn a little about everything for background, so they are qualified to come out on the floor and start serving customers," Jelinik said.

The student is classified as a freshman during these two months and spends six hours a day in the practical classroom, gaining hands-on training. Two hours a day these students are in the Freshman Theory class learning the science behind hair. They also learn such things as hair structure, manicures, permanent wave wrapping and scalp treatments. This constitutes 320 hours of the 1,500-hour program.

A sophomore, a student in the third and fourth months of the program, is in the classroom six hours a day and on the clinic floor performing services for patrons for two hours. Their classroom study includes an advance theory class, a hairstyling course and an advanced practical class where they learn different perm wave wraps, hair sculpturing and coloring, trichoanalysis (hair analysis), and black hair care and design.

Instructor Linda Overkamp discusses a design with freshman Carol Tanguay while working in the practical classroom.

Story by Sherri Hagar

During the fifth and sixth months of the program, a student is classified as a junior. Juniors spend two hours in the theory classroom learning the Redken Scientific Educational System which includes the composition of hair, its molecules and how various treatments, such as permaments, affect hair. They spend another two hours in the hair styling classroom perfecting their skills, and four hours on the clinic floor.

The senior cycle, which is the seventh and eighth month of the program, includes time spent both in the classroom and on the clinic floor.

"In this cycle, they spend time in hairstyling learning to do three-strand braids, eight-strand braids and hat braids. They are being a little more creative with their work," Pugh said.

Sophomore Denise Whisenant cuts the hair of Karla Lake.

Seniors also spend time preparing for their state board examinations, both oral and written, and learning Better Beauty Business, (BBB) — how to communicate with people, write resumes, set goals and learn about different options available within the field. In addition to classroom work, seniors also work on the clinic floor for four to five hours.

Jelinik sponsors a hair styling show which the students may enter. The show is held twice a year and prizes are awarded to first through fourth places.

"The show is run exactly like a national show — we have state qualified judges who judge the show," Jelinik said. "This is to prepare the student for competition shows, so that if they are interested in going on and competing they know the basics."

There are 10 full-time instructors at Crum's including theory instructors, practical instructors, floor supervisors and hairstyling instructors.

"Periodically we also have the top hairstyling artists in the country give demonstrations to our students. We also have guest speakers who give hands-on demonstrations to the students," Jelinik said.

Representatives from leading hair-care product manufacturers such as Redken, Nexxus, Sebastian, Matrix, Roux and Soft Sheen also come and give presentations to the students, Pugh said.

"We are opening a new division of the school, called esthetician, which is skin care, hopefully around the first of the year," Jelinik said.

Crum's is open to the public six days a week. During this time, instructor-supervised students practice and perfect their trade.

Commissioners to discuss Southern Arterial Project

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan City Commissioners are scheduled to make a decision on the appropriation of land for the right-of-way for the Southern Arterial project at their meeting tonight.

The commission meets at 7 p.m. in the Commission Meeting Room in the City Administration Building, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue. All meetings are open to the public.

Commissioners will also consider approval of several ordinances dealing with land acquisition by eminent domain for the Downtown Redevelopment Project.

Eminent domain is the right of a governing body to acquire land for public use without prior consent of the property owner.

For the second time, commissioners will consider authorizing an agreement with Manhattan Ice and Cold Storage, 209 Yuma St., for an option to purchase city-owned land acquired from the Union Pacific Railroad near Second and Yuma streets. Commissioners delayed action after the first presentation for further study of possible uses for the property.

Mayor Suzanne Lindamood will present proclamations to representatives of International Training in Communication Month; Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Awareness Month; Home Fire Prevention Week and Minority Enterprise Development Week.

Leaders discuss Arab-Israeli talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan expressed optimism Monday about overcoming obstacles to the opening of Arab-Israeli peace talks this year, while Jordan's King Hussein stressed that negotiations must take place at an international conference attended by the Soviet Union.

Reagan and Hussein met for nearly an hour in their second round of talks this year. The meeting came against the backdrop of Reagan's announcement Friday of a controversial, $1.55 billion weapons package for Jordan.

The United States and Israel have objected to holding peace talks at an international conference because that would give the Soviet Union a role in shaping the future of the Middle East. Israel does not have diplomatic relations with Moscow, and the Soviets have provided arms to Syria and other Arab countries hostile to Israel.

A senior administration official said Reagan and Hussein focused their talks "very intensively" on the organization and structure of an international conference.

"I think headway has been made. This is not the moment, this is not the place to get into the details of that headway," said the official, briefing reporters under rules granting him anonymity.

Reagan and Hussein both have talked about holding negotiations under "appropriate auspices" but have differed on what that should be.

"We're not excluding anything," said a White House official, speaking privately. "We are exploring what appropriate 'international auspices' might contain. We don't want to get involved in something where Israel is made a spectator."

Reagan and Hussein made joint statements outside the White House diplomatic entrance before the king left in his limousine.

Expressing hopes for talks before the end of the year, the president said, "There are complex and sensitive issues whch must be resolved before actual negotiations can begin, but I believe these issues can be resolved.

Dr. Spock says youth fear crime

By The Associated Press

FALL RIVER, Mass. — Dr. Benjamin Spock says a society trying to prevent child-snatching should be spending money on better child care instead of on fingerprinting children.

"Most of the children kidnapped are abducted by their father, who no longer lives at home with the child," Spock said Sunday. "And the other major reason for missing children is the teen-ager running away from home...trying to get the parents' attention."

Spock, author of "Baby and Child Care," told an audience at the First Congregational Church that, "We must get this problem into some sense of proportion. We are scaring millions of kids."

He said paying too much attention kidnappings can conjure up fear in children.

Bad weather cause of crash

Controllers fail to warn pilot

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In the minutes before Delta Flight 191 crashed while trying to land at the Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport, a thunderstorm was clearly apparent and a pilot who had just landed noticed what he thought was a tornado along the approach.

But National Transportation Safety Board documents indicated Monday the pilot of Flight 191 never was warned of the storm's severity. Less than 10 minutes before the crash he was told by air traffic controllers that there was "only a little rain" north of the airport.

Investigators have speculated that the Aug. 2 crash, which killed 136 people, was caused by wind shear, a severe change of wind direction that literally forced the Lockheed L-1011 jumbo jet into the ground as it was about to land.

A transcript of exchanges in the cockpit just before the crash supported the wind-shear theory because the crew could be heard struggling to increase power amid the backdrop of engines revving to maximum power.

"Push it up, push it way up, way up," pilot Edward Connors exhorted his co-pilot, Rudolph Price Jr.

"Way up," Price responded, with the sounds of the engines increasing power and the "whoop, whoop, pull up pull up" warning of the ground proximity alarm in the background.

This was followed by a sound similar to a landing and someone saying, "Oh ..." and what the NTSB called a non-printable word. Almost immediately there was the sound of a second impact and silence.

The flight, from Fort Lauderdale, Fla., was bound for Los Angeles with an interim stop at Dallas when it encountered heavy rain, lightning and trecherous winds short of the runway. The plane first touched down in a field, bounded across a highway where it struck a car and crashed into water tanks before bursting into flames.

According to the transcript from the cockpit voice recorder, the crew was concerned during the approach about severe weather in the area. Several times they criticized air traffic controllers for directing them too close to a severe weather cell.

As they spoke, another Delta crew, its plane taxiing away from the runway after having landed, already had noticed the severe weather along the approach path.

"Is that a waterspout out there on the end (of the runway)?" the pilot of the Boeing 737 remarked.

Despite having a bad hip due to an automobile accident, Dan McAnarney rides up to 250 miles a week. McArnarney is silhouetted against the evening sky as rides his bike on Denison Avenue.

Cycling against the odds

Four bolts hold his hip joint together, compliments of a car wreck 10 years ago. Because of deterioration of the femur, one of the bolts has penetrated the pelvic bone, destroying blood vessels.

As a result, he gets arthritis in his leg and has trouble walking more than four or five blocks at one time. He also walks with a noticeable limp.

But on a bicycle, his "handicap" all but disappears and is the furthest thing from his mind.

He is Dan McAnarney, graduate in industrial engineering, and his first love is competitive cycling. Although he may not make a career of cycling — he hasn't ruled out the possibility either — McAnarney, 28, spends much of his free time entering cycling competition and tries to get in as much as 250 miles of training a week. Being a student, however, often limits his riding time.

Despite limited movement in the leg — he can't pivot his leg or move it sideways — McAnarney depends on determination and will power to make up for his lack of strength in the leg.

"You have to try to balance deficits with positives," he said. "That's why I win."

His most recent win was the Kansas state cycling championship held in June. The victory gave him a berth in the United States National Cycling Championships in Milwaukee. Although he finished approximately 50th out of a field of 130 (final results are not in), McAnarney was less than pleased with his performance for more than one reason.

"I wasn't real prepared mentally," he said. "I didn't think I had trained enough."

McAnarney, a Pratt native, expects a lot of himself and refrains from using his physical limitations as an excuse when he doesn't win a race. Despite competing against sponsored cyclists who are able put in twice as many miles of preparation per week and have superior equipment, McAnarney is able to be close to the lead in most races.

The pain, in fact, helps McAnarney battle the odds of winning a race. He and his training partner, Dave Reid, senior in architecture, while short on equipment, are both willing to do what it takes to win.

"One reason we are as good as we are is because we're willing to suffer pain," McAnarney said.

McAnarney and Reid, both in Manhattan's Bluemont Bicycle Club, usually ride in the same races and have become a unique duo — one helping out the other at key points in the races.

A classic example was this past Saturday at the Tour of Kansas City criterium race in Overland Park, in which McAnarney and Reid were entered. A criterium race consists racing in a one-mile loop on city streets.

In the race, McAnarney was in the lead group on the 11th mile when he crashed rounding a rain-slickened curve.

"It took me about 30 seconds to get back on the bike, which left me about 35 seconds behind," McAnarney said. "When Dave saw me crash and couldn't stop, he helped by slowing the pace."

Reid took the lead to slow the pace. In cycling, the lead rider is able to set the pace at his own tempo.

The strategy worked as McAnarney was able to catch the lead group by the 20th mile of the 30-mile race. McAnarney finished 4th, with Reid coming in 8th after crashing with two miles left in the race.

The real test for cyclists, McAnarney said, is continuing after a crash. "You crash, you get up and you keep going," he said.

Despite being told by one doctor to give up cycling, McAnarney considers the sport easier on his leg than walking.

"Riding makes it (leg) feel better because it's a smoother motion," he said.

Winning makes McAnarney feel better, too, because he knows he has been able to battle the odds.

McAnarney leads the pack during the Kansas City Criterium Saturday in Overland Park. He finished fourth after losing time in a crash.

McAnarney's training partner, Dave Reid, talks to him following Saturday's race.

At the end of the day, McAnarney rides away following the 30-mile race.

Men's crew team nips Notre Dame

K-State's Crew Team enjoyed a successful day Saturday in Des Moines, Iowa, at the Head of Des Moines competition. The men's varsity 8-man team won its division in what Crew Coach Don Rose called "the biggest varsity win we've had in recent years."

The men's varsity crew completed the three-mile race in 17 minutes, 57 seconds to edge Notre Dame by two seconds. Members of the men's team are Aaron Rice, Jeff Bushey, Joe Merlo, Brad Johnson, Kevin Kriss, Vince Stadel, bowman Jim Johnson, strokeman Tim Keechman and coxswain Jerry Ricke.

The women's varsity eight placed third behind Notre Dame and Lincoln Park Boat Club of Chicago. The women finished in 24:00. Also competing for K-State in the single sculler category was Bushey, who was fourth out of five entries with a time of 25:04.

Rugby team beats Columbia, 12-6

The K-State Rugby Football Club defeated the Columbia (Mo.) Outlaws 12-6 Saturday in Kansas City, Mo. to win the Heart of America Rugby Football Union (HOARFU) Division II Club Side Merit Table match.

K-State won the contest without the services of five starters who either were injured or were participating in the Western Select Side Tournament in Omaha.

Columbia took an early 3-0 lead in the contest on a drop kick by the fly half. K-State came right back to take a 6-3 lead on a try by win Doug Scherich and a conversion by fullback Willie Knopick. Columbia tied the game at six on a penalty kick just before the half.

Knopick scored the winning try for K-State late in the second half and added the conversion to make the final score 12-6.

K-State hosts the KU Collegiate side at 1:30 on Saturday at the rugby field at the Rec Center in a HOARFU Collegiate Merit Table match.

Women's golf team 7th in tourney

The K-State women's golf team finished 7th in the 10-team Northern Iowa University Invitational golf tournament held this past weekend in Cedar Falls, Iowa. The tournament was played in cold and windy conditions, with temperatures in the 40s for the final two rounds.

K-State's team score was 1026. The team score is determined by adding the scores of the top four golfers from each team.

Sherry Dercher led the Wildcats with a three-round total of 250. Dercher had a first round score of 85 and followed with scores of 80 and 85 in the second and third rounds.

Erin Andrew had a three-round total of 256, with scores of 90, 83 and 83. Susan Navrat posted a score of 257, with individual round scores of 85, 79 and 93.

Paige Harrison was the fourth-leading finisher for K-State with a three-round total of 266. Harrison posted scores of 90, 88 and 88.

Shelly Sherman, whose scores did not figure in the team totals, posted a three-round mark of 271. Sherman shot a 92 in the first round and followed that performance with scores of 89 and 90.

Men's JV basketball tryouts Oct. 15

Tryouts for the men's junior varsity basketball team will be held Oct. 15 at 7 p.m. in Ahearn Gymnasium, Coach Tim Jankovich announced Monday.

Jankovich said the tryouts will be open to all men interested. Those with questions about the tryouts should contact Jankovich or Ken Darting at the basketball office in Ahearn Fieldhouse.

This year's JV schedule is highlighted by a home-road series against the University of Kansas and games with Dodge City, Pratt, and Barton County Community Colleges.

Sundberg's homer moves Royals into tie for lead

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jim Sundberg's home run in the seventh inning Monday night broke a 1-1 tie and helped Bret Saberhagen to his 20th victory and Kansas City to a 3-1 triumph over California, pulling the Royals into a tie with the Angels atop the American League West.

The 21-year-old right-hander, 20-6, threw a five-hitter, outdueling left-hander John Candelaria to join Ron Guidry of the New York Yankees as the only 20-game winners in the AL this season. Guidry is 21-6.

Saberhagen struck out 10 and walked just two, winning for the 10th time in 11 decisions. Candelaria, 6-3 for the Angels since being acquired from Pittsburgh Aug. 2, was pulled from the game after giving up Kansas City's final run in the eighth on a triple by Willie Wilson and a sacrifice fly by George Brett.

Sundberg's game-winning homer came on the first pitch from Candelaria in the seventh and flew far over the center field wall, some 415 feet from home plate.

The clubs traded solo home runs to produce a 1-1 tie.

Doug DeCinces led off the second inning with his 19th homer of the season, hitting a 2-1 Saberhagen pitch over the wall in left field.

Brett led off the fourth inning with a homer deep to right field off Candelaria.

Theta Xi wins Ironman in cold, wet conditions

By SARAH KESSINGER
Collegian Reporter

With pouring rain, temperatures in the 30s and puddles covering much of Memorial Stadium's track, it was a weekend for true ironmen or "icemen and waterboys" — as one person put it — showing their skills.

Twelve teams turned out Friday through Sunday for Campus Crusade for Christ's second annual Ironman '85 competition. Placing first overall was the Theta Xi team finishing with 140 points.

Ironman competition was created to foster positive rivalries between fraternities, help campus-city relations and serve in building the overall campus image.

Teams competing in Ironman '85 were Beta Theta Pi, Lambda Chi Alpha, Delta Upsilon, Theta Xi, Sigma Alpha Epsilon, Pi Kappa Alpha, Tau Kappa Epsilon, Sigma Chi, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Phi Kappa Theta and Alpha Tau Omega. Campus Crusade for Christ also had a team.

For their first-place finish, Theta Xi was presented with the Samson Trophy Sunday evening at the Award Banquet at the Ramada Inn. Jim Ryun, world record holder in the mile, half mile and 1500 meters, was guest speaker at the banquet and told of his experiences in running and how he had worked toward his goals.

Theta Xi team members were enthusiastic about their victory despite the weather.

"We just didn't let it (the weather) bother us. A lot of people were psyched out," said Russ Pugh, captain of the Theta Xi team. "It was a lot of fun getting out there and competing together with the guys you live with."

Placing second was the Phi Kap team with 124 points and in third was SAE team with 118 points.

Ironman '85 events began Friday afternoon with a six-person, 100-yard swim relay in the Natatorium won by the Phi Kaps. The "manmakers" competition followed with the Theta Xi squad coming in first. Manmakers consisted of running, hopping and carrying a team member on the back 40 yards to a line and back.

Saturday morning, Theta Xi also grabbed first in the six-mile running relay beginning east of Anderson Hall. The Beta's won the six-mile bike relay that followed.

In the basketball tournament Saturday at Manhattan High School, the SAE team took first over the TKE's after a last-second shot gave them a 37-36 victory in the finals.

A cold downpour at Memorial Stadium set the scene for Sunday's circuits event. Theta Xi placed first in the race for the highest number of circuits in 15 minutes. Circuits included running 400 meters around the track followed by 10 each of push-ups, sit-ups, jumping jacks and leg hops.

The last event Sunday, the obstacle course, took place at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Area intramural fields with the SAE team claiming first.

Jerry Fidler of Campus Crusade for Christ and head of Ironman '85 said that despite the weather, the competition went well with the field of entries almost doubling from last year, the first year of the competition.

"The competition was harder with more teams," Fidler said. "They really proved they were ironmen with the weather."

During Sunday night's banquet, Ryun showed a film of the 1967 AAU championships in which he set a world record in the mile. He signed autographs following the dinner and conversed with Ironman '85 competitors.

Wildcat volleyball team ends road trip

By CLAUDIA SANGSTER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's volleyball team completed the non-conference portion of its schedule over the weekend as the 'Cats competed in the Colorado State University Old-Timer Classic and in a dual with the University of Wyoming.

The Old-Timer Classic, held Friday and Saturday at Fort Collins, Colo., began with the Wildcats facing Southwest Missouri State University in the first round Friday.

K-State defeated the Bears, traditionally one of the most powerful teams in the Mideast region, winning the match in four games. The scores were 15-11, 16-14, 13-15 and 19-17.

Top hitters for K-State were Shawnee Call and Mary Kinsey, who both connected on 19 of 38 attempts.

The win marked the first time the Wildcats have ever defeated Southwest Missouri State in a collegiate season.

The win in the first round put the Wildcats against the host Colorado State Rams. The Rams are currently ranked 12th in the nation.

With 721 in attendance, the Rams proved too much for K-State as they rolled to a 15-5, 15-7 and 15-13 win.

Leading the way for K-State was Kinsey as she was successful on 11 of 22 attacks. Call scored on six of 10 attacks.

Helen Bundy continued to show her blocking skills with two solo blocks and three assists against the Rams.

The loss against Colorado State put the Wildcats at a 7-3 mark on the regular season.

Senior co-captain Renee Whitney and Kinsey were named to the tournament team. This is the second time in the season that the two have earned tournament honors. The others came at the K-State Volleyball Invitational.

Sunday the Wildcats traveled to Laramie, Wyo., to take on the University of Wyoming Cowgirls, who are also a traditional volleyball power.

The Cowgirls were victorious over K-State in three close games 15-13, 15-13 and 16-14.

Senior co-captain Donna Lee was successful on 12 of 44 attacks to lead K-State in hitting. Call and Bundy both attacked 22 times, scoring eight and nine times, respectively.

K-State now begins preparing for the upcoming Big Eight season, which begins Friday. Head Coach Scott Nelson said the current road trip is going to help prepare the team for the conference competition.

"The rugged matches we played against these top teams has really prepared us for the upcoming Big Eight season. We learned a lot about ourselves and our strenghts and weaknessess," he said.

The Wildcats will take a 7-4 record into the first Big Eight matches of the season, which will be against the University of Oklahoma Sooners on Friday and cross-state rivals, the University of Kansas Kansas Jayhawks, on Saturday.

Both games will begin at 7:30 p.m. and will take place in Ahearn Field House. The matches are free to the public.

Whitney is currently leading the team in hitting. She has been successful on 37 of 80 attacks. She is followed by Bundy, scoring on 85 of 189 attempts.

Godfather's #1 PIZZA PURSUIT

Ridiculous facts concerning pizza and its origins...

Pizza was actually invented in 1623, when the wife of Luigi Pizziliano accidentally sat on a large ball of bread dough left to rise on a chair. The resulting pancake had such an interesting, saucer-like shape that she spread it with tomato sauce, tossed on some cheese, and popped it into her stone oven. Later, when pizza had become a Pizziliano family staple, Luigi's wife took to throwing it at him, frisbee style, when he didn't come home on time. The first pizza delivery!

Singer combines music, message

Student song writer to begin recording

Staff/Brad Fanshier

Denise Middleton, a senior in speech pathology who writes and sings contemporary Christian music, will leave for Nashville in January to work on an album and sing backup vocals for other artists.

By ERIN EICHER
Collegian Reporter

In a span of 10 days, Denise Middleton, senior in speech pathology, accomplished what some people work for their whole lives — she launched a music career.

Middleton, working at a Christian athletic camp in Missouri last summer, was asked to sing for an evening program. A singer-songwriter from Nashville, Tenn. was in the audience.

That evening she was asked to meet with songwriters in Nashville about the possibility of a singing career. Upon her arrival in Nashville last July, Middleton discovered the songwriters weren't interested in her contemporary Christian music.

Middleton's music — top-40 music with gospel lyrics — "is like music you would hear on the radio, but the lyrics are different, so it gives a totally different message." For her, the message is what's important about the song.

"(Songwriters) were really critical. They couldn't really relate to it," Middleton said.

These were country songwriters and Middleton said they didn't understand her Christian music. One of the individuals told her about an open performance night sponsored by a local bookstore — an opportunity for Christian songwriters to expose their music to an audience of publishers, agents and fellow artists.

Middleton performed, and after her second song, the "audience just went wild," she said. "I couldn't believe it. They wouldn't stop clapping."

Later that evening, she was approached by two songwriters and representatives from two publishing companies who wanted to talk to her about recording contracts.

"When she got on stage and started singing, I thought 'Wow.' She had so much more obvious talent than the people that preceeded her," said Linda Eskew, Middleton's agent and publisher.

Middleton is currently negotiating a contract for two years as a writer, and an additional two years as a recording artist with Music by Hummingbird, a company that publishes contemporary Christian and theater music.

Middleton returned home Aug. 5, despite her publisher's advice to remain in Nashville. She left because she wanted to return to school and spend time with her friends and family before moving to Nashville next January. She plans to complete her degree requirements at Tennessee State University in Nashville.

In Nashville, Middleton said she will be doing back-up singing, song writing, concerts in area churches and possibly singing television jingles until she has establishes herself professionally.

Music by Hummingbird is in the process of selling five of her songs to established artists. The sale of the songs would enhance her standing and make her name as a composer recognized, Middleton said.

"Normally, I wouldn't be able to leave the safe and familiar, but I'm so excited about the future that I'm ready to take that step now," Middleton said.

tor of campus safety, said he believes a number of campus workers were familiar with the new procedures.

Lambert said he didn't know an exact number of workers familiar with the procedures.

"I think that some of them knew it. Maybe some of them didn't," Lambert said. "I can tell you this, I honestly think they should have known."

Lambert emphasized he knew nothing of the asbestos incident, "until about two days after the job was completed."

Innes questioned statements made by Lambert in Monday's Collegian concerning the lack of danger to individuals working at Waters. Innes said he swept up two, 5-gallon buckets of asbestos dust at the work site.

"The dust that came out during those days was so thick you could see it," Innes said. "It's supposed to be invisible.

"It was never wrapped. It was dry, untreated and had been scraped along the wall to get it out of the room."

Watson said President Duane Acker will soon release a statement on the asbestos incident but Cy Wainscott of University Relations said, "Thursday's statement is all we had. Nothing is in the works."

Acker could not be reached for comment.

Future archeologists practice

Students look for artifacts

By BRENDA KITCHEN
Collegian Reporter

For a few students, a shovel was one of the primary tools used during summer school. However, these students didn't dig through the library for information, they dug for Indian artifacts.

An archaeological field school was offered jointly by Kansas State University and the University of Kansas. Five students from K-State and eight students from KU participated. The six-week course offered students six credit hours and field work experience in archaeology. Students learned to excavate, clean, process and catalog artifacts, said Patricia O'Brien, professor of anthropology.

O'Brien was one of the professors at the site, about 15 miles north of Lawrence along Stranger Creek. She said the experience is essential for students who want to become professional archaeologists.

"Part of being educated is having a breadth of knowledge," O'Brien said. Some students participate simply because they have an interest in archaeology or want to enlarge their horizons, she said.

"Every time you dig, you want to answer a question," O'Brien said, "You really can't teach students good techniques, if you don't have a problem (to solve)."

The excavation team was looking for artifacts from the Kansas City Hopewell Indians. The date for the site is estimated at 450 to 500 A.D. "We know that the Kansas City Hopewell Indians were here, we want to know what they were doing here," O'Brien said.

O'Brien said the Kansas City Hopewell Indians were first found in Kansas City, Kansas. The excavation team was looking for answers as to whether the Kansas City Hopewell Indians lived in the area of the site permanently, and if the Indians did the same things in the site area as they had in Kansas City.

"The Indians threw garbage around, just like we do," O'Brien said. She said the excavation team searched for remains of the Indians' debris.

Seeds, small animal bones, fish scales, bits of pottery and tools are some of the things which are looked for in a dig, she said. These findings are tools used to answer the archaeologists' questions.

Meg Duarte, junior in social sciences, participated in the dig, although she had no prior experience in archaeology. She said the archaeological field school was a more interesting way to learn than sitting in a classroom. Students learned by participation.

Duarte said the facilities were "minimal but adequate," and this became the theme for the 6-week course. She said they took solar showers with sun-heated water. If there was no sun out on a particular day, they did not have hot showers, she said.

"I learned a lot about archaeology and working with people," Duarte said. "By the end of the six weeks, it (the excavation team) was like family, we had a lot of good times."

She said finding an artifact was "like uncovering a Christmas gift." She said the craftmanship of some of the tools found was fantastic.

There is more information to be learned from this site and they hope to return this summer.

Meeting

attending the center, said it would have been better if the University would have faced the problem and "not tried to cover it up."

"My hope is in the end that the University will learn to handle asbestos," she said.

Employees with the Division of University Facilities have since been given training about asbestos, Jack Watson, general supervisor of shops in University Facilities, said.

"We have an extensive training program now," Watson said. "Our people will be 100 percent informed. I will assure you that not one thimble of asbestos dust will be moved until everyone is informed.

"We are in the process of buying an EPA-approved asbestos vacuum cleaner and no asbestos will be moved until we have the adequate means to handle it," Watson said.

"From now on it (asbestos) will be hosed down, everyone will wear the proper equipment, and it will be disposed of properly. We messed up in moving the pipe. It won't happen again. I'm responsible, even though I wasn't there."

Watson said the asbestos found after he and Lambert had inspected it was suspicious.

"We did not put the asbestos that was found at the dump site there. It was found propped up on two walnut twigs," Watson said.

Revenue

Duncan said September is the month in which corporations estimate their income tax liability and begin making payments on it. This September, those payments fell $1.5 million below what they had been in September 1984 — $18.5 million this year compared to $20 million a year ago.

Individual income taxpayers not on withholding also make estimated tax payments in September, but they were up from $22 million in September 1984 to $25 million this September, Duncan said.

He doesn't think it happened, but Duncan said a possibility exists that the Revenue Department's computers got some of the corporate and individual income tax estimated payments mixed up, which would pad the individual tax receipts and short the corporation receipts.

"It's the first quarter since June of 1983 that corporate income tax declarations haven't exceeded declarations for the same quarter of the previous year," Duncan said.

The revenue secretary attributed the continuing sales tax slump to two factors: Kansas' agriculture-based economy remains troubled by low farm income, and state residents aren't buying as many durable goods as they did a year ago. Those big-ticket items include automobiles and large home appliances.

Total tax receipts were $145.54 million in September, up 1.3 percent over the $143.73 collected in the same month of 1984.

For the July-September quarter, the state took in $374.82 million, 5.8 percent above the $354.23 collected the same three-month period of 1984.

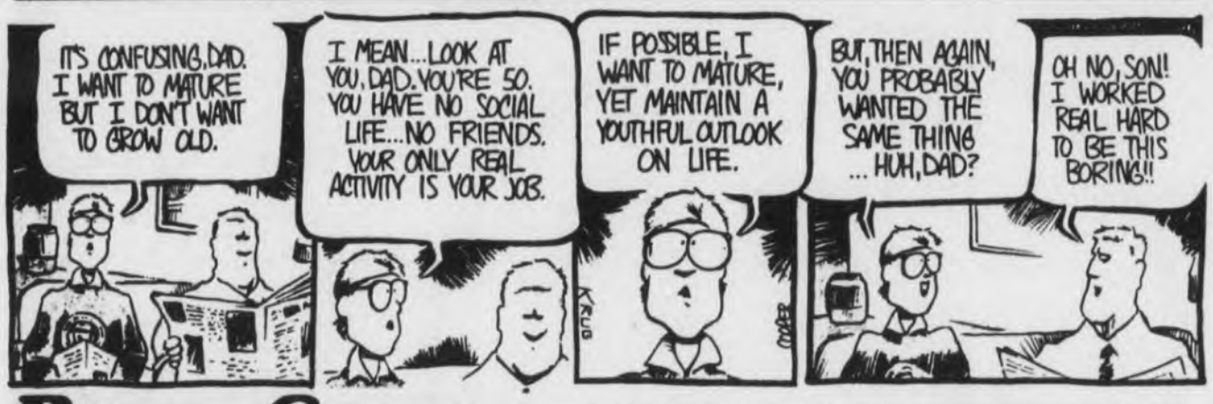
Africa. Copies of the speech were distributed to reporters in Johannesburg.



Botha presented a view of South Africa as a nation of minorities, including several within the black community, and said any reforms must protect all of them from domination.

The central question, as Botha expressed it, is how to include non-white minorities in a constitutional system built by whites over three centuries — "that is, how they can share in a liberated South Africa. All reasonable South Africans want to see that freedom become their share."

He appealed to black leaders to enter negotiations.

Heckler resigns to take position as ambassador

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Margaret Heckler stepped down Tuesday as secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to become ambassador to Ireland but President Reagan denounced reports that she was forced from the post as "malicious gossip" and "falsehood."

"I think Mrs. Heckler was justifiably upset by the kind of gossip that was going around," the president said as she stood at his side. "I don't know where this was coming from. It was malicious, it was false. She executed the policies that I wanted for the agency."

There had been persistent reports that the White House staff, particularly chief of staff Donald Regan, had disapproved of Heckler's performance and had applied pressure to get her out. The department, with 145,000 employees, has a $330 billion budget — the largest in the government.

"I've never been able to find the individual responsible for this," Reagan said of reports that the White House was displeased with her work.

"She has done a fine job at HHS," the president said, during a brief appearance in the White House press room. "As a matter of fact, if she hadn't done such a good job, I wouldn't have been so eager to seek her out to be the ambassador to Ireland."

Hall scraps Homecoming plans

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

Goodnow Hall will not be participating in all-University Homecoming events because they did not receive information about the events until four days after the deadline.

Troy Millsap, Goodnow president and junior in pre-professional elementary education, said Tuesday that because of problems in getting the mini-kit and information about Homecoming events, Goodnow is dropping out of all Homecoming events sponsored by Blue Key.

"They (Blue Key) brought the kits in on Sept. 17, and the deadline (to have a float entered) was Sept. 13," Millsap said. "They gave them to us with the attitude, 'Oh yeah, here's the information — well, here are the kits, but you can't do anything with them now.'"

Clark Atkinson, president of Blue Key and senior in civil engineering, said Blue Key made visits to all greek houses to give them the mini-kits on Sept. 11, but the deliveries to the KSU Association of Residence Halls were not made until Sept. 17.

"It's a shame they feel at a disadvantage since they got their kits only a week later than most greek houses," Atkinson said. "I realize that it may be more difficult for them to organize."

Phi Gamma Delta Homecoming chairman Brad Alstatt, senior in computer science, said his house received their kit on Sept. 11, and it was delivered by Blue Key.

He said Goodnow would not enter a float in the parade because they were not given adequate time to design a float and did not receive the mini-kits until four days after the deadline to enter a float.

"We set up a committee and set aside funds for a Homecoming float and activities," Millsap said. "We tried to get a Homecoming mini-kit that has the dates and specifications, but every time we called and got hold of someone (involved with Blue Key) they had us call someone else."

Millsap said when he eventually was able to reach Ken Heinz, senior in

Officials lax in instituting EPA policies

University officials did not act immediately on the Environmental Protection Agency's new regulations concerning asbestos exposure, a University facilities supervisor said Tuesday.

Asbestos removal continued on campus after the regulations were enacted, said Ray Sharpe, plumbing supervisor for University facilities.

Howard Saiger, environmental engineer with the State Department of Health and Environment in Topeka, said the asbestos regulations were adopted by the EPA in July were "effective immediately" for all public employees working where asbestos was present.

Asbestos has been found to cause cancer in some medical cases.

"It (asbestos) was new to all of us," Sharpe said. "It (the danger) was never brought to our attention before. We get more information every day. We did not know about the new regulations until after the job was done."

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said he could not give an exact date on when the regulations were discussed.

"As far as I know we did not dicuss it (the new regulations) until sometime later," Miller said.

The EPA is investigating the mishandling of asbestos at the University after a complaint was filed in early September by Mark Innes, a construction laborer with the University.

Innes said the University did not act after being notified of an asbestos problem. Laborers were assigned in late August to remove a section of asbestos-covered pipe from the basement of Waters Hall.

Saiger said the new regulations were specific about asbestos exposure.

"The standard adopted by the EPA sets the ambient standard of two fibers longer than five micrometers per cubic centimeter of air and a maximum of 10 fibers per cubic centimeter," Saiger said. "If it exceeds two fibers per cubic centimeter for more than eight hours, or more than 10 fibers per cubic centimeter at any time, they (workers) must generally wear respirators."

Sharpe said the plumber who was in the basement of Waters while the work was being done did not wear a mask.

Faculty seeks changes in search group

By MARGARET MAY
Collegian Reporter

Faculty Senate unanimously approved a motion asking for equal representation of faculty and students on the Presidential Search Committee in a special meeting Tuesday in Union 212.

The motion came in response to the unanticipated addition of three alumni to the committee by the Board of Regents. The committee is currently made up of six alumni, three students, three faculty, one dean and two ex officio representatives.

Page Twiss, professor of geology, presented the petition to senate, which originally stated: "The faculty of Kansas State University wish to express their grave concern about the unequal composition of the Presidential Search Committee and asks the Board of Regents to address this imbalance by appointing three additional faculty members."

A friendly amendment stating the Search Committee should include minority representation was voiced by Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for student affairs. Senate approved the amendment.

Robert Linder, professor of history, proposed another amendment to the resolution stating that the faculty senate instruct the president of faculty senate to transmit this resolution to the regents. Linder said this would help the resolution have the desired impact and ensure it reached the proper authorities.

"I think we have to assume the Board of Regents are men and women of good will," Linder said. "I propose we adopt this resolution and give the regents the chance to show that they are people of good will. The precedent is there for equal representation. Why not follow it?"

Senate approved the amendment.

Gene Friedmann, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, motioned that the amendment be changed to read: "The faculty of Kansas State University wish to express their grave concern about the unequal composition of the Presidential Search Committee. It asks the Board of Regents to follow the precedent of the past 11 years for equal faculty-student-alumni representation and to address this imbalance by appointing three additional faculty and

South African scholar reviews revolution

The political situation in South Africa has passed the point of a peaceful solution, said David Hirschman, associate professor of political science and visiting scholar from South Africa.

Hirschman spoke about the aspects of the revolution in South Africa to a group of about 40. The speech, titled "From Oppression To Revolution In South Africa," was sponsored by the Manhattan chapter of Amnesty International, a worldwide human rights organization.

"Not a shot has been fired (by blacks) during this revolution in the past year. Yet 700 blacks have died (due to violence from security police actions)," Hirschman said.

The ruling white minority of 5 million people has imposed apartheid policies on the 24 million blacks of South Africa since 1948.

Apartheid means "separate," and is the official policy of the South African government. The apartheid government accurately represents South African whites, he said.

Until 1973, only peaceful measures had been tried by the blacks to gain equal rights and all had failed.

"Peace is no longer relevant to the situation," Hirschman said.

He said now the blacks want to overthrow the government completely.

"They no longer want concessions. They want it all, not just political power, but economic power as well."

Blacks are demanding the power of the vote, Hirschman said. If the government would allow this, bloodshed could be avoided. However, such a concession would give the blacks control of the political system, as they are the vast majority.

"The whites have a 300-year history of attacking and being attacked (by invaders

Kansas to face fiscal 'crisis'

No tax increase, Knopp says

By ERIN EICHER
Collegian Reporter

Joe Knopp, Manhattan attorney and 67th District representative, predicted Tuesday that Kansas will "hold the line" in 1986 with no general or sales tax increases.

"This next year we've gotten ourselves into what I believe is a real revenue crisis. We will do well or fall flat on our faces," Knopp said.

He said the state would cut spending and tighten the budget so that a tax increase wouldn't be necessary.

Knopp, 1974 K-State graduate in economics, spoke to 15 members of College Republicans at their second meeting of the year.

Knopp is serving his third term as representative from Riley County. He is a member of the Transportation and Reapportionment committees and chairman of the House Judiciary and Medical Malpractice committees.

The Medical Malpractice Committee, which will be meeting in two weeks, will address the problems caused by high malpractice premiums. Currently, doctors and surgeons in specialized fields face malpractice premiums up to $40,000 per year — 5 percent to 30 percent of their net income, Knopp said.

He summarized doctors' response as, "'If I'm going to have this kind of premium in a Wamego or a Belleville, I'm not going to be able to cover it.'" He said doctors would be forced to move to more populated areas to reach more patients. As a result, rural areas might become underserved by physicians.

Knopp is considering running for the Republican nomination for Kansas attorney general in 1986. If he decides to run, he will officially declare his candidacy in January.

"Right now we're exploring and talking with people to find out if they'll support us," Knopp said of he and his wife Nancy, instructor of home economics, who would be assisting in the campaign.

"I'm convinced that candidates win, not because they are good, but because they have good help," Knopp said. "I now feel like I have acquaintances...across the state."

University ambassador elections begin today

By The Collegian Staff

Students will have the opportunity to choose two students this week as representatives of the University.

Voting for the Blue Key Ambassadors begins today and will continue Thursday and Friday. To vote, students must take a student I.D. to the Blue Key table on the main floor of the Union between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m.

The six finalists are Vickie Lavezzi, sophomore in business administration; Lori Shellenberger, sophomore in political science; Rise Frank, sophomore in business administration; Randy Regehr, junior in mechanical engineering; Jeff Suttle, sophomore in business administration; and Terry Hallauer, sophomore in business administration.

The finalists were chosen on the basis of general applications, interviews with student leaders and interviews with faculty.

One male and one female will be chosen to represent the University for one year. The winners will be announced during halftime at the football game Saturday.

Tami Barham, senior in social science, and Will Kirk, senior in agricultural economics, are the current ambassadors.

Because of a newsprint shortage, profiles of the Ambassador candidates have been postponed to Thursday's Collegian.

Neo-Nazi party stirs riot violence

FRANKFURT, West Germany — About 2,000 people went on a rampage of window-smashing and arson Tuesday night following a mass rally in a downtown square against a neo-Nazi party.

The most serious clash occurred when black leather-clad rioters barricaded a boulevard opposite the main railroad station and the police charged.

A police water cannon truck unleashed bursts of spray on scores of milling protesters to drive them back.

Club-swinging riot police carrying plastic shields battled with bands of youths and a woman bystander was seriously injured.

As the whooping rioters fled, many smashed store windows and hurled flares that started small fires.

Police spokesman Manfred Fullhardt said at least 65 arrests were made and eight civilians and one policeman were injured.

Airline offers top seats for comet

LONDON — British Airways is offering a sky-high seat for the great Halley's Comet show.

For the equivalent of $42, the state-owned airline is promising to take passengers on an hour-long trip over the ocean at 35,000 feet on a moonless night — well above most atmospheric pollution and away from the glare of city lights. The flights, in December and January, will operate from Manchester Airport.

"They will probably provide the country's best naked-eye view of the comet on its nearest approach to the Earth," an airline statement said.

The comet, named after Britain's 18th century astronomer royal, Edmund Halley, passes the Earth once every 75 years.

Concert funds go to area farmers

NEW YORK — Some of the proceeds from the recent FarmAid concert will go to buy food for financially troubled Kansas farmers.

Mary Ellen Lloyd, director of Domestic Hunger and Poverty for the National Council of Churches, announced that a $5,000 check was mailed Monday to the Kansas State Interfaith Rural Life Community, an organization formed by 36 religious leaders earlier this year.

The Rev. Frank Dorsey, a spokesman for the group, said the money will go to "families who are simply destitute." Dorsey, who is executive director of the Council of Ministries for the Kansas East Conference of the United Methodist Churches, said it has not yet been determined how the money will be distributed.

Lloyd said Kansas was selected as a recipient state for some of the concert money because of the worsening farm crisis there. It is among 17 agricultural states sharing $100,000 in the first round of disbursements.

Stephan issues abortion opinion

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan outlined steps Tuesday that the Kansas Legislature might take to prohibit abortions of developed fetuses which could otherwise live outside their mothers' wombs.

Stephan, in a legal opinion for state Sen. Eric Yost, cited federal court cases upholding laws in other states which ban the abortion of unborn infants that are considered "viable."

Yost, a Wichita Republican, said he needed the answers on what states can legally do to limit abortions before he introduces legislation in the 1986 Legislature that would outlaw abortion of the viable fetuses.

However, Yost said he believes such a proposal would face opposition from both anti-abortion and pro-choice forces.

Abortions currently are allowed in Kansas until nearly the time of birth, Yost said. A spokeswoman for the state Revisor of Statutes office said the only Kansas law governing abortion has not been enforced since the landmark 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision that many state abortion laws violated the constitutional right of privacy.

A spokesman for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment said of 9,754 abortions reported to the state health agency last year, 40 were performed during 24th week of pregnancy and none were reported later than that.

However, only hospitals are required to report abortions to KDHE, according to the spokesman, Bob Moody. Clinics and doctors are not required to report abortions they perform, although some do voluntarily, he said.

Jet fires rockets at U.S. helicopter

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Army helicopter flying a routine surveillance mission along the West German border was attacked without provocation over the weekend by a Czechoslovakian jet fighter, the Pentagon disclosed Tuesday.

The jet, described as a high-performance L-39 fighter, fired two to four rockets at the helicopter but failed to hit it and then flew back across the border to Czechoslovakia, said Pentagon spokesman Robert B. Sims. The American helicopter was carrying two crewmen, neither of whom was injured.

The United States filed a strong protest over the incident on Monday, Sims said. He declined to answer questions about whether the Czech government had responded to the protest or offered an explanation for the attack.

The State Department also refused to discuss the protest.

The incident occurred Saturday at 1 p.m. local time, or 7 a.m. EDT, north of the German city of Freyung, near the village of Finsterau, in airspace about one mile inside West Germany.

"The attack, which took place inside Federal Republic of Germany airspace in clear weather, was observed and confirmed by two separate groups of German civilians," Sims added.

He said the helicopter was an Army AH-1S Cobra gunship, assigned to the 2nd Armored Calvary Regiment at the Feucht Army Airfield outside Nuremberg.

"It's routine border reconnaissance to see if there is a change in fortifications along the border or an increase in troop concentrations and so forth," Sims said, adding American pilots were under strict rules not to move any closer than 100 meters — or 330 feet — of the border.

Postal board delays rate increases

WASHINGTON — An increase in postage rates for non-profit mailers and certain newspapers was delayed Tuesday by the Postal Service Board of Governors.

The price hike, ranging from 23 percent to 41 percent, had been scheduled to go into effect Tuesday, but was held off temporarily by the postmaster general until the board could meet.

Chairman John R. McKean said mailing rates for church bulletins, charitable donation appeals and newspapers mailed in-county did not have to increase because President Reagan signed legislation continuing the subsidy level that would have expired at midnight.

However, he warned that the rates may have to change in mid-November when the subsidy expires again.

The Postal Service said it needs $749 million for the new fiscal year if changes for the so-called "preferred rates" are to be avoided.

'Garfield' author illustrates 'Orson'

ALBANY, Ind. — Cartoonist Jim Davis, whose lasagna-loving cat Garfield was a comic-strip hit, is putting the finishing touches on a strip for children that will star a runt-of-the-litter pig named Orson.

"U.S. Acres," which takes place down on the farm will make its debut March 3, said Davis, whose "Garfield" strip appears in 1,700 newspapers.

The first month of gross profits from U.S. Acres will be donated to the FarmAid effort to help struggling farmers, Davis said from his Paws Inc. offices here.

The syndicator has projected that the new strip will begin in 300 to 500 newspapers, said Davis, who has spent more than a year on the new strip.

"We had noticed there was very little for the kids on the comics pages anymore," he said. "Most of them are too subtle, too adult, too topical for kids to possibly get any enjoyment out of them. This one's for the kids."

Palace announces secretary change

LONDON — Australian-born Sir William Heseltine will become Queen Elizabeth II's private secretary when Sir Philip Moore retires in April, Buckingham Palace announced Tuesday.

Heseltine, 55, has been deputy private secretary since 1977. He was formerly the queen's press secretary, and has been credited with shaping the modern royal image of a hard-working "family firm."

Sir Philip, 64, has been in his current post since 1977.

The private secretary's main function is that of liaison between the queen and her government.

Unknown caller says Soviet officials killed

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A telephone caller said Tuesday that two of four kidnapped Soviet Embassy employees had been killed, but intelligence sources said they were alive and the purported abductors produced photographs of them.

The photos showed all four Soviets with guns at their heads. An accompanying message said they would be killed unless a Syrian-backed offensive against fundamentalist Moslems in the northern port of Tripoli was stopped.

There was no indication of the day or time the photos were taken, but they were delivered to a Western news agency in Beirut.

Two of the men in the photos were identified as kidnap victims from pictures in their residence permits, photocopies of which were circulated by the kidnappers earlier. Lebanese authorities verified that the permits were authentic.

The photos and statement were purportedly from the Islamic Liberation Organization, a Sunni Moslem group linked to the Islamic Unification movement.

The anonymous caller who said he spoke for Islamic Holy War said the two Soviets killed were the commercial attache, Oleg Spirin, and the embassy doctor, Nikolai Versky.

Official sources said President Amin Gemayel, a Christian, told the Soviet charge d'affaires, Yuri Suslikov, at a meeting Tuesday the captives were alive, but said achievement of their freedom was "for others to perform."

This statement by Gemayel was taken as a directive to certain Moslem leaders who have some influence with the extremist factions.

Some of these religious leaders have been trying to secure the release of six Americans and eight other Westerners held by extremist Moslem kidnappers.

Committee doubts funding's adequacy

By The Collegian Staff

A contingent of local business owners presented objections to eminent domain proceedings persued by the Manhattan City Commissioners at their meeting Tuesday night.

Ruth Schrum, chairperson of the Committee for Just Compensation, questioned the commission on whether the city had enough money to finish the Downtown Redevelopment Project and if they were aware of possible lawsuits resulting from city-approved condemnation proceedings.

Gary Stith, community development coordinator, said the city did have funds in the form of temporary notes, to be paid by Urban Development Action Grant funds.

"Eminent domain is a disaster for many communities around the nation," Schrum said. "Eminent domain usually concerns land for buildings for the benefit of the public like hospitals, but not for retail to retail."

Despite vocal opposition to the ordinances, commissioners passed, on a 4-1 vote, the first reading of an ordinance authorizing acquisition of properties at 313 Leavenworth, 118 N. Third and 115 S. Third streets by eminent domain. Mayor Suzanne Lindamood objected to the ordinance.

Eminent domain is the right of a governing body to acquire land for public use without prior consent of the property owner.

Action was also taken authorizing the mayor and city clerk to enter into an agreement with Manhattan Ice and Cold Storage.

The agreement gave the storage company an option to purchase city-owned land acquired from the Union Pacific Railroad.

The company, located at 209 Yuma St., scaled down its original request for two city lots to only 120 square feet adjoining its property.

The land deleted from the original request was reserved by the commission for future redevelopment.

Local grads beat national test averages

From Staff and Wire Reports

Manhattan High School students who graduated last spring scored significantly above the national and state averages in two testing programs but the scores are down from 1984 Manhattan graduates' test averages, according to results released Sept. 23.

Manhattan students scored above the national and state averages on the American College Testing program, administered by a non-profit educational service group in Iowa, and the Scholastic Aptitude Test, administered by the College Board in New York. Students seeking admission to most colleges and universities must take one or both of the tests.

Manhattan students who graduated in 1985 had a composite score of 21.0 on the ACT. The score is down from the 21.3 composite score of Manhattan's 1984 seniors.

Kansas graduates scored 19.1 on the test, which is 0.1 point lower than 1984's results, but 0.5 point above the national average of 18.6.

Manhattan High School Principal Jim Rezac said 185 seniors took the ACT and 59 took the SAT out of a graduating class of 300. Rezac said good students and good instruction are the reason for the school's above-average scores on the test. He said a curriculum which stresses basic courses also contributed to the school's success.

Students in the 1985 graduating class at Manhattan High School were the first to be required to pass two years of math courses. Beginning with the class of 1987, students will be required to take two years of science courses in addition to the math.

"We certainly put emphasis on basic classes," Rezac said. "We're seeing more enrollment in math and sciences."

About 1 million students took the ACT last year. In Kansas, 17,714 seniors took the test.

The ACT composite is obtained by averaging the four ACT scores in English, math, social studies and the natural sciences.

The SAT is divided into math and verbal sections and is scored on a scale of 200 to 800 for each section. Manhattan's seniors scored 530 on verbal and 585 on math for a total of 1,115. The average state scores were 504 for verbal and 550 in math for a score of 1,054.

Kansas' SAT score is fourth best in the nation, but the ACT results are considered more significant because only 5 percent of 1985 graduates took the SAT compared to 64 percent of 1985 graduates who took the ACT.

About 1 million students took the SAT, mostly on the east and west coasts. The ACT is more widely used in the West and Midwest.

National SAT scores rose nine points this year to 906, the largest increase since 1963, when scores began a steady decline. The verbal score rose five points to 431 and math rose four points to 475.

College Board President George H. Hanford said the rise in SAT scores is the result of the stressing of basic skills in the 1970s and new education reforms in the 1980s.

New state law raises tax rates on cigarettes

By The Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Kansans who smoke cigarettes began paying pay 8 cents more in taxes for 20-cigarette pack and 10 cents more in tax on a 25-cigarette pack.

Initially, Congress proposed the 16-cent federal cigarette tax be reduced to 8 cents which prompted state lawmakers to propose the increase. After Congress abandoned the plan, the Kansas Legislature passed the new tax.

The increase is expected to add $14.4 million dollars to state revenues for the remaining nine months of the current fiscal year. The revenue from a full year's tax has been estimated by Harley Duncan, state revenue secretary, to total about $20 million.

The increase in cigarette tax was the only new state law to take effect Tuesday.

Locally, the majority of local convenience stores haven't rushed to increase prices.

Jim Blacker, general manager of Mini-Mart Convenience Stores, said the company would be increasing cigarette prices at least enough to cover the tax increase, but had not done so as of Monday afternoon.

At the Shop Quik stores throughout Manhattan, Dave Ortman, supervisor, said "we will (increase prices), but we haven't yet. We really haven't decided on the new prices yet," Ortman said.

At the Manhattan Town and Country Market, 809 N. Third St., clerk Joan Nederhiser said they would be increasing the price by 10 cents per pack.

In addition to the retail tax, the new law imposes a one-time inventory tax on cigarettes, cigarette tax stamps and meter prints provided by wholesale and vending machine operators.

Divestiture not enough

In response to a petition signed by 415 state workers, a limited divestiture policy of South African business investments has been enacted in Kansas.

In late September, four members of the seven-member Kansas Public Employees Retirement System board approved a move to remove invested retirement funds from U.S. companies that do business in South Africa, but have not signed the Sullivan Principles. The board represents state and local public employees in Kansas.

The decision affects some $23 million in current Kansas pension system investments in eight companies that have not signed. Overall, the board controls approximately $2.2 billion in retirement funds, of which about $223 million is invested in companies doing business in South Africa.

If nothing else, the board should be commended for its tenacity. For the last five years, legislation aimed at forcing KPERS to divest South African-affiliated holdings has failed. But the limited action also falls short of the petition signed by 415 workers at the Kansas Neurological Institute, Topeka, which called for total divestment of the companies.

And the action is not without other limitations, with an overriding concern for profits.

The provision calls for the sale of holdings in the eight companies only when such action would be "financially beneficial" for the retirement fund.

While the intent may be laudable, the reality of the action is of lesser impact.

It must be remembered the action calls for divestiture only when it is economically profitable for the KPERS organization. It may be a long time before a profitable divestiture could be realized.

Also, the sale of the KPERS holdings may well be only a passing of the consciousness of one organization to another, with no actual financial penalty on any party involved, whether it be from the United States or South Africa.

While the action may be viewed as a start, the overall impact, when viewed realistically, falls far short of being a condemnation of the apartheid system of the South African government.

Lamm comments callous

Colorado Gov. Richard D. Lamm has let another stupid remark slide.

In a speech on March 24, 1984, Lamm angered groups of people across the nation with his remark that elderly people who are terminally have a "duty to die and get out of the way" instead of trying to prolong their lives by artificial means.

Lamm suggested that elderly people who are terminally ill should "let the other society, our kids, build a reasonable life."

While not wanting to downplay the utter insensitivity of Lamm's earlier statements on the elderly, Lamm has lowered himself to an even lower level with his opinions on the medical treatment of AIDS patients.

"There are two types of AIDS patients. Either you're dead or you're dying," Lamm said. "If there's no chance of any (successful) outcome, then you can't order up every possible (medical) service."

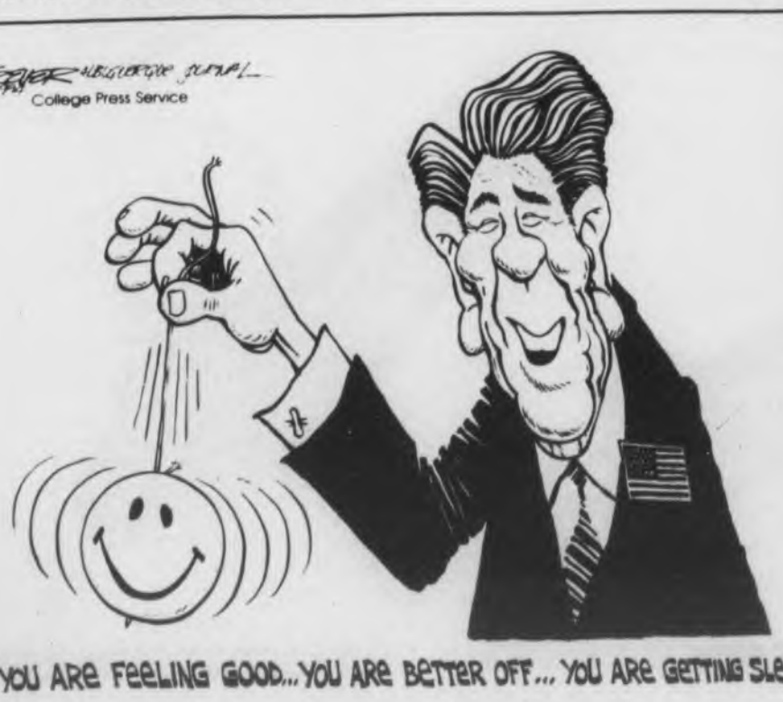
Lamm made these latest remarks on Sept. 25, during a discussion at the University of Colorado Health Sciences Center about rising health costs.

Lamm went on to say that he thought AIDS patients should be able to receive treatment "that is medically indicated. If the treatment will relieve pain, add quality of life or be of medical benefit, I'm all for providing it.

"But at some point, treatment may become counterproductive, overtreatment."

Why Lamm, obviously not any type of authority on the matter, took it upon himself to comment on the AIDS treatment situation is a mystery. He is a politician, not a medical doctor.

With his statements, Lamm epitomized irresponsibility and insensitivity.



Anyone, especially a governor, should realize AIDS patients and any other terminally ill patients have the undeniable right to seek treatment for any disease or ailment they might of contacted.

Lamm has, in effect, told all AIDS patients that they should give up all hope of recovering from the disease. Why does Lamm think it's his responsibility to tell people what medical treatments they should or shouldn't have administered?

Lamm is taking a lot of heat for his statements about AIDS patients, as well he should.

Maybe next time, he will think before he speaks.

Puzzled about unanswered questions

MIKE RILEY
Collegian Columnist

Lately on campus, there has been much discussion on a wide array of topics, ranging from the construction of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum to the allocation of $700,000 of student money that has been returned to us as a result of bond refinancing. I'm glad to see the University community involved in these matters, but I have many other questions that haven't been addressed, yet.

I'm becoming distraught as every source I approach leaves me empty-handed. I've tried professors, peers, parents and even U-LearN in the quest for answers to my questions, and I've only had one question answered: Why do flamingos stand on one leg? (Because if they picked up the other leg they would fall down.)

True, the outcome of the answers to my questions probably will not affect foreign policy or force Supreme Court decisions to be handed down, but having the mysteries solved will allow me to regain normal sleeping, eating and dating habits. So what are these questions, you ask? They are based on one mode of thought and that is "why?"

Why do women always go to the bathroom in groups of three or more? Is there some safety in numbers from a danger known only in the "powder room?"

Why do restaurant owners post "No shoes, No shirt, No Service" signs? Surely they must realize that the soles of your shoes are going to be just as dirty as the soles of your feet. My feet are washed at least once every day, but my shoes are rarely cleaned.

Why does the radio station you want to listen to always fade out? It never fails, my favorite song will come on and almost instantly the station will start to fade. And while we are speaking of radio stations, how much longer will 97FM still be the "new 97FM?"

Why do dogs chase cars? True, it probably boosts the dog's ego thinking this massive object is running from him, but what is the dog going to do when he catches the car?

Why do people tell you to look up a word in the dictionary if you don't know how to spell it? It's like trying to look somebody up in the yearbook when all you know about them is what they look like.

One question that has been nagging at me is based on my parent's choices for my toys. As a child I was provided with many strange gifts but I was always puzzled by the bath toys my parents gave me. Why would they give me a hair dryer and a toaster for bath toys? Why would they give me boxes of candy after I had been diagnosed as a diabetic? Were they trying to tell me something?

Why does the Kansas Division of Travel and Tourism play the "Ah Kansas!" ads over Kansas radios? We are already stuck here, so maybe it's just a propaganda campaign to keep us content. I would suggest playing it over radios in areas where Kansas would sound like a nice place to visit, such as Cleveland. Also, more juicy facts could be included. For instance, "Our governor has had more wives than yours has."

Why do the check cashiers always ask, "Is everything current?" Do they really think I'd tell them it's not? And when was the last time they compared the driver's license picture with your face to see if it's really your check?

Why do all the classrooms have those little signs that state the room's seating capacity? When was the last time the fire marshal peeked in and counted to make sure the classroom wasn't overcrowded? Actually, these do come in handy when making excuses for blowing off classes: "The sign said the room could hold only 28 people and I was the 29th, so I left."

I've also wondered why people who have absolutely no knowledge of auto mechanics look under their hoods when their cars break down. What do they expect to find, a little arrow that points to the problem with instructions that read, "turn this knob, shake this coil and the car will resume normal operation?"

If you have ever lost something you might understand how I feel when I ask, "Why do you always find what your looking for in the last place you looked?"

Perhaps if we all pool our efforts and really cooperate on this, we could answer these questions and be able to move on to more earth-shattering questions such as, "Why don't the Dukes of Hazzard ever use their car doors?"

Goodnow residents berate Homecoming organizers

Editor,

We, the Goodnow Hall Governing Board, on behalf of the residents of Goodnow Hall, would like to air some serious grievances with the Blue Key Honor Society and the means by which Homecoming is organized each year.

From the standpoint of this residence hall, flagrant and recurrent discrimination has been displayed against us in a variety of ways. Consistently, the informational mini-kits that outline due dates, guidelines, organizational information and contact personnel have been delivered to us extremely late.

This year we didn't receive our kits until nearly a week after the deadline for float entries had passed, and then they were given in an "oh, by the way" manner. One has to wonder if we would have gotten the kits at all if the assistant director of Ford Hall was not a member of Blue Key. Luckily, late entries were allowed, but who can design and build a good quality float in such a short amount of time?

Contact personnel from Blue Key are seldom available. Phones go unanswered and messages are rarely, if ever, acknowledged. When someone is contacted, they know little, if anything, about a given situation and conveniently pass the buck to another never-answered phone.

Homecoming seems to have become a highly politicized event, with a certain few being in a position to dictate to the majority. We would like to remind you that Goodnow is part of a system (KSU Association of Residence Halls) that accommodates far more students than any other living group organization. We also contribute substantially to the overall campus environment in many ways throughout the year.

For at least the third year running, we feel that Goodnow, as well as the other residence halls, has been given the backseat to other living groups. Promises of improvements have been repeatedly made to our Homecoming leaders with no results. Consequently, we have decided that Goodnow can do a better job of promoting K-State and the hall by itself and we are withdrawing from this year's politicized sham that is mistakenly called an All-University Homecoming.

Criticism of former student senator unconscionable

Editor,

Re: Jim Sterns' letter "Senate leader deserves respect, not condemnation," in the Sept. 26 Collegian:

Jim Sterns' attack on Catherine Sayler's Sept. 24 column misses her point, and irrelevantly attacks her departure from Student Senate.

As for the second point, she would be "guilty" of an "injustice" to her constituents only if she had run for office knowing that she could not complete her term. Can he support such an accusation? Resignation after 3½ terms is hardly "the greatest injustice." Sterns' ludicrously inappropriate language is a further embarrassment for this irrelevant ad infinitum attack. Her argument would have the same validity if anyone else had made it.

According to the published vote totals, out of 18,000 students, about 14 percent voted in the presidential runoff, and 11 percent voted on the referendum. Student Body President Steve Brown, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, received 60 percent of the presidential votes, and "yes" in the referendum received 64 percent.

Without phrasing the comparison so narrowly and starkly, Sayler's point was that the statistics argue that the student leaders and the referendum deserve comparable weight as representing student opinion. Sterns seems to think that she said the referendum was representative and the student leaders are not. This misses the point of her argument for logical consistency, which observes that Student Senate Chairman Mark Jones, senior in management, undercuts his own claim to be a student representative by dismissing the referendum.

A rational argument could be made for Jones' approach. He or his defenders might claim that he has heard from many new students who support the current coliseum plans despite the summer's news of the construction bid fiasco. Sterns did not mention this; it does seem unlikely.

In any case, Sayler is not the only one to have noticed that Jones' performance before the Board of Regents was an embarrassment to his office. Jones' case is not helped by a defender like Sterns, whose letter mainly proves that he has become a college senior without learning to read carefully.

Essayist White dies following battle with Alzheimer's disease

By The Associated Press

BROOKLIN, Maine — E.B. White, the graceful essayist of The New Yorker magazine's brilliant beginnings, died Tuesday at age 86, leaving behind timeless works of humor, literary good sense and whimsy, including the beloved children's book, "Charlotte's Web."

White, who had suffered from Alzheimer's disease and had declined steadily in the last year, died at his home, according to the Jordan Funeral Home in Ellsworth. The family said plans for a memorial service would be announced.

"A few months ago, he said he had so much to tell and so little time to tell it," said J. Russell Wiggins, publisher of the weekly Ellsworth American and a friend of White since the late 1940s.

The feeling had been with White nearly all his life. "I liked to write," he once said, "and there seemed to be plenty to write about."

White was a private man who fled New York for a sheep farmer's life in Maine nearly a half-century ago; a precise writer with a Yankee's horror of the unnecessary word.

Though not part of The New Yorker's original cast, White was at length recruited, married one of the chief editors and set the bemused, detached tone of the magazine's "Talk of the Town" column.

"It is not too much to say that Andy White was the most valuable person on the magazine," his friend and colleague James Thurber wrote in 1938. "His delicate tinkering with the works of The New Yorker caused it to move with a new ease and grace."

He was born Elwyn Brooks White on July 11, 1899, in Mount Vernon, N.Y.

In 1917, he enrolled in Cornell University, where every student named White inevitably became "Andy," in honor of Andrew White, the school's first president. "Andy" he remained, grateful to shed a given name he disliked.

After Army service in 1918 and graduation in 1921, White crossed the country in a Model T Ford roadster with a friend, worked for the Seattle Times and then aboard an Arctic freighter, and returned to New York to work for an advertising agency in 1923.

Harold Ross, The New Yorker's founder, wooed White for two years before the young writer agreed to work, but only half-time. Little by little, it became a full-time job. In 1929, White married Katharine Angell, one of The New Yorker's first editors and Ross' strong right arm.

In 1937, White parted with the magazine and its city, moving to a white clapboard farmhouse in North Brooklin and writing a column, "One Man's Meat," for Harper's until 1943. In 1945 he was again writing for The New Yorker.

A spartan, gray boathouse on the shore of Allen Cove became his studio, and he devoted happy hours to raising North Country Cheviot sheep and his flocks of geese and poultry.

White and his wife, who died in 1977, co-edited "A Sub Treasury of American Humor" in 1941. They had a son, Joel, and Mrs. White had two children by a previous marriage, Nancy Stableford and Roger Angell, now a writer for The New Yorker.

"Stuart Little," a 1945 book about a mouse, was the first of his children's books. "Charlotte's Web," about a runty pig's friendship with a philosophical spider, followed in 1952.

Everything White had to say about writing fit into the 85 pages of "The Elements of Style," his revision of a writing text by William Strunk Jr., his teacher at Cornell. The rules were as simple to state — "Omit needless words" — as they were difficult to obey.

Israeli forces attack PLO headquarters

By The Associated Press

HAMAM PLAGE, Tunisia — Streaking 1,500 miles across the Mediterranean Sea, Israeli warplanes bombed Palestine Liberation Organization headquarters in a Tunis suburb Tuesday and the PLO said as many as 60 people were killed.

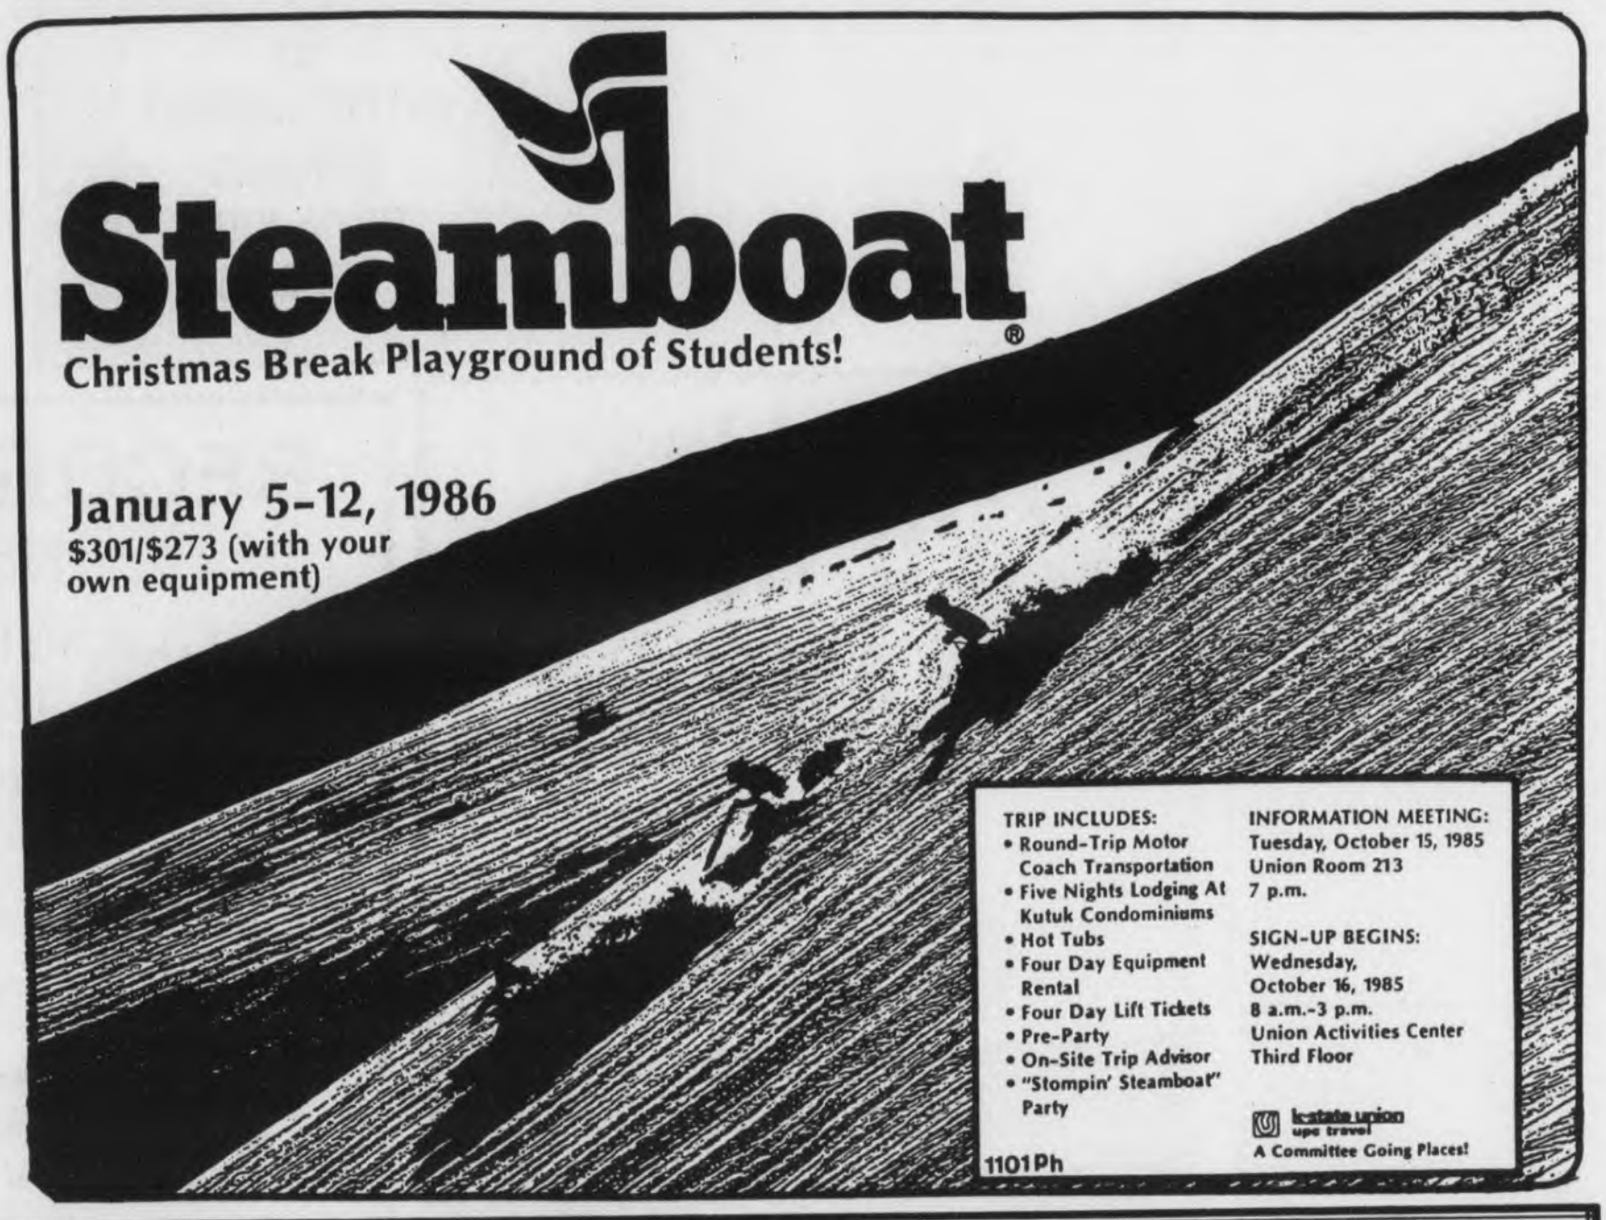
The jets swept low over the coast to strike Yasser Arafat's headquarters only 12 miles south of the Tunisian capital. Although Arafat escaped the devastating attack, the Israeli bombs destroyed his political headquarters, his residence and the homes of several PLO officials.

Dressed in military fatigues and appearing distressed, Arafat and an aide inspected the damage and talked with the wounded. Arafat has made his main headquarters in Tunisia since he was driven out of Beirut by the Israelis in 1982.

In Tel Aviv, Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin told a briefing the raid was to retaliate for the Yom Kippur slayings of three Israelis aboard a yacht in Cyprus. And he called it a warning to terrorists "that the long arm of the IDF (Israel Defense Forces) will reach them wherever they are."

Although a caller claiming to represent the PLO group "Force 17" claimed responsibility for the attack in Cyprus, the PLO has denied involvement.

Lt. Gen. Moshe Levy, Israel's chief of staff, told a briefing in Tel Aviv that as many as 50 people were killed in Tuesday's raid. Medical sources in Tunis put the death toll at about 30 and said about 100 were injured.



Israel has bombed guerrilla bases in neighboring Lebanon 13 times this year, but it was the first time Israel has struck any other country since June 7, 1981, when Israeli warplanes bombed an Iraqi nuclear reactor near Baghdad. Israel also mounted the airborne mission in 1976 and rescued hostages held at Entebbe airport in Uganda.

Tuesday's raid provoked expressions of anger from other Arab countries and Tunisia called for action by the U.N. Security Council.

In Washington, the Reagan administration suggested it considered the raid an act of self-defense.

State Department spokesman Charles E. Redman said, "As a matter of principle, it is our view that it is legitimate self defense to respond appropriately to acts of terrorism." But he said the administration did not have all the facts.

Witnesses in Hamam Plage said they saw four jets conduct bombing runs. One PLO spokesman said six Phantom jets were involved while another PLO spokesman mentioned eight jets. The Israeli arsenal contains Phantom jets, but also more modern F-16 and F-15 warplanes.

American journalist dies in Afghan battle

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — An American journalist working for the Arizona Republic was killed "ingloriously" during a battle in Afghanistan between government and rebel forces, the official Tass news agency reported Tuesday.

It identified the reporter as Charles Thornton and said he entered Afghanistan a month ago from Pakistan with three other Americans and they were traveling with "gangs of Afghan counter-revolutionaries."

Tass did not name the other Americans, but Afghan rebel sources in Pakistan said Monday that Thornton was killed and three other Americans, Arizona Republic photographer Peter Schlueter and two medical personnel, John Maugnum and Judd Jensen, were wounded when their jeep struck a mine or was attacked on Sept. 25.

Tass, however, said the attack occurred near Kandahar where "the uninvited guests met with the crushing fire of the Afghan armed forces, which killed Thornton and wounded one more U.S. journalist, who, like Thornton, had left for Afghanistan in search of sensational reports from that country."

It said, "Thornton's death is a direct sequel to the policy of covert and open interference, including military, in the affairs of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan pursued by Washington."

Tass gave no attribution for its report or other details about the attack and the victims.

The Soviet Union has had more than 100,000 troops in Afghanistan since December 1979 helping the government battle the insurgents.

The conflict between the Afghanistan government and rebels has hampered the collection of information by humanitarian organizations, such as Amnesty International.

Building will house dressing rooms

Work begins on new City Park facility

By COLLEEN WILSON
Staff Writer

Construction has begun at the City Park to provide new public restrooms and better facilities for the Arts in the Park performances.

A two-floor, 22-by-48 foot building between the pavilion — a small covered stage and audience area — and the outside stage used for park entertainment is scheduled to be completed by Jan. 1, 1986, said Don Cukjati, the park's fine arts supervisor.

Public restrooms will be located on the ground level of the building. A storage room and two dressing rooms will be on the second floor, which is level with the stages. This will allow performers direct backstage entrance to both the outside stage and the stage in the pavilion.

In the past, performers had to dress in a trailer behind the stage or in the park's offices and had to enter the stage from the stairs on the side of it. The only public restrooms were on the west side of the swimming pool area.

"It will be more convenient for everyone," Cukjati said. "The dressing rooms will be closer to the stage and the audience won't have to grit their teeth as much (because the restrooms will be closer)."

Cukjati said the new facility will benefit not only park performances but the entire park as well, including the annual Arts and Crafts Festival which is held in the drive near the new facility. The restrooms will be heated in the winter so people using the pavilion's ice skating rink can use them. A sidewalk will run along the west side of the pavilion to the restroom entrances on the south side of the new facility.

Cukjati has been trying to get approval from the city to fund the $52,250 facility since he became the fine arts supervisor in September, 1982. The city approved the facility in May and construction began two weeks ago.

In addition to the new building, some landscaping has been done in front of the outside stage. Cukjati said the ground was crowned to let water run off the audience area where there has been a problem with flooding.

Gravel rock will be laid on the ground under the bleachers, which are about 120 feet from the stage, to keep grass from growing.

Strong desire led Ryun to worldwide success as runner

By SARAH KESSINGER
Collegian Reporter

An Olympic athlete doesn't always start out his first years of high school as a prospect for worldwide competition. Jim Ryun, three-time Olympian and former world record holder in the mile, half mile and 1500 meters, was no exception.

Ryun, who spoke Sunday evening at the Ironman '85 Award Banquet at the Ramada Inn, attended Wichita East High School from 1962-1966 and decided that as a tall and skinny student he wasn't cut out for the football team, so he settled on cross country.

"I was really anxious to go out for cross country. I had no idea what distance it was," Ryun said. "I had never run in my life a distance longer than a quarter of a mile and now we were going to race a distance of two miles.

"My experiences in junior high were such that I wanted to have acceptance from my peers and I was smoking quite heavily and drinking quite a lot and you can imagine that first half mile. I remember going home and saying I'll never do that again."

However, Ryun continued practices and became the 21st runner on the high school team. Within one year, he moved from 21st to 14th to the No. 1 man on the team. Ryun placed high in the state meet that year but did not run again for three months.

As a member of the track team, Ryun said, his enthusiasm and determination picked up because his desire to become somebody was so strong.

"At some point in there you want to become accepted," Ryun said. "It was so important for me to be accepted by my family and by my peers."

This need drove Ryun to concentrate on his running and, after his first year of track, he never lost another race in his high school career. As a 17-year-old, Ryun ran for the 1964 Olympic team in Tokyo but didn't make it to the finals in any of his events. Two years later he broke the world record for the mile with a time of 3:51.3.

Ryun attended the University of Kansas from 1966-70, bringing fame to the track team for his worldwide success. He said he remembered competing on K-State's Memorial Stadium track and noted this past weekend that it "still holds water on the curves."

In 1968 the Mexico City Olympics were the site of Ryun's silver medal in the mile and in 1972 he ran in the Munich Olympics with an unexpected outcome.

Picked as a favorite, Ryun was running in the 1500 meters preliminaries when he was bumped by another runner, fell and hit his head on the railing. Ryun said the ABC cameras had a view proving he was fouled, but the Olympic committee decided not to allow him back into the competition.

Ryun said there was a lot of "anger, hurt and frustration" after that incident but said he learned from this that he could pick up and go on with the help of his wife and the church.

Now a resident of Lawrence, Ryun lives a little slower-paced life with his wife Anne, a former K-State student, and their four children. Ryun runs 12-17 miles a day and occasionally competes in 10-kilometer runs.

"When you're a miler, 10,000 meters is a long way to run," Ryun said.

The KU track team gets some help from the former Olympian, although he holds no formal position with the team.

Ryun makes personal appearances for different events connected with athletics and is now doing promotion work for Glaxo, a pharmaceutical company. He also has worked with American Home Foods speaking on the relationship of sports in helping with sales.

As for the move from amateur to professional athlete, Ryun said there is not a great difference. After his last Olympics, Ryun in 1973 signed a contract and ran with the International Track Association, which is made up of touring track professionals. Their income is from television, sponsorships and gate receipts.

Looking back on his career as a runner, Ryun said he would change a few things to improve the type of person he was as a well-known athlete.

"The way I'd treat people would be a lot better," he said, adding that being a Christian had helped him realize the importance of people in a world full of reporters and TV cameras.

Ryun also pointed out some important points for young athletes.

"I would get good advice all along the way in terms of coaching and training," Ryun said. "Also don't hurry (the training); the general feeling is that there's tomorrow and that's it. A lot of times an athlete does not develop until he's a lot older."

Royals deserve division title

DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Even though California has retaken the lead in the American League West following a win over Kansas City Tuesday night, the Royals are the better team and will remain the better team even if they don't win the division title.

Why? A position-by-position comparison of the two teams will help prove my point.

CATCHER — Bob Boone and Jim Sundberg aren't the greatest hitters in history of the game, but both are thought of as outstanding defensively. Boone has playoff experience, Sundberg doesn't. Sundberg's homer won game one for Kansas City, but I still give a slight edge to California.

FIRST BASE — Kansas City has Steve Balboni and California's first baseman is the veteran Rod Carew. Carew is a legitimate Hall of Fame choice, but Balboni is the better player this year. He has 35 home runs and is solid defensively. KC wins here.

SECOND BASE — Frank White against Bobby Grich. White is one of the best defensive second basemen ever to play the game. Grich has shuffled back and forth between first, second and third. White has hit more home runs this year than in any previous season in his career, and that production is what gives the Royals the advantage at this position.

SHORTSTOP — Dick Schofield of the Angels is a better player than either Onix Concepcion or Buddy Biancalana. The Angels get the nod here.

THIRD BASE — George Brett and Doug DeCinces, who both hit home runs in the first game of the series, are two of the best in the American League. Brett slumped for the entire month of September, but still will hit over .300 on the season. How many players can do that? Royals win again.

LEFT FIELD — California definitely got the nod here early in the year, but Kansas City's acquisition of Lonnie Smith gave the Royals the edge — ever so slight as it may be. Brian Downing is an excellent athlete, but Smith has been one of the keys to the Royal pennant drive.

CENTER FIELD — Willie Wilson of the Royals and Gary Pettis of California are two of the best defensive outfielders in the game, but Wilson is a much better offensive player than his Angel counterpart. Wilson has won a batting title and until Pettis does the same, KC will have the advantage here.

RIGHT FIELD — Mr. October against one of several. Reggie Jackson struck out against Bret Saberhagen in the ninth inning in game one, but Darryl Motley, Omar Moreno and Pat Sheridan just don't compare. Win number three for California.

DESIGNATED HITTER — Hal Mc Rae and Jorge Orta give the Royals legitimate threats from either side of the plate. California has used several people in this role on the year, and none of them has done the job that McRae and Orta have for KC. Royals win here.

STARTING PITCHING — Kansas City has potential Cy Young Award winner Bret Saberhagen, 20-6, and possible ERA titlist Charlie Leibrandt. California counters with two late-season acquisitions in Don Sutton and John Candelaria. I like the Royals' youth. Saberhagen's win over Candelaria in game one bears my feelings out, I think.

RELIEF PITCHING — Although he hasn't been spectacular this season, Dan Quisenberry rewrote the book on relief pitching. The Angels don't have a stopper that can compare. KC here, too.

MANAGER — Both Dick Howser and Gene Mauch have done a great job with young teams. This one is even.

Unless I can't do simple arithmetic, the Royals win my little comparison 8-3 with one category rated even. Although my feelings really are unimportant in the overall scheme of things, I felt like reassuring myself that "my" Royals were really the better team.

We can all rest easily now — or can we? The playoffs are right around the corner.

Angels regain division lead

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Mike Witt and Donnie Moore combined on a six-hitter as the California Angels regained their one-game lead over Kansas City in the American League West with a 4-2 victory Tuesday night over the Royals.

Witt, 14-9, worked 7⅔ innings before Moore came on to get his 30th save.

Heckler

The president said a successor to Heckler had not been chosen.

White House deputy press secretary Albert Brashear said Heckler will remain at HHS until she is confirmed as ambassador by the Senate.

"It shouldn't take long," Brashear said of the confirmation process, noting that the Senate is in session.

Heckler fidgeted with her hands and appeared nervous as the president talked with reporters. She said Reagan had persuaded her to take the new post and that she considers it "an honor and an exciting challenge."

Heckler once described the Irish ambassadorship as "a lovely position — for someone else."

Asked about that, she said she "looked upon this assignment with new eyes having heard the presentation that he (Reagan) made and having also his assurance that it was my choice to stay on as secretary of HHS or beocme ambassador to Ireland."

Reagan was asked if she could have stayed on.

"Yes," he said.

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., a Democrat from Heckler's home state of Massachusetts, said it was known that "they" have been trying to get rid of Heckler.

"It's regrettable that the ultra-right wing group of the Republican Party wants to take control of the avenue she has been on," O'Neill said. "She has stopped them from cutting programs of the poor...I'm sorry that the president is succumbing to the wishes of the ultra-conservatives."

Before Heckler's departure from the Cabinet was announced, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Education and Labor subcommittee on health, said, "Clearly the ideologues of the administration do not want to work on health or human services. The White House staff looks at health care as only one more place to slash programs."

Goodnow

accounting, assistant director of Ford Hall and member of Blue Key, and told him about the situation, Goodnow got kits.

Millsap said this is not the first year the residence halls have received their kits after the greek houses.

"Every year they tell us they will get the kits to us when they deliver to the greeks, and every year we get them after the greeks," Millsap said.

"I don't see why while they were out delivering to the greek houses they could not have just dropped a kit off here," He said.

Millsap said after the run-around he got on the phone, the hall governing board discussed it and decided to drop out of the all-University Homecoming events.

"We can't build a float in a week," Millsap said. "We left messages and got no response. It just seems that they focus on other groups — mainly greeks."

Lisa Williams, senior in elementary education and Goodnow social chairman, said the hall did not have adequate time to get residents involved.

"To get people involved in helping us make the float we needed the information," Williams said. "People don't like to work 10 hours a night the week before Homecoming."

All the confusion, and no luck in contacting anyone from Blue Key led Goodnow to pull out of the all-University Homecoming events.

"When we don't know what's going on with all the other activities, pant the chant, etc..., its not right for us to tell our residents one thing and then two days later find out because of certain rules and regulations we have to do it differently," Williams said.

Atkinson said that generally in the past, Blue Key has come through and made an effort to extend invitations to the residence halls.

Milsap said last year Goodnow Hall had a float in the parade after he called a friend in a greek house and got the kit information from him.

from within and without). They have fought long and hard and don't intend to give it away," he said, because whites consider South Africa to be their homeland.

The strategy of the black people is to make the apartheid society ungovernable, he said. Blacks have chosen this route because of the large expense the government must pay to maintain an extensive security force to uphold apartheid laws, and because the blacks do not have access to military arms.

"Three-hundred years of oppression have created huge anger and desperation. (Blacks are) so angry as to accept to be killed in the fight for freedom," he said.

They execute their strategy by "run and taunt" tactics, he said. They influence civil disobedience by demonstrations, which result in police action. The South African police have turned to killing people, which results in funerals. The funerals, in turn, inspire more demonstrations at which more people are killed by police, creating a vicious circle.

three additional student members."

David Cox, professor of biochemistry, opposed the change, saying the motion began with relatively clean statements which adequately stated the faculty's viewpoint and feelings of grievance.

Walter Cash, assistant professor of anatomy and physiology, expressed the concern that students' representation be included in the faculty's recommendations to the regents.

"We are looking for equal representation, not just looking out for ourselves," Cash said.

The motion was approved.

Godfather's #1 PIZZA PURSUIT

Ridiculous facts concerning pizza and its origins...

Pizza was actually invented in 1623, when the wife of Luigi Pizziliano accidentally sat on a large ball of bread dough left to rise on a chair. The resulting pancake had such an interesting, saucer-like shape that she spread it with tomato sauce, tossed on some cheese, and popped it into her stone oven. Later, when pizza had become a Pizziliano family staple, Luigi's wife took to throwing it at him, frisbee style, when he didn't come home on time. The first pizza delivery!

Honorary includes new Spirit March to attract students

By KEVIN SNELL
Collegian Reporter

Homecoming 1985 begins today under the theme of "Ride the Tide of Purple Pride" and a new event, the Spirit March, takes place tonight. The festivities are organized by Blue Key senior honorary.

The Spirit March, led by the KSU Pep Band, begins at 9:30 p.m. in the Durland parking lot. The band will march past residence halls, head east on Claflin Avenue and pass through campus, gathering students for the traditional bonfire at Memorial Stadium at 10 p.m.

The "Pant the Chant" contest, in which living groups will yell cheers they have written, will be held at the bonfire. Other participants in the bonfire activities will be Athletic Director Larry Travis, the football team, cheerleaders and the band.

Clark Atkinson, senior in civil engineering and Blue Key president, said the Spirit March is something new.

"One reason we're doing it is to pick up residence hall participants for the bonfire," he said. "The Spirit March is really the big thing for us this year."

Keenan Beauchamp, senior in agricultural engineering and Blue Key member, said the march is a special effort to involve everyone in Homecoming.

"We're really trying to get more people to the bonfire," he said.

Homecoming activities begin at 9:30 a.m. today with K-State Union Day events in the Union courtyard. The events begin with the living group spirit banner contest, a human-pyramid-building contest and a cheering competition. Five groups will be chosen to compete in the finals of each event on Friday.

Atkinson said at least 11 greek organizations and several residence halls are participating in the events.

Entertainment in the Union starts at 10:30 a.m. and will be provided by the pep band; the Streetside Quintet; the Kappa Kappa Gamma Pickers; the FarmHouse Quartet; Men's Glee Club; and student performers Mary Ann Forgy, junior in humanities, and Andy Martin, senior in chemical science.

Friday is K-State Day. The KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble will kick off the entertainment at 11 a.m. and will be followed by performers Jeff Suttle, junior in business administration; Denise Middleton, senior in speech pathology; the Pridettes; the Wildcat Dancers; and Lance Romance and the Heart Attacks.

Friday's events are capped by the Alumni Association Homecoming dance at 8:30 p.m. in the Manhattan Holidome.

The 1985 Homecoming parade begins at 9 a.m. Saturday and will feature living group floats and the marching bands of the University and Manhattan High School. University President Duane Acker and Shirley Acker will be grand

Asbestos removal plan includes EPA changes

By RICH HARRIS
Collegian Reporter

Changes in University procedures concerning the removal of asbestos insulation were released Wednesday afternoon. The changes incorporate new instructions, released by the Environmental Protection Agency, concerning asbestos removal undertaken by public employees into the existing University policy.

Jack Watson, general superintendent of shops for the Division of University Facilities, said new EPA regulations did not arrive in his office until Sept. 11, after emergency work on campus buildings had been completed.

The changes in EPA policy were released by the agency on June 25 and arrived in Gov. Carlin's office July 18. They were received by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment July 23 and reached John Lambert, University safety officer, Sept. 4 and Watson received them Sept. 11. Watson said the delay in releasing the new procedures was administrative in nature.

"Things in the administrative line don't happen that quick," Watson said.

There are seven EPA-generated changes in the University asbestos reporting and disposal procedure. Watson wrote the previous University procedure for removing asbestos, which went into effect in April.

The new procedure states that the shop supervisor and the worker will estimate the amount of asbestos to be moved and the time required to move it. They will then submit an

'Bike Ride' crosses Iowa

Student cycles with 10,000

When 10,000 bicyclists dip their back tires in the Big Sioux River, it's time to begin RAGBRAI — the Des Moines Register's Annual Great Bike Ride Across Iowa.

This year, Debbie Starr, senior in interior design and business, was one of the 10,000 who participated in the 600-mile RAGBRAI.

The tour began at the South Dakota border — when the participants dipped their back bicycle tires in the Big Sioux River near Haywarden, Iowa — and ended when the riders dipped their front tires in the Mississippi River at the Illinois border in Clinton, Iowa.

"Towns in Iowa actually make bids and pay large sums of money to have bikers ride through their towns," Starr said. "They really go all out and provide free food, parties and places to stay the night.

"The idea is to go at your own pace and have a good time," Starr said.

Don Kaul, editor of the Des Moines Register, and John Karras, a columnist for the newspaper, began RAGBRAI 13 years ago. This year RAGBRAI occurred July 19 through July 26.

"About 85 percent of the approximate 10,000 riders finish," Starr said. "If anything goes wrong there is always someone there to help you."

A variety of people participate in the ride, Starr said.

"There were representatives from several states and 13 different countries," Starr said. "One guy even rode his bike from San Francisco to Iowa just to participate in RAGBRAI."

FBI seeks arrest of CIA 'spy'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The FBI has charged a former CIA officer who worked in Moscow with plotting to spy for a foreign government and has been seeking his arrest since he fled from his New Mexico home more than a week ago, a spokesman said Wednesday.

FBI spokesman Ed Gooderham said Edward Lee Howard, 33, of Santa Fe, was charged in an arrest warrant issued Monday Sept. 23 in Albuquerque with conspiracy to deliver national defense information to aid a foreign government.

Although the FBI and the warrant did not say which foreign government Howard allegedly spied for, U.S. sources, who would not be named, have said it was the Soviet Union.

One U.S. official has said Howard was probably one of two former CIA officials implicated as Soviet agents by a recent top-level defector from the Soviet KGB, Vitaly Yurchenko.

The CIA is believed to have very few U.S. agents in the Soviet Union, and former CIA directors have said that the agency has difficulty recruiting Soviet citizens as agents. Thus, anyone involved in American spy operations in the Soviet Union would be in a position to pass potentially damaging information to the KGB.

The FBI said Howard worked for the CIA from January 1981 until June 1983. According to State Department records, his last post was the U.S. embassy in Moscow, where he operated under the cover of being a budget analyst for the State Department.

He was also named last Friday in a federal warrant for unlawful flight to avoid prosecution, the FBI said.

Meanwhile, it was learned Wednesday that FBI agents searched his home and car in New Mexico for code pads, microdots and other spy paraphernalia under a warrant seeking evidence of a plot to deliver national defense information to a foreign government.

Architecture students criticize coliseum plan

By LEANNE STOWE
Staff Writer

More than 40 architecture and design students decided Wednesday night to increase public awareness about the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum, starting at tonight's Student Senate meeting.

"I think students need to understand that we are not getting a multipurpose facility, which is what the student money was allotted for, and now it will be primarly for basketball," said Tim Clark, senior in architecture and design.

Students met to hear Robert Jackson, associate professor of architecture and former University planner, speak on the planning of the coliseum. Jackson's speech was sponsored by Castle Crusade, an architecture and design group.

Clark said he would be willing to stand outside Seaton Hall to tell students about the coliseum.

"Students need to let their senators know how they feel about the issue," Clark said. "The administration and senators know what they originally invisioned is not possible and they are afraid to admit it."

Dave Graham, senior in architecture and design, said he thought it was time everyone knew the facts.

"I think the only way we can do it (the coliseum) fair is to make everyone aware of the facts and then encourage them to vote," Graham said.

Jackson told the students he was not against the coliseum, but rather for good planning. He said the University skipped the first six fundamental steps in planning.

"First you need a master plan to do long-range planning," Jackson said. "The University had no master plan with a coliseum in it."

A market study to determine the need and size of the project is the second step, Jackson said. Also skipped was step three, financial feasibility; step four, a site study;

Palestinians identify Israelis' killers

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres said Wednesday that Palestinian guerrillas in Israeli custody had identified the killers of three Israeli vacationers as members of a PLO unit whose headquarters was blasted in a retaliatory strike.

Peres, speaking the day after Israeli warplanes bombed the Palestine Liberation Organization headquarters in the capital of Tunisia, said it was "beyond doubt" that the three men who killed the Israelis aboard a yacht in Cyprus last week belonged to the crack PLO unit Force 17.

Israel said earlier that Tuesday's raid was in retaliation for the Sept. 25 killings in Cyprus. The PLO denied any involvement in the attack, but it had participated in negotiations for the surrender of the three gunmen, who were arrested by Cypriot authorities.

The PLO also said the Israeli air strike had killed at least 45 Palestinians and about 20 Tunisians. Official Tunisian sources said the bodies of 61 Palestinians and 12 Tunisians had been found.

In the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River, Palestinian youths reacted to the Israeli raid by stoning and firebombing Israeli vehicles outside two refugee camps. One Israeli was injured, military sources said.

Israeli soldiers clamped a curfew on a neighborhood in the West Bank town of Kalkilya, north of Tel Aviv, after a firebomb hurled at an Israeli bus smashed a window, the sources said.

Soviet issues Star Wars warning

PARIS — Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev warned Wednesday night of "rough times" ahead if the United States persists in developing the space-based defense system commonly called Star Wars.

He said the Reagan administration plan has wrought a major change in the arms race, which "consists of the fact that an attempt is being undertaken to transfer military rivalry into extra-atmospheric space, as if we lacked it on Earth."

"In the event that the instigators of this enterprise stubbornly continue down the perilous path they have laid, the world must indeed face up to rough times," Gorbachev said at a banquet on the first night of his four-day official visit to France. He spoke in Russian and a French translation was provided.

The trip, seven weeks before his November summit in Geneva with President Reagan, is his first to the West since becoming Kremlin leader in March.

Farm bill doomed, Carlin says

WASHINGTON — Kansas Gov. John Carlin said Wednesday that the farm bill being debated in Congress is doomed to failure because it does not establish a stable, long-range federal agricultural policy.

Carlin, speaking at a Brookings Institution forum, predicted that the agricultural economy will remain depressed until lawmakers abandon their traditional practices of changing farm programs every few years and instead integrate an agricultural strategy into a long-term national blueprint for budget, monetary and trade policies.

His remarks came as debate was under way on the House floor on a 1985 farm bill that continues current farm programs for income and crop price supports, which Carlin said do not recognize the evolution of agriculture from a labor intensive and domestic-oriented industry into one dependent upon export markets and large amounts of capital.

Because of that structural change, Carlin said, the federal government can do more for agriculture by reducing the deficit, lowering interest rates and bringing down the value of the dollar than it can through farm subsidies and efforts to control prices by manipulating commodity supplies.

Toxic chemical spills near highway

JOPLIN, Mo. — A crew worked for about six hours Wednesday to remove 15 to 20 gallons of a substance that spilled at a weight station of Interstate 44 Tuesday night, authorities said.

No injuries or evacuations were reported by authorities. An area of about 200 feet around the spilled material was roped off because of the threat of toxic fumes and fire, the Missouri Highway Patrol said.

A crew from Environmental Specialists Inc. of Kansas City began early Wednesday removing the substance, which had a base of potassium hydroxide. The chemical is a white crystalline salt used in the manufacture of soap, glass and other items.

A tractor-trailer truck was carrying about four dozen 55-gallon drums of four products, including a rust-removing corrosive and an acid with a potassium hydroxide base. The leak occurred about 10:45 p.m. Tuesday.

Sugar discovered in plane's fuel

WASHINGTON — The fuel system used by a plane that crashed with a load of parachutists in Georgia was contaminated with sugar, presenting the appearance of sabotage, federal officials said Wednesday.

The single-engine Cessna 208 Caravan crashed on a private, rural airstrip Sunday near Jenkinsburg, Ga., killing all 16 parachutists and the pilot aboard. Investigators disclosed earlier that the fuel had been contaminated and that the aircraft also may have been overloaded.

Ira Furman, a spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board, said Wednesday night that preliminary analysis of the fuel filter "indicates the presence of sugar," although investigators have not determined how the substance got into the fuel system.

Furman cautioned that investigators have not determined when the sugar found its way into the fuel system and that sugar could have been present for some time, finally working its way into the engine sufficiently to cause engine failure.

Strong earthquake rocks California

SAN BERNARDINO, Calif. — A strong earthquake rattled Southern California on Wednesday, but no damage or injuries were reported, authorities said.

The quake, which struck at 4:44 p.m. and was centered seven miles southeast of San Bernardino, measured 5.0 on the Richter scale, said Dennis Meredith, spokesman for the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena.

Seismologists believe the temblor was associated with the San Jacinto fault zone, a major fault that runs near the San Andreas fault, Meredith said.

The tremor was felt in downtown Los Angeles, about 60 miles west of the epicenter, and in Santa Ana, about 40 miles southwest of the epicenter.

The quake lasted about 15 seconds, she said.

The Richter scale is a measure of ground motion as recorded on seismographs. Every increase of one number means a tenfold increase in magnitude. Thus a reading of 7.5 reflects an earthquake 10 times stronger than one of 6.5.

Colleagues mourn Hudson's death

LOS ANGELES — Rock Hudson, the cinema idol whose gallant admission of a yearlong battle against AIDS won sympathy and attention for victims of the disease, died Wednesday at his home. He was 59.

"Please God, he has not died in vain," his friend and one-time co-star Elizabeth Taylor said in a statement.

Hudson, star of "Giant," a "A Gathering of Eagles" and several frothy comedies with Doris Day on film and "McMillan and Wife" and "Dynasty" on television, "died peacefully in his sleep at 9 o'clock this morning," publicist Dale Olson said.

"Life is eternal, and I know I will see him again," Day said in a statement. "Working with him was unlike working with anyone else. We had a special humor between us and we always laughed and had fun together.

"I'm really going to miss him," she said.

There will be no funeral for Hudson, whose remains were cremated, he said. In lieu of flowers, it was Hudson's wish that donations be made to the American Foundation for AIDS Research, Olson said.

'Kojak' brother dies of leukemia

LOS ANGELES — George Savalas, who played the mop-topped Detective Stavros on the "Kojak" television show that starred his brother Telly Savalas, died Wednesday of leukemia at 58.

Savalas, who died at the UCLA Medical Center in Westwood, was a former drama teacher who made his television debut on "The Dick Powell Show."

He had guest starring roles on numerous series, including "The Virginian," "The Man from Uncle," "Mannix" and "All in the Family."

Starring with his more famous brother in CBS' "Kojak" from 1973-78, Savalas played Stavros, a heavyset detective with an unruly mop of curly hair. During his first two years on the show, he was billed in the credits not as George Savalas but as Demosthenes.

Telly Savalas played the title role as the bald Lt. Theo Kojak, a tough, cynical and humorous detective. Both returned to reprise their roles in a television movie last season.

Asbestos disposal a recurring problem

Insulation left uncovered 3 years ago

By The Collegian Staff

Problems associated with the disposal of harmful asbestos is not a new subject to University officials.

In October 1982, bags containing insulation taken from the University's underground supply tunnels were left partially uncovered at the Riley County Sanitary Landfill three miles south of Manhattan.

The asbestos waste was removed from the University and transported to the landfill by D & D Services Inc. of Lenexa.

According to Title 40 of the Federal Code of Regulations-61.25, asbestos waste must be covered "at the end of each operating day or at least once every 24-hour period."

As long as the site is in continuous operation, waste containing asbestos material must be covered with at least six inches of compacted material which does not contain asbestos.

A report revealing the partially uncovered insulation was filed by an environmental engineer from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment in October 1982, said Chuck Linn, chief of the Engineering and Sanitation Section of the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

After the filing of the report, Joe Cronin, the engineer who visited the landfill, sent a letter to Dan Harden, director of the Riley County Public Works Department, asking that the asbestos insulation be covered. In November 1982, Harden sent a reply to the Department of Health and Environment assuring them the problem would not recur at the landfill.

In December 1982, Cronin again discovered uncovered bags of asbestos at the site, but records showed that asbestos had been delivered on the same day.

In order to resolve the problems created by the asbestos waste, the landfill foreman required the waste to be buried immediately upon arrival. The previous failure to bury the asbestos waste was due to an "oversight," said Duane Higgins, landfill foreman.

The removal of the asbestos insulation, which was wrapped around the underground pipes supplying campus buildings with heat, was not because of health hazards, but because the 20-year-old insulation was not energy efficient, Vincent Cool, University associate director of planning, said at the time.

AIDS victim ignores health official's order to refrain from sex

By The Associated Press

HOUSTON — An AIDS victim who ignored the city health director's order to abstain from having sexual relations admitted himself to a hospital Wednesday, police said.

Fabian Bridges, 30, had boasted he would continue having sex with strangers, even though he knows he carries the deadly acquired immune deficiency syndrome, said Capt. Jack Fulbright of the Houston police vice division.

Bridges met with Houston gay political activist Ray Hill on Wednesday before admitting himself to Ben Taub Hospital to receive treatment for AIDS, police said.

"We've got a man who's definitely a threat to society," Fulbright had said before Bridges checked into the hospital.

Four undercover officers had been assigned to follow Bridges. Prosecutors said officers could not arrest Bridges unless he solicited sexual favors from them or they actually saw him having sex.

"Without eyewitness proof, what law has he violated? I have come up with nothing at this juncture," said Ted Busch, assistant to Harris County District Attorney John B. Holmes.

Dr. James Haughton, the city health director, sent a letter to Bridges on Monday ordering him to "desist from having sexual relations and donating blood."

Violating the order is a third-degree felony, carrying a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $5,000 fine.

Fulbright said the case was "a real tough one" for his officers. "It would be a real moral and ethical dilemma for them to watch someone get in a car with him and just stand by and watch, knowing what he has."

Haughton said he learned from an Ohio reporter that Bridges was in Houston.

Ohio health officials searched for Bridges last month after being told by a Minneapolis television crew that he had AIDS and had had sex with as many as eight people in Cleveland.

Bridges was arrested Aug. 23 on a disorderly conduct charge, but later was released, Ohio officials said.

He also was arrested Aug. 14 in Indianapolis following the theft of a bicyle, authorities said. After authorities discovered he had AIDS, he was given a one-way ticket to Cleveland, where he has relatives, officials said.

Oil firm requests more Hugoton wells

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The primary reason Mesa Petroleum Co. wants to drill more wells in the vast Hugoton field in southwest Kansas is so it can charge more for the natural gas it recovers, maverick oilman T. Boone Pickens said Wednesday.

Pickens, Mesa president and board chairman, said his company wants to take advantage of Natural Gas Policy Act regulations that allow companies to charge higher unregulated prices for gas from new wells.

"The federal government is giving you a chance to upgrade the value of the Kansas natural resources, which you did not have before," he said.

Since July, the Kansas Corporation Commission has been having hearings on changing the spacing of wells in the Hugoton field from the current one well per 640-acre unit to two wells per unit.

State conservation statutes require the companies proposing the new wells, including Mesa, to show the field can't be effectively and efficiently drained without additional wells. Proponents claim as much as 8 trillion cubic feet of gas that can't be reached by existing wells would be recovered by infill wells.

Opponents of infill drilling, including several utilities and pipeline companies, claim existing wells eventually will drain the gas in the field. They claim the move is a ruse to raise natural gas prices.

Current Hugoton prices average about 50 cents per thousand cubic feet, according to KCC figures. Infill opponents say infill well gas could sell for as much as $3 per thousand cubic feet.

J.D. Steelman of Tulsa, an attorney for infill opponent Northwest Central Pipeline Co., said it sounded like Pickens was acknowledging price as the primary motivation for Mesa's support of infill drilling.

"It's certainly consistent with what we've been saying is behind it," he said.

Tom Taylor, spokesman for infill opponent KPL Gas Service Co., said Pickens' statement is proof of "a scheme by the producers to get a higher price for exactly the same gas."

"That simply confirms what our argument has been all along," Taylor said.

Brian Moline, KCC general counsel, said the testimony and arguments before the commission have concerned whether the field is being effectively and efficiently drained by existing wells. But he said the proponents wouldn't have filed the application for infill unless they were planning on getting the price reclassification.

"He's above the mechanics," Moline said. "He just flat tells it like it is, or at least like he sees it."

Pickens, who was in Wichita for a speech at Wichita State University and other appearances, said infill drilling would be a $110 million a year economic boon to Kansas because of increased drilling activity and more sales and severance tax collections.

Judge's order halts sale of rare U.S. gold coins

By The Associated Press

JACKSON, Tenn. — City workers who snatched up thousands of dollars worth of gold coins unearthed in a downtown parking lot were ordered Wednesday to quit selling the treasure until a judge can figure out who owns it.

The rare U.S. gold pieces, more than 170 of them with face values of $2½, $5, $10 and $20, may be worth up to $3,000 each, Mayor Robert Conger said, and one coin reportedly has sold for more than $4,000.

Judge Joe Morris of Chancery Court issued a temporary order blocking further sale of the coins after the city filed suit saying many of them already have changed hands several times.

The city, trying to claim the treasure, has asked Morris to determine the legal owner of the coins, found three weeks ago by a work crew resurfacing a city-owned parking lot.

The coins, many of them in mint condition, are from the 1800s, and Conger said they may have been buried during the Civil War to save them from Union soldiers occupying Jackson, a town of about 50,000 residents in west central Tennessee.

Members of the 10-man work crew that found the coins scooped them up

'Knowing the turf' important in selection

CATHERINE SAYLER
Collegian Columnist

The faculty express "grave concern." The students are "appalled and dismayed." And, even more unusual, the senates of the respective bodies are about to say so publicly.

In an August letter, Stan Koplick, executive director of the Board of Regents, outlined a committee consisting of three alumni, three students, three faculty and one administrator to select the final three candidates for the next president of K-State.

At the September 20 regents' meeting, however, in a process lasting only a few minutes, the regents doubled the alumni representation without explanation and then routinely approved the committee.

Faculty and student response to the surprise imbalance has been swift and overwhelming protest.

Faculty Senate met Tuesday, one week earlier than its scheduled meeting, in order to address the issue. The resulting resolution, which expressed grave concern and asked for equal representation by adding three faculty and three student represenatatives, passed unanimously.

For faculty, who are known for their range of opinions as well as knowledge, to agree on any single issue is almost unheard of. Unanimous support by such a diverse group lends considerable credit to the contention that the regents, no matter how well-intentioned, were wrong in appointing additional public-spirited alumni on the committee without appointing additional faculty and students.

Student Senate, as well, responded quickly to the imbalance. Tonight senate will debate and vote on a resolution asking for equal representation. The student resolution may pass unanimously as well.

It seems obvious to all on campus that the regents' actions are, at best, ill-reasoned.

The quick action in the September regents meeting has led some to speculate that an open meetings law had been violated. The regents seemed to be aware of the change in alumni representation and treated the change so matter-of-factly that they did not even discuss it. Some wonder if the regents had prior private discussions.

The imbalance in representation has also left some questioning the regents' motives. Perhaps the regents already have a particular candidate in mind and have "stacked" the committee by appointing six business-oriented alumni and the Dean of the College of Business to a committee of 12. Or, an even worse scenario, the regents may have bowed to political pressures in Kansas and have allowed the future of higher education at K-State to become a political football.

More likely, though, the regents are not meeting secretly, manipulating or allowing the committee to be manipulated. More likely, the regents just didn't think about the impression their action would leave nor about the ramifications of such actions.

Faculty and students acknowledge the generous contribution the six alumni are willing to make to shape the future of K-State. The alumni, although capable and distinguished in certain areas, lack one qualification necessary to choose a president, that of "knowing the turf."

The alumni haven't the connections that faculty, by virtue of their interaction with faculty at other universities, have. When evaluating a presidential candidate, the faculty have the unique ability to question colleagues at other universities who might have worked closely with the candidate.

Iowa State, which is searching for a new university president, has weighted that particular ability of the faculty quite highly by placing 17 faculty on a committee of 21.

The chosen K-State alumni, on the other hand, have a better concept of the "real world" political and financial pressures a university president must withstand, by virtue of their business experiences.

The alumni and faculty, if given equal representation, would make the best check and balance system possible.

Student representation is equally important, since only a student of the '80s can give the perspective of the needs and concerns of young adults.

Just as much as the presidential candidate makes an impression on the committee, the committee makes an impression on the candidate. A committee composed of six alumni and only three faculty members may make the best qualified candidate, who likely has other options, leery of K-State. The impression a candidate may form from such a committee is that the regents believe the alumni to be more important than the faculty or students.

Both the Faculty and Student Senate resolutions are clear — equal representation is a must to ensure proper checks and balances that will preserve the interests of all K-Staters.

Let's hope the regents will listen to those who comprise the educational system they govern.

Indians deserve assistance

As the American standard of living becomes more and more comfortable, some members of society are living far worse than ever before — namely, the American Indians.

Within the past two months, nine Indians living on the Wind River reservation in central Wyoming have hanged themselves. Since January, at least 48 suicide attempts have been reported, compared to less than 30 in 1984.

Why?

Many of the suicides were committed by teen-agers and young adults — peers of K-State students. Young Indians may aspire to attend college, but the education they receive on the reservation combined with poverty, places a college education beyond their grasp.

Unemployment among the 6,000 Indians living on the Wind River reservation is nearly 80 percent. Teen-agers cannot find jobs and recreational facilities are nonexistent. Indian youth find alcoholism and drug abuse their only alternative to facing boredom and the prospect of a dismal future.

Studies show 51 percent of the students on the Wind River reservation have "a drinking problem" and 47 percent have tried drugs. At least four of the suicides were committed under the influence of alcohol.

The problems faced by the American Indian are not new, but they are growing. Living in an oppressed and displaced culture has created psychological problems for the youth who are trying to survive in a society which has never taught them how to cope — and doesn't want to teach them.

Counseling efforts have proved to be ineffective, mostly because of the inefficiency with which counseling is conducted. Counseling is further undermined by the attitude of respect with which the youth view their peers who committed suicide. They consider suicide a courageous act and see it as an escape rather than an end.

Unfortunately, this is not a solitary problem. Tribes throughout the nation are also fighting to make a living off of the limited resources available on the land assigned to them by the federal government.

For example, the Chippewa Indians in northern Wisconsin are fighting to maintain unrestricted hunting rights. Hunting is not a sport to these Indians — it is a means of feeding their families. Sport hunters are concerned the Chippewas will deplete the deer population, ignoring the fact that last year Indians only bagged 700 deer, compared to the 250,000 killed by other hunters.

If the government does not want to give aid to American Indians, then the government must not impose restrictions on the few resources the Indians have. It is past time to provide adequate help to the Indian culture, before it dies and leaves a gaping hole in the composite culture of the United States.

E.B. White leaves legacy

E.B. White, noted for his witty, well-crafted essays, poems, children's books and satire, died Tuesday at the age of 86.

Six decades of readers should grieve the loss of a man "who had much to say and not much time to say it," but we should also rejoice in White's wry optimism and keen ability to recognize the unnecessary.

As one of America's great wordsmiths White contributed to The New Yorker, Atlantic Monthly and Harper's Magazine, but also wrote "One Man's Meat," "The Points of My Compass" and "Charlotte's Web." White successfully attracted children and elderly readers because his writing was precise and honest.

Much of what White believed essential to writing is contained in the revised edition of William Strunk's "The Elements of Style," a writing guide dedicated to the elimination of verbosity.

White knew his last garment would be made without pockets. In "Letters of E.B. White" he writes: "A man who publishes his letters becomes a nudist — nothing shields him from the world's gaze except his bare skin. A writer, writing away, can always fix things up to make himself more presentable, but a man who has written a letter is stuck with it for all time."

We should be grateful White bared his soul and that his message will be with us for all time.

Realistic solutions necessary to help U.S. farmers

Editor,

Gov. Richard Lamm of Colorado has put his foot in his mouth again. This time it is his comment on AIDS victims, "Either you're dying or you're dead." Although this statement is a bit harsh, the truth does hurt sometimes.

When I read the statement, I thought, "Oh no, he's building up to a 'Live AIDS' concert proposal." He wasn't. His point was that death and dying must be accepted. Prolonging the agony doesn't make it any easier.

Maybe "dead or dying" is a little bit harsh for the condition of the American farmer. But listening to the interviews, that is the impression you might get. Just a few years ago (1983) the Payment in Kind (PIK) program gave the farmers 23 bushels of wheat an acre of dryland and 33 bushels an acre of irrigated land NOT to grow anything. It is amazing that even while being paid NOT to produce in 1983 (in order to reduce a huge grain surplus), the United States still provided 1.3 bushels of wheat for every person on earth.

Then in 1984 we planted every acre possible to wheat to replenish that "valuable" surplus. Now I really wonder why wheat prices dipped to about $2.50 per bushel this past summer. It looks as if the era of the "wheat farmer" is indeed "dead or dying." I hope that the proceeds of FarmAid go to develop alternative crops (soybeans, sunflowers, etc.) and not to produce more "valuable" wheat.

"We Are the World" really did catch the theme. Ethiopia is very overpopulated and undernourished. But where is Ethiopia to go from here? Maybe we should adopt sanctions against their government for economic reform. It was interesting to find out that 8 million Ethiopians are affected by this disaster, while another 34 million are living relatively normal lives.

"We Are the Coliseum" is also a very good example of "dead or dying." Both the song and the student referendum last semester showed an overall lack of student support. When the building estimates came in way over budget, the coliseum seemed to be dying. But by some miracle of modern bureaucracy it too, has been saved.

I'm not saying songs and concerts for "causes" are wrong. I'd just like to see some realistic answers to the problems, not wasted money to feed our Liberal American Egos. I really hope that if there is a "Live AIDS" concert, they have it in San Francisco.

Residence halls help with march

Editor,

Many thanks to the KSU Association of Residence Halls for co-sponsoring the Spirit March preceding the Homecoming Bonfire tonight. Students in residence halls represent a significant influence on K-State, and Blue Key Honor Society wishes to thank the leaders of the halls who have positively responded in adding to this year's Homecoming by encouraging residence hall student participation.

The Spirit March is one of this year's Homecoming features because it allows everyone to have fun while getting involved. Two of the strengths of this year's Homecoming, the march and bonfire, allow on- and off-campus students, faculty and Manhattan residents to participate as individuals. The Spirit March will sweep through campus along a path that easily allows students in residence halls to join in and become a part of Homecoming.

So tonight, be unique by taking a positive step forward in the Spirit March, celebrating over 120 years of tradition at K-State. The first Pre-Bonfire Spirit March will begin at 9 p.m. in the the parking lot between Durland Hall and Ackert Hall. Everyone come meet the pep band for a march through campus to the Memorial Stadium, where the Homecoming Bonfire will begin at 10 p.m. See you there!

Team lacks taste

Editor,

On Saturday, Sept. 7, after the football game, I went to the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex to see what there was to see. In reading the list of intramural team names I was stunned to see ROTC "Nazis."

Now perhaps I misread and, if so, apologize for wasting your time. If not, please check if perhaps a center employee played an impractical joke or if our budding officer corps has taken leave of its senses.

I am a proud veteran who finds this black humor out of taste in our leaders of tomorrow.

Asbestos origin, location mysterious

By JERI HEIDRICK
Campus Editor

Two unsolved mysteries surround the University asbestos controversy — the origin of a piece of asbestos found in a temporary dump site near Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center on Monday and the location of an asbestos-wrapped steam pipe.

The piece of asbestos appeared at the temporary dump site 100 yards from Hoeflin Stonehouse Child Care Center Monday, said John Lambert, director of campus safety.

Lambert and Jack Watson, general superintendent of shops for University Facilities, inspected the site Monday morning and found a piece of asbestos which looked similar to a wet piece of cardboard.

"It looked as if it (the piece of asbestos) was set up for a picture," Watson said. "I don't believe any of our people (University Facilities) would set up the asbestos."

Manhattan Mercury photographer Mike Dorcey said the asbestos was at the temporary site when he shot the pictures Thursday. Dorcey said he went to the dump site as a photographer and not to put the asbestos at the site.

The asbestos was propped on some concrete blocks, Watson said. He also said the asbestos found at the site did not appear to be from University pipes.

Watson said he and a security officer checked the dump site Saturday and found no asbestos at the site.

Lambert said he couldn't say whether the asbestos was planted.

"All I can say is that the asbestos wasn't seen before. The site is open to anyone though, so anyone could have put it there. It is in my office now," Lambert said.

University officials are also unclear as to the location of a 12-foot section of ruptured pipe which was removed from the basement of Waters Hall in late August.

Environmental Protection Agency officials have yet to locate the pipe, Watson said.

"We do not know where the pipe is," Watson said. "I was told that a salvage yard truck with no name (on the truck) picked up the pipe and other pieces of iron from the iron pile. The EPA man checked with Wamego Salvage and he could not find the pipe."

David Phillippi, information officer with the EPA in Kansas City, Kan., said he could not comment about the investigation but he did say he could not find the pipe at Wamego Salvage. Phillippi would not say how many salvage sites the EPA is checking for the pipe.

"The workers put the pipe on the top of the iron pile after they cleaned up the iron and that is the last that was seen of the pipe," Watson said.

The asbestos-wrapped pipe was taken from Waters Hall by a fork lift and transported to a iron-scrap pile located between Weber Hall and the Wind Erosion Laboratory in late August.

EPA officials began investigation into the matter after Mark Innes, a University construction laborer, filed charges that the University was mishandling asbestos.

Watson said the University deals with no set salvage company when disposing of materials. Laborers dealt with the salvage company and did not record the salvage company's name, Watson said.

The asbestos from a 12-foot pipe is not hazardous, said John Saiger, environmental engineer with the Department of Health and Environment in Topeka.

"If the pipe is just laying around it can't cause any harm," Saiger said. "The problem occurs when fibers are broken and the asbestos is stirred around. There is a very remote possibility that the asbestos on the pipe could be released."

Dorothy Thompson, University attorny, said she has no idea if the University is still responsible for the pipe. The question could come up further down the road but right now there is no way of telling if the University is still responsible, Thompson said.

Capacity to say 'no' lessens procrastination

By BOB SCHEIBLER
Collegian Reporter

Everybody has probably done it at least once in their life — waited until the last minute to begin a big project. When the time comes to have the project done, there is just no time to do it.

Time management skills might be the answer to the problem of procrastination and poor organization, said Cliff Schuette, assistant director of the Counseling Center.

"The skill of time management can help people in all areas of their personal lives. A lot of people use the skills on the job. If you are a student, the skills can also be very useful," Schuette said.

Part of learning the art of time management is learning to say 'no.'

"Saying 'no' is very useful in several situations. If you know that you have reached your limit and are about to get in over your head, then you know that it is time to say no," Schuette said. "You need to decide when you belong to enough student organizations or whether to take another class or not, even if it would be good for you to take it.

"You need to look back at situations in the past where you have gotten into trouble and remember what you did, so that you don't get into things too deep." he said.

Schuette recommends setting goals as a way for people to become better managers of their time.

For example, writing a term paper all at once can seem like a very big task, but if it is broken down into several small parts, completing the paper will be a lot easier.

It is important to set long-term goals, but attainable short-term goals are also very important. Looking through the card catalog for books dealing with term paper subject for 15 minutes is a good start.

Schuette also recommends making a list every evening of things to do the next day.

"Making the list the night before is best because it allows you to know in the morning exactly what you have to do that day," Schuette said. "On the list mark the items that are the most important with an 'A,' the items that are somewhat important with a 'B' and the items of least importance with a 'C'."

Listing is a way of helping students set priorities.

"Time management doesn't have to mean cutting down. In fact, we often find that students who work are better managers of their time. Having a job gives them just enough pressure that they know they have to be better managers," Schuette said.

Engineering to dedicate new computing center

By MARIBETH GOTTSCHALK
Collegian Reporter

The College of Engineering has added another item to its list of ITEMS FOR academic excellence, an advanced computer system. The main components of the Engineering Computing Center are two computers called "Fred and Ethyl."

The initial stages in planning the new computing center began in January and it is currently in the final stages.

The system consists of "Fred and Ethyl," two H-800s computers. The H-800 is a type of computer designed by the Harris Corporation, a multi-division computer financing corporation in Florida.

"The development of this new center (the Engineering Computing Center) is a major step forward in achieving a first class capability for teaching and research in computer-aided engineering," said Ken Gowdy, associate dean of the College of Engineering.

The total cost of the computers, including the software, was close to $800,000, Gowdy said.

"Ethyl" was purchased from Harris last spring for about $225,000, said Steve Coulson, director of the center.

"Fred" was granted to the University by Harris and is worth about $400,000.

The center is not for general computing use outside of the engineering department. The center's mainframe is to assist engineering students in word processing and scientific programs, such as Fortran, a high level computer language used by students or faculty to write programs, Coulson said.

A mini-computer, the VAX11-750, has been in use in the electrical and computer engineering departments and will be moved to the computing center's new location on the first floor of Durland Hall.

Currently, eight terminals are connected to "Fred and Ethyl." Gowdy said the college anticipates that in the next two to three years more than 100 terminals will be connected to the system.

A ribbon cutting for the center will be at 10 a.m. Friday in Durland 156.

step five a traffic study; and step six, a building program.

"Step seven is the funding study, so you know where you can get the money from, and this is what (the University) did first," Jackson said. "We figured out how much we could come up with and then we jumped back to step six and then on."

Tony Rangel, vice president of Castle Crusade and senior in architecture and design, said the administration was not supportive of the Univerisity learning process.

"What we are all learning here is to be professionals," Rangel said. "When the administration doesn't ask professionals for help they show us they don't believe in what we are learning."

Rangel said he planned to inform student senators about the lack of planning for the coliseum, make other students aware of the facts and get other colleges from the campus involved in letting the Board of Regents know how students feel about the coliseum.

Laura Derrick, senior in architecture and design, said there was not enough planning before the coliseum project was pushed through.

"There was not enough study done," Derrick said. "Why should we compete with KU in coliseum size?

Robert Jackson

We should try to compete academically in an effort to include all students and not just those interested in sports. Students don't have enough say in anything."

The coliseum's construction cost is expected to be $14.5 million, but the total cost of the project is projected at $16.1 million. Funding for the coliseum is funded by $7 million from student fees, $7.1 million in private gifts and $2 million from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Sept. 20 the regents approved a plan to cut the coliseum's seating to 13,500 from 16,000.

Local artist exhibits work

Style displays individuality

By ERIC RHODENBAUGH
Collegian Reporter

Painting to Jim Hagan, Manhattan artist, is more than just putting details of a subject on a canvas. It is a learning process that never ends.

Most of Hagan's shows have consisted of putting up some paintings in the former schoolhouse that serves as his studio and running an ad in the paper. The display in the Union National Bank lobby, 727 Poyntz Ave., represents one of his largest showings and will be on display through Oct. 14.

"Art is an obsession, but not 100 percent of the time," he said. Hagan said he looks at things all the time — patterns of light, shades and forms — but not always with the thought of painting them.

"You are a perpetual student in art. You are constantly trying to do better," Hagan said.

Hagan said he is more of an impressionist than a realist, but doesn't fit in completely with either group. "I'm a loner in what I do," he said.

Impressionism examines landscapes or objects by light. Realism displays everything in complete focus with a greater examination of detail.

There aren't strict lines around things in nature, Hagan said. Things are fuzzy, there are shadows, shades and various forms of the same object caused by different degrees and angles of light. Hagan said he tries to capture landscapes in this way.

"I don't paint by numbers, I don't want to paint photographs," Hagan said. "I want to paint so that if you're six feet away you're seeing something interesting, but if you're only inches away you see a blur of color."

Worrying about making money is also something Hagan avoids. His wife Pat, adviser for undergraduate art students, keeps track of the financial part of his work, such as how many paintings he sells and for how much.

Trends don't influence Hagan's work either, he said.

"If you pay attention to what is 'hot' you lose what is you," Hagan said.

While growing up in Chicago, Hagan said he noticed the landscapes he liked to paint were disappearing. "That's why I came to Kansas, there was a lot of landscape here."

Painting in Kansas is not always easy, Hagan said. In the summer it's not only hot and windy, but there are long periods during the day when the light is flat and doesn't highlight the landscape.

Hagan came back to Kansas in 1965. He attended school at K-State and received a master's degree in art in 1968. He had previously attended K-State, receiving a bachelor's degree in radio journalism in 1950.

Teaching art is difficult, Hagan said. "You can teach a certain degree of things, such as how to put this paint here, but you can't teach abstract forms, you can't teach design."

Hagan doesn't like the hype associated with being famous, neither does he ever expect to become world-renowned.

"If it happens, it happens," he said, "but I don't expect any of that because it's not what I do. I'm not a famous artist, I'm just sitting in Manhattan, Kansas doing my thing."

Lit candle causes blaze in Ford Hall

By The Collegian Staff

A small blaze began Wednesday in a Ford Hall residential room after a candle ignited curtains.

The fire in Ford 723 began at 12:30 p.m. and was extinguished by students with a floor fire extinguisher before the fire department arrived at the scene, said Nancy Bocklage, director of the hall.

About $100 worth of damage was done to the room and curtains, Bocklage said.

One of the room's occupants, Gina Hungate, freshman in apparel design, received minor burns on her legs but was not hospitalized.

Timirie Van Dam, freshman in business, the other occupant, was not home at the time of the fire. Both women are still occupying the room, Bocklage said.

Even though the fire was contained, the hall's residents were evacuated for a short time, she said.

Crime Stoppers: Public informants help investigators

By JONIE R. TRUED
Collegian Reporter

Crime may not pay, but Crime Stoppers, a community-based reward program in Manhattan, does.

The Manhattan-Riley County chapter of Crime Stoppers was initiated in October 1982 and has recovered $49,803 in property and resulted in 56 arrests from information provided by Crime Stoppers informants, said Sgt. Steve Cutler of the Riley County Police Department.

Of the 56 arrests, 50 have ended in convictions. The remaining six are pending, he said.

The local organization started after requests from businesses, civic groups and individuals in the Manhattan community, said Mike Kuhn, treasurer for the Manhattan-Riley County Crime Stopper's, Inc. board of directors.

The program has gone exceptionally well, Kuhn said. "It's had a very positive effect because of the solved crimes...crimes that would have never been solved (otherwise)."

The local chapter is part of a national organization initiated in 1976 by Greg MacAleese, an officer in Albuquerque, N.M.

Since its start, the organization has grown from 15 localized programs in 1978 to more than 300 by 1982.

Acting as "an investigative tool," Crime Stoppers has been involved in 4,700 cases resulting in 4,600 prosecutions. The program is now active in 41 states and Canada.

The goal of the reward program, according to organization materials, is to produce tips in difficult cases by encouraging individuals with information to come forward. Individuals who call are given a code number for identification and remain anonymous to reduce fears of retaliation.

The program relies on TV, radio and newspaper support to publicize broadcast and print versions of a featured "Crime of the Week."

Local media carrying Crime Stoppers are the K-State Collegian and The Manhattan Mercury; radio stations KMAN, KMKF, KJCK and KSDB; television stations WIBW and Manhattan Cable Channel 6.

"We've gotten real good support on dramatizations from the high school and University drama departments," Cutler said.

Callers with possible information on the Crime of the Week dramatizations or other crimes may receive a reward from money raised in and by the community.

Based on community donations and funds from local businesses, the local chapter, which is operated through a board of directors under the auspices of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, has paid out $6,740 in rewards for information, Cutler said.

Kuhn said the aim of the program is "directed to the non-involvement spirit. We try to address that (spirit) through confidentiality and anonymity — which the courts have upheld — and rewards."

The program seeks information from three kinds of people, "people in the right place at the right time, thieves who rat on each other and kids who brag about their pranks," Kuhn said. "It depends on the crime as to where the information comes from."

Cutler stressed that the program only publicizes cases in which "the investigator feels they are at dead ends and have no leads. We don't take a case where the investigator knows who it is."

Timing of the dramatization through media channels, Cutler said, "depends on the individual case."

Cutler said Crime Stoppers received a call concerning the Montgomery Ward store crime two days after the dramatization was aired. However, some crimes could be three to four months old before investigators run out of leads, he said.

Staff/Peter Obetz

Josh Kyle, a senior at Manhattan High School and member of the Explorer Scout program, holds a knife to the throat of Cindy Wichman, production editor of Manhattan Cable Channel 6, during the re-enactment of a crime for the television public service announcement of Crime Stoppers.

Cutler said he believes the program affects the incidence of crime even if arrests aren't the immediate result.

Cutler used as an example a series of thefts of purses from church coatrooms during services. After the incidents were featured, people became more conscious about keeping their purses with them and the series of thefts ended, he said.

Similar results occurred when a series of car thefts ceased after Crime Stoppers brought attention to the case, Cutler said.

Kuhn said people are becoming more aware of the program, indicated by an increase in the number of calls received.

Kuhn said the program's success has been totally positive.

"There have been no negative repercussions," he said. "It's been all pluses — no minuses.

"Any time you can slow or reduce crime," Kuhn said, "it's a definite benefit to the city."

An Open Letter to the University Community...

This past week has been an amazing one in the life of the College of Architecture and Design here at Kansas State. We learned that the American Society of Landscape Architects (ASLA) has awarded students from our Department of Landscape Architecture three of six possible national awards for achievement in the field. This is without parallel in any other program in the nation. Our record in winning national awards from the ASLA is twice the number of the next best department in the country. This is a great achievement.

I was also overwhelmed to read in the September issue of Interiors, the premier journal in the field, that our Department of Interior Architecture was selected as one of the very, very best in the nation and that the Department's Head, Jack Durgan, was singled out as one of the leaders in design education in the country. While I am filled with pride, I was not surprised since this Department's students and faculty have consistently been singled out as among the finest nationally and internationally.

In our department of Architecture, students won a large number of awards from the American Institute of Architects and one received the much coveted Fulbright Award for advanced Studies in architecture. Both architecture students and faculty continue to receive international recognition for their achievements in design competitions, for Oz magazine and in many other forums.

Much of the credit for these and other accomplishments extends to our Department of Pre-Design Professions, soon to be renamed the Department of Environmental Design, which has, over the years, provided the consistently strong base of studies and skills from which students continue to grow and mature throughout their years at Kansas State.

The reasons for these achievements and the growing recognition of the College as one of the pre-eminent centers of design education in the nation rests with the dedication, idealism, commitment and hard work of our students, staff and faculty. Our people are, quite simply, unmatched in their creativity, ability, diligence and spirit.

As difficult as a given day may be, all I need to do is to walk into any classroom or studio in Seaton or Seaton Court and I come away refreshed, excited, enthusiastic and full of confirmation for the choice I made years ago to teach.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the College, I applaud you all. I am humbled to be a part of this exceptional community. The entire University and, indeed, the people of the State of Kansas, can take great pride in you. You're terrific!

Candidates relate impressions of campus representation

Ambassador voting continues from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. today and Friday on the Union first floor.

Students, who will vote for one female ambassador and one male ambassador, must present their University identification cards to vote. Ambassador voting began Wednesday.

Ambassadors travel throughout the state to promote the University's goals and programs, mainly through speaking engagements.

The ambassador results will be announced Saturday during the K-State-University of Oklahoma football game.

The ambassador program is sponsored by Blue Key, a senior honorary society.

Rise Frank

A spirit for K-State is not something you pick up at enrollment or buy at the bookstore; it's a feeling that comes from inside yourself when you experience the enthusiasm and pride of being a Wildcat.

K-State is an assortment of different cultures, traditions, mores, values and ethics all working together for the fulfillment of a common goal — higher education. Because the student body, the faculty and the curriculum are so diversified, we have the opportunity to grow and to be exposed to many new experiences.

So many of us get caught up in our daily routines and studies that we forget to open our eyes and see the wonderful things K-State has to offer around us. More students need to be made aware of the clubs and organizations, the academics and athletics, the culture and creativity of K-State.

The ambassador's role is to emphasize to prospective students these strong points. An ambassador has to be someone who believes in what the university has to offer.

I will never regret the decision to come to K-State because I know I have grown in the experiences it has offered me. I would like to share these experiences with others.

Vicki Lavezzi

K-State is one of America's best kept secrets. The opportunities at K-State are unlimited, and yet to some, it remains a mere state school. Why?

I believe that K-Staters don't brag enough about their University. We have eight nationally acclaimed colleges, staffed with excellent faculty members for a bargain price. As an ambassador, working with prospective students, I feel that I would present a positive, dynamic image of K-State.

During my past two years at K-State, I've grown to love this University — the beautiful campus, diverse students and the overwhelmingly friendly atmosphere.

Through my experience with various groups, faculty members and students, my attitude changed dramatically. The people, with their dedication, hard work and pride, make K-State unique. I have a lot of enthusiasm for all aspects of collegiate life and a great deal of pride in this University.

The challenge of representing my University as an ambassador is a very exciting prospect. As an ambassador, I would demonstrate my enthusiasm and pride for K-State and share the unlimited opportunities available here with alumni and prospective students.

Lori Schellenberger

K-State is at a crossroads. There is a need for change, and the K-State community has taken on that challenge. From the restoration of our athletic program to the selection of a new University president, we are making the necessary changes to create a new sense of optimism.

There are three groups of people who play a very important role here at K-State: alumni, students and prospective students. The success of K-State depends largely on how well these three groups communicate and work together.

Alumni are the backbone of the University. Important not only financially, alumni also recruit new students and support the activities and various programs at K-State. Students are important because they are the University today, while prospective students are the future.

As an ambassador, I feel I could bring these three important elements together for the good of the University. I will represent the ideas and viewpoints of students and communicate these to alumni and prospective students.

The future of K-State depends on a genuine understanding of the changes taking place, and students' attitudes toward these changes. I sincerely feel I could represent these attitudes.

Terry Hallauer

K-State is more than just a college, to many of its students it is a home away from home.

I remember the many fears I had about K-State as a freshman, as well as the feelings of uncertainty and insecurity. Yet, what I discovered was the greatest student body around.

I found an enthusiastic, friendly atmosphere naturally derived from a diversity of students. This enthusiastic attitude is what I will represent.

At K-State, opportunities are open to all students to grow and learn on both an educational and personal level. By becoming more involved in activities, I began to meet more people, develop leadership and time management skills and I began to evaluate my personal qualities and goals more closely. That's when my education really began.

As an ambassador, I will strive to represent the potential for personal and academic growth that K-State provides.

My experiences at K-State have helped me to develop a positive attitude and positive enthusiasm toward K-State and what it has to offer students. I am sure and love the opportunity to instill this enthusiasm in potential students and alumni.

Randy Regehr

I am sure that most of us remember our first days at K-State. I recall my feelings quite vividly. I remember my uneasiness about not fitting in or not liking the college lifestyle.

Yet, as time went on, I became involved in various interests outside the classroom. As a result, I met many fellow students and formed lasting friendships. I began to feel more like a part of the University community.

One of the objectives of the educational program here at K-State is to "provide all students with an opportunity to gain the knowledge and abilities members of a democratic society need."

As a K-State ambassador, I would be quick to point out K-State's outstanding academic record. As students, we are fortunate to be able to attend an institution that has a fine national and international reputation.

Yet, important as academic strength is, the true success of a university depends on people.

As an ambassador, I enthusiastically would share with alumni, parents and prospective students the quality of life at K-State. In the end, I hope that I would have been able to convey a message about K-State that was more than facts and figures.

Jeff Suttle

We've got something here.

You can't see it or touch it, but it's here.

It's more or less a feeling, "The K-State Feeling."

We've been pleased with facilities, programs, activities and the kind of people that make it all worthwhile. K-State is an exciting place to be.

After living in both a residence hall and a fraternity, I've come to the conclusion that KSU is one of the friendliest places in the world.

It's true that we have our problems, but the success of our University lies not in remaining problem-free, but in solving our difficulties efficiently and effectively. I feel the ambassador program can be a driving force in many crucial areas of the University, especially in treating one of our current problems: declining enrollment.

The best way to fight enrollment decreases and to aid in student retention is one-on-one contact. We've got to get out and tell people about K-State.

I applied for ambassador because I want to be that positive voice, a direct link to all K-Staters — past, present and future. To me, that link is vital, because I think "The K-State Feeling" is something worth sharing.

Freeze damages milo crops

By RUSTIN HAMILTON
Agriculture Editor

Northwestern Kansas was the victim of freezing temperatures Monday and up to 90 percent of the milo crop in that part of the state was damaged, said Merrel Mikesell, extension specialist for the crops and soils service of northwestern Kansas.

Temperatures in the teens were reported in Goodland, causing damage to most of the 318,000 acres of milo in the area.

Milo, also called grain sorghum, is the state's second largest crop and was the most vulnerable to the freeze because it is still maturing, Mikesell said.

"It just shut off the milo and froze the leaves," he said.

Other crops, such as corn, were more mature and not harmed by the cold temperatures, nor was wheat which has not been planted yet in most areas of the state, said Moe Johnson, state statistician for the Kansas Crop and Livestock Reporting Service in Topeka.

Milo yields in northwest Kansas were maturing later this year because of the cool, wet weather which caused slow development in July and August, Mikesell said.

"Generally speaking, milo is normally ready by mid-September on the average year," Mikesell said. "Cold weather this early has occurred for the last several years, but back then the crop was matured and went unharmed.

"Milo is a more tropical plant and needs some heat," Mikesell explained. "The milo just sat there last summer and we lost part of the growing season."

A 306.6 million bushel state-wide yield was expected by Kansas farmers this year — an increase of 29 percent over last year — according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

"It's almost impossible to determine the amount of damage done financially," Mikesell said. "We just know that this will definitely have an impact on the farmers who raise milo and this year's yields."

Senate to vote on Search equality

By MARY ROEHL
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will vote on a resolution calling for equal representation on the Presidential Search Committee at its weekly meeting today in the Union Big Eight room.

The resolution calls for the Board of Regents to correct the imbalance caused by the unanticipated addition of three alumni members to the committee. The resolution is sponsored by Steve Brown, student body president and junior in pre-veterinary medicine, and Mark Jones, senate chairman and senior in management.

Senate will also vote on committee appointments for the Student Bond Refinancing Ad Hoc Committee.

The ad hoc committee will review proposals for the use of the $700,000 that has become available through refinancing of the current debt. The committee will make its recommendations to senate by Oct. 24.

The proposed student senator appointments are Daniel Grubb, graduate in mathematics; Bruce Ney, senior in agricultural journalism; Chris Steineger, senior in political science; Tona Turner, junior in journalism and mass communications; and Jeff Vander Laan, senior in electrical engineering.

The student-at-large appointments are Mark Fischer, senior in business administration; Nancy McDonald, senior in business administration; and Dan Schierling, senior in marketing. Jones will serve on the committee as an ex-officio member and Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for educational and student services, will be a non-voting member.

Senate will also vote on an amendment to the Student Governing Association bylaws. The amendment adds to the original bylaws the statement that if a student senator is elected to the position of senate chairman the college left without representation will appoint a new representative. The amendment is sponsored by the Student Senate Operations Committee.

Senate will also vote on the Closing Accounts bill sponsored by Senate Finance Committee. The bill calls for the approval of appeals from campus organizations to keep any money left in a group's account from fiscal year 1984-85.

'Falcon' focuses on secrecy; Hutton, Penn play opposites

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

In "The Falcon and the Snowman," director John Schlesinger focuses upon preposterous conditions that allowed 21-year-old Christopher Boyce (Timothy Hutton) to sell top secret information to the Russians.

Film Review

It isn't a movie about what pushed Boyce to become traitor. Instead, it is a movie about the secret meetings with the Russians and the holes in U.S. security. On those terms the movie excels, especially when it focuses upon Boyce's courier, Daulton Lee (Sean Penn).

Penn steals practically every scene he's in. He has a pencil-thin mustache that looks etched on. Any minute it might just smear. Penn's Daulton looks surprisingly like Robert DeNiro's Rupert Pupkin in "The King of Comedy." Both men have crass bravado that they flaunt under paper-thin sincerity.

Boyce and Daulton were once fellow altar boys. Since then they've both gone separate ways. Daulton has become a drug dealer. He gets arrested, jumps bond and heads for Mexico. He's a fast-talking con man, none too bright, who only sees as far as his next deal.

Boyce, on the other hand, studied to be a priest. For reasons left mysterious, he gives up his studies and through his father's connections (his father is ex-FBI), he gets a job decoding top secret information at an electronics plant — a plant that receives CIA satellite transmissions. He's an idealistic young man, confused by Watergate, American involvement in Chile and the war in Vietnam. He is angry at his father and confuses this anger with his own disillusionment.

Then, on a whim, or so he says, he sends Daulton as his courier to the Mexican embassy in Mexico.

"The Falcon and the Snowman" gets through the spy scenes with an incredible eye for detail, but the most important scenes are the ones the moviemakers never bothered to develop.

Boyce ended up as a real enigma while the movie needed to provide some real insight. Hutton confuses the matter further by playing Boyce as such an upright young man that it's difficult to not start rooting for him.

But Sean Penn as Daulton Lee is a marvel to watch. It's amazing how he can look so different in every movie he's in. And whenever he's on screen — whether he's haggling with the Russians over how much money the information is worth, or whether he's standing before his parents, stoned out of his mind, insisting he doesn't do drugs anymore — "The Falcon and the Snowman" becomes energized.

Noble develops way to locate 'sweet spot'

By TONY CARBAJO
Collegian Reporter

If batting averages on the softball diamond start rising in the next few years, you might be able to thank K-State professor Larry Noble.

Noble, a professor of physical education, became interested in the mechanics of hitting after spending more than 12 years playing in Class A slow pitch softball leagues. He participated in over 100 games a year and his teams continually finished in the top 20 in the nation.

Because he is a very good hitter, many of Noble's teammates came to him for advice on how they could improve their swing and hit the ball better. It was then that he began to do research on softball and baseball hitting.

Noble found that the sweet spot on a softball bat — the area where the ball feels best and travels farthest — differed on every bat, varying by manufacturer and method of construction. He also discovered that the sweet spot was not a designed feature in bats.

With the help of John Eck, a former University professor of physics now at the University of Toledo (Ohio), Noble came up with a calculation to find the sweet spot on every bat.

When a batter grips the bat, Noble marks the area on the handle where the knuckle of the forefinger on the top hand touches. It is from that point Noble uses his mathematical equation to find that particular batter's sweet spot.

"The size of the sweet spot is a direct linear function of the distance it is from the size of your hands," Noble said.

After discovering how to find the sweet spot on every bat, Noble set out to look at the theoretical mechanics of increasing the size of the sweet spot. He wanted to be able to move it to each batter's specifications.

So Noble, with the aid of a grant by the KSU Research Foundation, took an aluminum bat and clamped a lead weight at varying lengths and put it on an oscilliscope. He discovered that by moving the weight up or down the handle and hitting balls he could also move the sweet spot up or down the barrel. This was the first time it was discovered that you could move the sweet spot on a bat.

He said this was contrary to common thinking, including his own. He said to implement his discovery a manufacturer would only need to affix a lead weight inside the handle at the proper point and you would then have moved the sweet spot.

Noble said the sweet spot is an area where you are going to lose less than 10 percent of the impact force when hitting a softball. He calls this area towards the end of the bat the "power zone."

"You want to move the power zone as far away from the handle as possible," Noble said. "This gives you the maximum distance and control on the ball."

Thanks to his grant, Noble has a patent pending on his discovery — "optimizing the power zone" — that he said cost in excess of $10,000. Noble said the amount may be high but "that is what it takes to successfully and thoroughly protect your ideas in the system."

Noble has contacted two leading bat manufacturers with active research and development firms about implementing his findings. He is still waiting for a response from them, but he said it may take a little while.

"They wouldn't be the leading bat makers if they jumped at every idea that passed their way," he said. "I'm sure they will study it a long while before calling me."

If they balk at the idea, Noble said he will market the bats himself, although he said that would be more costly and would put added risk on him. The royalties, if any, will be shared with the Research Foundation.

Deon Botha, a native of South Africa, steps into the No. 1 position on the men's tennis team this fall after transferring from Lamar University in Texas.

South African steps in as No. 1 player

Citizenship hinders Botha's progress

By TOM PERRIN
Staff Writer

South African tennis player Deon Botha came along just when K-State Coach Steve Bietau needed him.

At the conclusion of the 1985 spring season, Bietau, the coach for both the men's and women's tennis teams, was set to begin recruiting a player who could step in and compete for the No. 1 position on the men's team for the fall season.

Following a successful recruiting trip to the women's National Junior College Tennis Tournament in Florida that brought the signing of No. 1 player Lena Svensson, Bietau was ready to return to Florida for the men's side of the tournament in an attempt to recruit another No. 1 calibre player.

Then came the phone call in May from Botha's former coach at Lamar University in Beaumont, Texas. Lamar had experienced a hike in out-of-state tuition rates. Botha's scholarship would not be available for the coming season and he was looking for a new school.

"(Botha) was looking for a place to play and heard our program was on the way up," Bietau said. "At the time, I was looking for a player who could play at No. 1."

With the help of his coach at Lamar, Botha was put in contact with Bietau, who said Botha came to K-State "pretty highly recommended." After also considering offers from Temple University and the University of Maryland, Botha made a decision to attend K-State.

Botha signed a letter of intent in May, giving Bietau the player he was looking for.

"He's a very complete player who does everything on the court fairly well," Bietau said. "He's just a solid all-around player with no great weakness."

While Kansas is unfamiliar territory for Botha, a native of Benoni, South Africa, he has enjoyed K-State so far.

"I think the people are very friendly," Botha said.

Botha said playing tennis in Kansas is different in many ways from playing tennis in South Africa. Botha has never had to deal with the type of weather conditions Kansas is known for, such as wind and cold temperatures.

"The coldest I'm used to is 65 (degrees farenheit)," Botha said. "65 is a cold day in South Africa."

Botha defeated last year's top two K-State players, Scott Chandler and Kris James, to earn the No. 1 spot for the fall season. Botha said the competition with Chandler and James has improved his game. James is Botha's doubles partner and the duo is 1-0 so far this season.

"They really are good competition. For me to play No. 1, I have to work hard," said Botha, who is 1-2 in singles play this fall. "Especially (against) Scott. He's a good competitor."

Botha said Bietau has helped him make changes in his style of play that will improve his overall game.

"Coach Bietau has helped me develop a more aggressive game, to serve and volley more," Botha said.

Practices at K-State, Botha said, have been tough so far, but also worthwhile. Especially tough has been the team weight program, which is executed on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

"I think weights are a good thing," Botha said. "Weights make me stronger. All of the good players have done or are doing weights."

While Botha says he also enjoys doubles, he prefers singles tennis.

"Doubles is the type of thing where you both depend on each other," Botha said. "If I lose in singles, I have no one to blame but myself. I feel like I can rely more on myself in singles."

Tennis definitely holds a place in his future, he said. While earning a spot in the 1986 NCAA tournament is his most important goal at the present time, he would like to play tennis professionally some day.

In order to play professionally in many countries, Botha knows he will have to renounce his South African citizenship and become an American citizen.

A sizable portion of the world's nations will not allow South African citizens to compete within their boundaries because of South Africa's apartheid system of government.

"I want to live in America and become an American citizen," Botha said. "There's a lot of places I can't go if I'm a South African citizen."

Sports Letter

Coaching not the problem

Sports Editor,

I hope it's evident by this time that K-State is not going to win any more football games without Jim Dickey than it did with him.

The win-at-any-cost philosophy directly counters the values which responsible universities try to instill. It grinds up the bodies and minds of young athletes who have neither time nor energy to try to become anything more. At K-State it does those things, and it's a bad joke besides.

The dream of big bucks from television and major bowl games is exactly that. K-State cannot attract a top-notch football coach, nor can it attract top-notch players except by cheating on a grand scale, unless it's prepared to spend the kind of money the Oklahomas and Nebraskas do. That's neither feasible nor desirable. The legitimate alternatives are to discontinue the program or to face reality and learn to lose with dignity.

On the record, Jim Dickey is a competent coach and an honorable man, fully qualified on both counts to run the kind of program K-State has. K-State disgraced itself this fall, but not by losing a football game to Northern Iowa.

JOE 'KING' CARRASCO:
ONE HOT TAMALE

Give the books a break, and give yourself a treat K-Staters, because one of the wildest, good-time, rock 'n' rollers to hit Manhattan is coming to Mannequins Tuesday, Oct. 8 in the form of Joe "King" Carrasco and the Crowns.

Steve Pond of the Los Angeles Times commented on one of the "King's" recent performances in tinseltown and said, "Carrasco remains a master of party time rock 'n' roll and a delightfully athletic performer. By the time he encored with—what else?—"Wooly Bully" the message was irresistably clear: Hey bud, let's fiesta."

Sworn to sun, dancing, and delayed adolescence, Carrasco's brand of Tex-Mex rock 'n' roll is an energy release of atomic proportions. So, whether he's sailing off table tops and into the men's room in Boston, or blasting out a solo in London that starts on stage and ends in the streets, the "King" keeps the party rolling. Perhaps Carrasco himself says it best, "When you stand still on stage it's folk music, when you move it's rock 'n' roll. We move."

Special guests of the "King" will be the Bon-Ton soul accordian band. Tickets are available at Mannequins, $4.00 in advance, $5.00 day of the show. The show starts at 9 p.m. There will be no reserve seating, so come early and stay late!

Brett, Black lead KC to victory over Angels

By DAVID SVOBODA
Assistant Sports Editor

Buddy Black threw a three-hit shutout and George Brett hit a three-run inside-the-park home run in the first inning Wednesday night as the Kansas City Royals once again moved into a tie for the lead in the American League West by downing the California Angels 4-0.

The Angels started the four-game series with a one-game lead on Kansas City, and the Royals pulled even with a 3-1 win in the series opener. California moved back on top with a 4-2 win Tuesday night but saw their lead slip away as Black baffled the Angels, striking out five while walking only two.

Black moved his record to 10-15 on the year in outdueling California's Ron Romanick, who struck out a career-high seven batters in going the distance. The complete game was Black's fifth of the year Black had lost nine of his last 10 decisions.

Royals Manager Dick Howser was open in his praise for Black.

"Everyone was really behind Buddy tonight (Wednesday)," Howser said. "He proved tonight that he's a quality pitcher and one of the better left-handers in the league."

The Royals gave Black all the support he needed in the first inning. Lonnie Smith, the Royals Player-of-the-Month for September, led off the inning with a bloop single to left. Smith stole second on the first pitch to Willie Wilson and was there when Romanick hit Wilson in the left leg with a pitch three pitches later. That set the stage for Brett's dramatics.

Brett hit Romanick's 0-1 pitch toward rightfield as California's Juan Beniquez charged hard in an attempt to make the play. Beniquez, however, was unable to come up with a shoe-top grab and the ball skipped past him and into the corner as Brett circled the bases.

Brett, who was 3-for-4 on the night with a single, a double and the home run, now has 27 homers and 107 runs batted in on the year. The game-winning RBI was his 16th in 1985.

The Royals added an insurance run in the eighth. After Brett flied out to California leftfielder Brian Downing to open the inning, Jorge Orta grounded a single between shortstop and third base to get things going. Frank White's groundout to Bobby Grich at second base moved Orta to second.

The scoring opportunity did not look promising as Romanick had two strikes on the next Royal hitter, Steve Balboni, but Balboni fought off a Romanick delivery and punched it to leftfield where Downing appeared to lose the ball in the lights before fielding it on one hop. Orta moved to third on the play, and scored as Pat Sheridan grounded a single between Grich and first baseman Rod Carew.

Black did not allow an Angel runner to reach third base in the contest and retired nine straight Angels in a stretch between the second and fifth innings.

California had a baserunner in each of the final three innings, but Black worked his way out of difficulty on each of the three occasions.

The two teams close the series tonight with Danny Jackson (13-12) pitching for the Royals against California's Don Sutton (15-9).

Following the conclusion of the series with California, Kansas City hosts Oakland in a three-game weekend series and California goes to Texas for a three-game series.

At the present time, Noble is working on putting his formula on a computer program for simplification purposes. His findings have also been documented in numerous journals and books including, "Medicine and Science in Exercise and Sport" and the "International Symposium of Biomechanics of Sport."

Noble hopes his bats can be out by next spring, but he thinks that may be a little premature. In the meantime, he sits patiently by his phone and waits.

asbestos removal request form by hand to the facilities building requirement analyst. Joel McGill is currently the building requirement analyst.

The new procedure states that no asbestos will be removed prior to the 10-day postmark requirement except in the case of emergency and that any work deemed "emergency" will require that the shop supervisor submit the required form the next working day.

The new procedure requires that any asbestos removed be disposed of within 24 hours in a manner specified by the KDHE Control Office. Finally, all record keeping concerning the removal of asbestos will be centralized in the office of the facilities building requirement analyst.

The changes in EPA policy went into effect July 12, according to the regional office of the EPA in Kansas City, Kan.

John Irwin, chief of the KDHE Toxicology Division, said it was not the responsibility of the department to inform individual organizations and institutions of changes in EPA policies that affect them and indicated that it was the responsibility of the EPA.

Greg Crable, with the regional office of the EPA, said it was not regional EPA responsibility and indicated it was the responsibility of the national office of the EPA in Washington, D.C.

The national office of the EPA could not be reached for comment.

marshals of the parade.

The parade route starts at the intersection of Fourth Street and Poyntz Avenue and will continue west on Poyntz to 11th Street. The parade then will head north on 11th to Moro Street through Aggieville and will end at City Park.

Beauchamp, a parade co-chairman, said judging of living group floats will be different this year. He said 10 percent of a float's total score will now be based on participation by members of the group with the float.

"We want to get more people involved in the parade," Beauchamp said. "We don't just want a few people riding on a float."

Homecoming activities culminate with the K-State-University of Oklahoma football game at 11:40 a.m. Halftime ceremonies will include the announcement of the new University Ambassadors.

represented. Starr said the youngest rider was 12 years old and the oldest rider was 85 years old.

"A six-month-old baby was also there, but he was pulled in a trailer behind a bike," Starr said.

About 70 miles were covered the first day of the ride. After the first day, Starr realized the importance of biking gear.

She said the appropriate gear includes padded biking shorts, biking shoes, sunglasses, gloves to protect palms from the shock of the handle bars and a helmet.

It was also crucial to know the biking language for safety reasons. "Biker down" means a biker has fallen and "on your right" or "on your left" is a warning that a biker is passing.

"Bike lingo was used throughout the tour," Starr said. "'Bike heads' were the first to get on the road in the morning and 'saggers' were always the last (to finish)."

Starr said she did not fit into either category, because she usually reached the campground about noon, when most of the other bikers arrived. The "bike heads" left in the middle of the night to arrive early and the saggers sometimes did not reach the campground until midnight, she said.

"It was important to know the lingo because of the traffic," Starr said. "The traffic was so bad that you could sit at one point during the tour and watch bikers go by for eight to nine hours."

Starr said it was necessary to train by riding 20 to 30 miles a day before the tour began. During the tour, Starr got up at 5 a.m. and stretched.

Starr still rides her bike, but because of limited time with school, she doesn't ride as much as she would like.

and within hours were selling the treasure to gold dealers, coin merchants and other people around town, authorities say.

Wanda Graves, a teller at at branch bank located beside the parking lot, said she bought four coins for a total of $460.

Workmen apparently sold some of the coins for as little as $50, said Assistant City Attorney Harold Johnson, who drew up the city's lawsuit.

Ownership of the coins is unclear, he said. They may belong to the city, the workmen, the owners of the property before it was sold to the city or even to the heirs of the person who buried the gold.

The city's suit names more than 20 people believed to have had their hands on the coins, he said.

PERSONAL 16

STUDMUFFIN—HERE'S your Personal, but where's my engagement ring? Brother's for a pitcher anyone? No, pitcher not picture, you'd just pick me up or slober on my face anyway! Looking forward to Junction City and the zoo in 14 years! How long have we been dating now? Thanks for a great party! Love, your Wenchiepooh. (28)

STAR OF the KSU F.B. team #62. Beginning with a pizza, that led to a "first" swimming lesson, which eventually ended in a mauling. Geez Louise, what a man—you're wearing me out! What's that grain thang on your hhheeeaaaddd? I'm sure it's not my dawg's pause—it must be that $*OXMau! I must be infatuated! Happy Anniversary and good luck on Saturday. Guess who hint: The president's non-descriptive grey eyed niece. (28)

TO THE Sigma Chi's—The time we've spent together, we know it's not been long; but with Sigma Chi's and Alpha Xi's, you know you can't go wrong! Frankie and Annette will be boppin', body building will beat the rest; with Xi's and Sig's ridin' the tide, we're sure to be the best! Love ya guys, the Xi's. (28)

ITK'S Jerry and Matt—Let's have a function, let's get psyched. Let's party—all freakin' night. Love and kisses, your GHF dates. (28)

PHI DELTS—The breakfast was great, and now we can't wait; with you on our side, we'll ride the tide with pride! Love, the AD Pi's. (28)

EARLY THIS morning the Pikes went to work, we made lots of noise and the Tri-Delts did perk. It was then they learned as they opened their eyes, this morning they were in for a big surprise. Soon they were ready and in their places, they were greeted with smiles by familiar faces. A champagne breakfast is what they got, 'cause Tri-Delt's and Pikes are really hot. Luv ya, The Pikes. (28)

SIG EP's: De boat, de boat, it's sailin in; with the Sig Ep's and Pi Phis, we'll surely win. Pomping and partying was the start of the fun, but now's the time to show 'em who's number 1. Body building, Yell Like Hell—we'll blow 'em away. So throw on those jams, today's the day! Love, the Pi Phi's. (28)

JIM—HERE'S that Personal, Sweetie! Have a fun day. (28)

KKG JAMIE—Look out Peace Treaty here we come. Thanks for being the greatest friend. Love, Tracy. (28)

GO KAPPA'S—Go TKE's! Our P.J. Pizza party was a blast and pompin' is fun, too! But today's the day to really jam—so let's build our bodies and Yell Like Hell! Good luck! Love, the KKG's. (28)

TKE'S—HOMECOMING stuff starts today—we're more excited than we can say! Hey, love ya! Kappas. (28)

TKE'S AND Kappas: Yell Like Hell is really swell, we all know this very well. That's why we'll place today, cuz we're great in everyway. (28)

HEY PIKES: Some like it hot, and some sweat when the heat is on. We like the heat but the others, they just can't go on! Tri Delt's and Pikes are hot—They like it hot! Love, the Tri Delt's. P.S. Let's go for it today! (28)

COLLEGE VIEW Cookie Monsters—Thanks for the kitchen—J, J, and T. (28)

S. TRAPP—This one's for you, finally!! (28)

LAMBDA CHI and Sigma Tri—Now it's time to build those bodies high—Let's scream and shout and Yell Like Hell, and show our Purple Pride! (28)

WE'VE WORKED long and hard, and now the time has come; for Alpha Chi's and Fiji's, to take #1! (28)

HEY BALES! How many different ways are there to spell Pheegee? Your women on 5th. (28)
